After the gendarmes had searched the room and stuffed my papers into a suitcase, I was asked to go with them to police headquarters for questioning. The weather was cold, and had I known what was in store for me I would not have gone off in thin socks and a light overcoat.

The gendarmes drove me to a large apartment building known as the Bridge House, which the Japanese had secretly turned into a prison. While I was being questioned in an upstairs office, several other Americans and British were brought in. Everything I had in my pockets was taken from me, also my tie and belt. And I was allowed to keep only one handkerchief. History records many prisoners for whom ties, belts, or handkerchiefs knotted together meant escape from their sufferings—via suicide.

Then I was taken to the ground floor and shoved into the cell which was to be my home for the next two months, and which was to make me a cripple for the rest of my life. About thirty people were crowded into a space eighteen feet by twelve. They sat in packed rows on the floor. Most of them were Chinese, but among them was Rudolph Mayer, brother of the Hollywood producer. Mayer asked some of the Chinese to squeeze over, and I got a seat in the corner, where I could lean back against the wall. This was better than sitting hunched up in the middle of the room. Mayer laughed and told me that my place had belonged to a Korean who had died there of blood poisoning only the night before.

Soon I was taken upstairs to be questioned again. Through an interpreter an officer cross-examined me on my life history, especially the twenty-five years I had spent in China. This was the first of many grillings. They took place two or three times a week, often late at night, during the two months I was in Bridge House. Repeatedly the Japanese tried to force from me admissions that would connect me with the activities of American or British military intelligence. I was told papers had been found proving I had been paid $85,000 (Chinese) by our naval attaché, which was absurd.

My answers were taken down in Japanese on big sheets of paper, then folded into a sort of book the last page of which I was told to sign and fingerprint. I always asked the officer to summarize what he had written, and caught him in a number of deliberate falsifications. It would have been easy for him to make up some wild confession and insert it in the sheets that preceded my signature.

The examining officers were often insulting and arrogant, but I was never beaten. Compared with the silence, monotony, and filth of the cell to which I was returned each time, these arguments with officials were not unpleasant.

The ground-floor space that had once been shops in Bridge House was now a series of built-in cells separated from the apartments' walls by long narrow corridors. Into a dozen cells about five hundred men and women were jammed like sardines. On two sides of my cell were rows of thick wooden poles about two inches apart—twenty-five poles on one side, seventeen on the other; I think I must have counted them at least a million times.

All day and all night we sat on the hard wooden floor. We were terribly cold in our stocking feet. Our shoes had been taken from us, Japanese fashion, and stacked in the corridor outside. We were ordered to sit in regular rows with our knees drawn up, in order to pack more prisoners in and make counting them easier for the guards. Often there were so many people in the cell that some of them had to stand up.

We were forbidden to talk. If one man disobeyed that or some other rule, all of us in the cell were punished by being ordered to sit on our feet with our heads bowed. The Japanese learn to do this from childhood—which may explain why so many Japanese women are bowlegged—but for Europeans and Chinese it is torture. Some of the people in my cell, after sitting on their feet for a few hours, were unable to walk for several days afterward. And we had to sit facing toward Tokyo. So we called this punishment the "New Order Kneeling Posture."

It was impossible to keep the Chinese from talking, and the guards often caught them at it. When this happened, the offending persons were beaten. In fact, the Chinese prisoners were beaten continually. All through the night we could hear, from other cells, the screams of some poor wretch being punished for a real or fancied violation of the rules. A Chinese trusty who was caught smuggling in cigarettes was beaten so badly that he could not stand up for a week. Later he developed beri-beri and died in my cell. Another Chinese on whom some money had been found was taken out into the corridor and beaten until his face was a pulp and the guard's yard-long club only a splintered stump. I counted eighty-five blows.

No European was beaten that I know of. But once a friend managed to send me a thermos bottle of tea. I had only begun to drink it when the guard demanded the bottle back. I gulped as much as I could and passed it along to him. He ordered me to come up close to the hole in the door through which our food was given to us, reached in, and slapped my face hard.

Shanghai winters are cold, and there was no heat in the Bridge House. At about nine every night the guards brought us blankets, though never enough to go round. So there was always a fight for them. When it had quieted down, there would be groups of two to six prisoners who by huddling close together were able to cover themselves with one blanket. In the morning the blankets were taken away again. On some cold nights none were given out at all.

Our day began with the collection of the blankets. The next event was the dragging sound we heard down the corridor which meant that breakfast was coming our way. It was rice, distributed among us in bowls. We passed them round the cell in rotation. And this morning rice was good—warm and well salted. At noon and in the evening we had rice again, but it was cold and soggy, and evidently had stood a long time. Sometimes there were bits of herring in it—mostly the heads. Our greatest torment was thirst. Though we were given tea every day—so wretched that it was probably brewed from used leaves—we were never given water, and not once felt that we had had enough to drink.

The poor Chinese prisoners rioted several times because they were not allowed to receive any food from their friends outside. We foreigners were luckier, though the Japanese would not let canned goods into the building and, as we found out later, often helped themselves to what was sent to us. But we could not eat with a good appetite under the eyes of the starving Chinese, and many's the time I divided my sandwiches with them.

Worse even than the endless rice and thirst, or the monotony, or the days and nights of cramped sitting shoulder to shoulder with nothing to do, was the appalling filth of the place. We could never wash except on the rare occasions when we were taken out. In two months I had only three or four baths. The sanitary facilities were unspeakable. The cell, jammed with from twenty-five to forty people, was served by a single crude box in the corner in full view of the whole room. I soon learned the Japanese word for it—benjo. The benjo was emptied once a day from the outside, by a door which was kept locked lest some undersized, half-crazed prisoner should try to crawl out to liberty through it. Eventually we got used to the stench. But one thing we "foreigners" could never get used to. There were always several women in the cell. To make a screen for them, we would stand round the benjo with our backs to it.

A number of the men in our cell were suffering from venereal disease in its most repulsive forms. The Japanese gave them medical treatment openly, in the middle of the crowd, before the eyes of men and women alike. Only the most advanced and disgusting cases were thus treated.

Frequently the Chinese women in our cell were taken out for questioning. I never knew what happened, but often they would come back battered, bleeding, to lie sobbing quietly on the cold, filthy floor.

One of the European women was a Russian. Probably because she had been suddenly deprived of drugs, she screamed hysterically most of the night and was soon taken away.

The great majority of prisoners were Chinese. Some stayed with us only a few days; some had been there so long they had forgotten the charge against them. There was a boy of fifteen, accused of gun-running for the guerrillas. There were students, accused of various offenses against the Japanese. And to my surprise there were many Japanese prisoners among us too—soldiers hauled up for drunkenness, former employees of foreign firms from whom the police were trying to get information. They were treated no better than the rest of us. I saw a gendarme beat a Japanese soldier senseless. One of my cell mates was a retired British army officer. He suffered hideously from boils. I shall never forget how all through one long night he kept reciting, over and over again, the Lord's Prayer.

The filth was such in our germ-laden surroundings that there was an epidemic of boils. As a rule the Japanese paid no attention to pleas for treatment, but occasionally a medical attendant would bore into the boil with a pair of pliers. The treatment was worse than the disease. Standard Japanese medical service consisted of aspirin and mercurochrome. We got aspirin no matter what was wrong. Periodically a Japanese nurse would daub mercurochrome on sores and infections—if one managed to stop her as she went through the crowd with her tray.

A hangnail on one of my fingers became infected. Soon the finger swelled to twice normal size. As the wound was not open, mercurochrome did no good. After two weeks of pleading for treatment I was taken upstairs to the dispensary. Without using any anaesthetic, the Japanese military doctor trimmed all the skin off my finger with a pair of scissors. Then mercurochrome was put on it, and in time it was cured.

We had nothing to do but sit—or kneel facing Tokyo—or think about our woes or talk in low voices when we knew the guard was out of earshot. Occasionally someone would start a word game, but it did not get very far. We were not allowed anything to read. Once a copy of a Jewish refugee newspaper, printed in German, got into the cell as wrapping for some food. It was strange how eagerly it was looked at even by those who knew no German.

Occasionally in fine weather—perhaps a dozen times during my stay—small groups of us were taken out to the courtyard for a brief walk or Japanese army calisthenics. In this courtyard were cages in which the Japanese kept their trained police dogs. We would stop and make friends with the dogs, take their paws and shake hands with them. The dogs seemed to like us better than they did their Jap masters.

I said we had nothing to do. This is not quite true. All of us were busy many hours of the day hunting the lice in our clothes—which often had not been changed or washed for months. This louse hunt began in the morning after breakfast. Often we kept score. Rudolph Mayer usually won—with anywhere from sixty to one hundred. We foreigners couldn't eat the cold, soggy noonday rice, so we traded it to the Chinese in exchange for their services as expert delousers—a bowl of rice for one louse-free undershirt. To this day I cannot understand why typhus did not go through Bridge House like a prairie fire.

Not long after I was put in prison my feet began to hurt, especially the heels. I thought this was not surprising after squatting shoeless on a cold hardwood floor. But the pain got so bad that soon I was unable to put on my shoes when taken out for exercise or upstairs for questioning. Since there was nothing one could see, the Japanese doctor only laughed at me. Only once did I persuade the nurse to paint my heels with disinfectant, which of course did no good.

On February 26 I was taken from the Bridge House and with seven other foreigners transferred to the new prison at Kiangwan outside the city. We were given a haircut and a shave—my first in two months—and told that we were to face a court martial on the charge of espionage.

Kiangwan consisted of solitary cells. Mine was about five by ten. There was no bed, and as the building was unheated and the cement still damp, I suffered from lying on the cold floor. High up on one wall was a small barred window, but I had not the strength to chin myself on the ledge nor could I jump high enough to look out through it.

Conditions were a little better at Kiangwan. There was seaweed with the rice, the tea was more drinkable, and I got more food from the outside, though usually it arrived frozen and I had by this time very little appetite. When the weather was good, we were taken out to the bath house, and sat four or five of us together in big vats of hot water. We were also given tooth brushes, which hung on a rack labeled with our names. As the names were written in Japanese, the tooth brushes soon became scrambled, but we were past caring. We could communicate with each other by knocking on the walls, but never worked out a code any farther than the dot-dot-dot-dash of V for victory. Sitting alone in my cell I made up an endless poem about the Japanese, but I have forgotten most of the stanzas.

My cell of course had the familiar stinking benjo in one corner. After a week in Kiangwan my feet were in such bad shape that I could only get to it by rolling along the floor.

I complained to the guard about my feet every chance I got. After about three weeks a couple of Japanese military doctors came in to look at me and gave me a hypodermic. My feet had definitely turned purple.

A month after I was taken to Kiangwan I was taken out again, on a stretcher, and driven to the Shanghai General Hospital, where my friend Dr. W. H. Gardiner took care of me and I was tended by French Franciscan nuns. My feet had literally rotted away, and were so numb that an anaesthetic was used only once. Amputation was made easier by a bone dropping out here, a toe crumbling off there. I had four transfusions.

The Japanese were constantly coming in to photograph me. I told them to take a picture of my feet, amputated close to the heel, but they refused. For these pictures they made me cover up my hands, which were only skin and bone. Dr. Gardiner told me I looked like King Tut, with the skin on my face so tight that it wouldn't quite close around my teeth.

In June, thanks to pressure from friends and newspapermen in America, I was allowed to leave, along with other Americans exchanged for Japanese held in this country.

Another ten days in Japanese prisons, says my doctor, and I would not be here to tell this tale of the filth, stupidity, and inhumanity meted out by our enemies to those unlucky enough to get into their clutches.

Washington Letter

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, October 4

I AM not one of Justice Byrnes's most fervent admirers and remember him chiefly in connection with editorials I used to write demanding that, as chairman of the Senate's Audit and Control Committee, he stop trying to choke off the La Follette investigation. But I am inclined to think that the President made a good choice in appointing Byrnes as Director of Economic Stabilization. The job is a difficult one and requires stepping on many people's toes. A middle-of-the-roader was needed, a man acceptable to an overwhelming majority of the people. Byrnes is an able man; his record on the court, as it was in Congress, has been a mixed one—far from reactionary, though hardly to be termed liberal. In Congress he supported the President in the court fight, and on the court he wrote the decision in the New York teamsters' case, holding that the anti-racketeering statute was not intended to apply to labor-union activities. The President's executive order seems wisely flexible, especially as regards wages. Much will depend on the way Byrnes tries to administer it, and he deserves the cooperation and forbearance of all sections of the community in his new task.

The press corps is unanimous in its opinion of the President's attitude on his return from his tour of production. Mr. Roosevelt has been understandably resentful in the past of the treatment accorded him by part of the press, but what he showed on his return was not merely annoyance with the anti-New Dealers—the Frank Kents, David Lawrences, and Mark Sullivans—but really with any criticism whatever. This was clear in his remarks on Congress. He mentioned the price bill only in response to a question. The criticism the President himself volunteered was that Congress was hurting the war effort by investigating things involving military or technical matters not explainable to a lay mind. This was a reference to investigating committees like those under Senators Truman, Gillette, and Bone, and with all due respect to Mr. Roosevelt, it was dangerous nonsense. The brass hats who thought Russia would not last a month, the dollar-a-year men who supposed that we had plenty of aluminum capacity, the chemists who forgot what their elementary textbooks on organic chemistry told them about rubber from alcohol should not be exempted from the curiosity and common sense of representatives of the people in Congress. The best example of the need for constant investigation and checking is the ease with which they deceived the President himself in February, 1941, when he said talk of a steel shortage was "a deliberate lie." At that very time Under Secretary of War Patterson and Admiral Land, as both later testified, were worried over shortages of structural steel and steel plate. Let Mr. Roosevelt blush that off. Let him also remember that he did not think the technicalities of constitutional law too difficult for the people's comprehension when he wanted to fight the Supreme Court. The technicalities of production and military supply are no more difficult, and no less important to our lives and destinies. We need more, not less, democratic discussion of them.

One often hears it said by those third- and fourth-rank officials to whom the President referred so disparagingly that the White House sometimes seems poorly informed on what is actually going on. This was evident last spring when Mr. Roosevelt issued a statement saying that production quotas were so far ahead of schedule that schedules would be revised upward. At that very time, as the weekly confidential WPB production reports showed and no newspaperman dared print, several basic production quotas were sagging badly. Some of them are still sagging. I can find no official who thinks that we are reaching 94 to 95 per cent of our goals or who believes that, as Mr. Roosevelt said, there seems to be no appreciable shortage of aluminum at the present time. No newspaperman here thinks the President's victory-program message meant that he wanted a production rate of 60,000 planes a month by December rather than 60,000 planes this year. Statements of this kind reflect (1) the President's dislike for hearing unpleasant things from the men around him, (2) the fact that for this reason and for reasons of their own prestige these men tend to put their work in as optimistic a light as possible, and (3) that he doesn't like to be too candid about facts which reflect upon his own capacity as President.

This explains his sudden outburst of pique over recent speeches by Elmer Davis, General Somervell, and Assistant Secretary of the Navy Ralph K. Bard which stressed our shortcomings and struck a note of invigorating realism and warning. All these speeches were cleared by the Office of War Information under Elmer Davis's wise policy of giving the public more truth and less pap. The people who greeted the President with deserved warmth and affection during his tour seemed to like these speeches, judging from the response by mail and telegram here and from the reaction of the audiences before which they were given. The American people are adults; they can take it. Their morale is not going to be built up by the kind of false information given in the Associated Press dispatch from Detroit on the President's visit. The President at Willow Run, the A. P. said, "saw sheet aluminum going into one end of quarter-mile-long assembly lines and four-motored B-24 bombers ready to fly away at the other." The President passed this dispatch but told his press conference that Willow Run was not yet in production, though nearly ready to go.

May I say a special word of praise for one of the men the President criticized? A year ago in PM I attacked

Assistant Secretary of the Navy Ralph K. Bard. He was making a bad labor record, and I dug up connections he had in the past with the radio program of the Crusaders and the Johnstown Citizens' Committee. He is an industrial banker from Chicago, and I want now to stand up and testify that he has not only been making good speeches—that is comparatively easy—but has brought about a new atmosphere of confidence and cooperation between the Navy Department and the very unions which were bitterly critical of him a year ago. When more people of such widely different backgrounds and interests learn to work together for the good of our country, we shall be on the road to victory. My hat is off to Mr. Bard.

After Stalingrad

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

AS THE bloodiest struggle in history reaches a climax at Stalingrad, the time has come for a careful evaluation of the position of the United Nations, and especially of Russia, in the fourth year of the war.

The fighting on the Russian front has been enormously expensive. The war in the east has long since become one of attrition rather than movement through the deliberate Russian choice of retreat rather than annihilation when non-vital objectives were involved. This has forced Hitler to fight an immensely costly series of engagements at the end of long lines of communication. And the nature of the country has made the destruction of the opposing army the only possibility for a knockout blow. This objective, sedulously sought by Hitler along an entire front in 1941, has scarcely been attempted in 1942. The Germans have tried instead to defeat Russia mainly by occupying its territory and depriving it of certain raw materials.

In both military and industrial attrition the Wehrmacht has been very successful. About one-half of European Russia has now been occupied, and while this area is only about one-sixteenth of the entire Soviet Union it includes the more important industrial and agricultural areas. A third of the population, a third of the food supply, two-thirds of the coal, iron, and steel, and numerous important centers of industry are in German hands. Others are gravely threatened, and their usefulness has been greatly impaired. Also the Germans have gained some oil and manganese, both of which they need desperately.

The German shortage of man-power, the consistent and thorough scorched-earth policy of the evacuating armies, and possibly transportation difficulties have kept many Russian losses from being at the same time German gains. Nevertheless, the position of Russia today is similar to that in which the United States would find itself if New England, the Middle Atlantic states, and Ohio were in enemy hands, and Detroit was so endangered as to be valueless industrially. In that case we should still retain much economic and military strength, but with the principal shipyards and steel centers and many of the main airplane plants in enemy hands, our ability to carry on war would be, to say the least, considerably reduced. News dispatches have recently contained painful reports that the Red Army in some sectors has been suffering from the lack of equipment consequent on such industrial defeats. Even though whole industries have been moved eastward to resume operations in new centers, the time required to effect the change was bound to cause a considerable loss in productive efficiency.

Losses of man-power have been equally serious. The recently suggested figure of five million men captured or killed is certainly no exaggeration. The Russian retreat to the Volga and the southern Caucasus after the German break-through at Kursk was a costly move, even though we need not accept Hitler's claim that seventy-five Russian divisions were destroyed. It is worthy of note, however, that 1942 has seen no such destruction of the best Soviet units by blitzkrieg warfare as the Germans accomplished during the summer and fall of 1941. The Russians have been losing men heavily but with greater damage to the enemy than a year ago.

Too little attention has been given to the loss of morale resulting from the failure of the British and Americans to undertake a second front in 1942 and to suffer with their allies. The Russians correctly feel that they are bearing the brunt of the war and cannot appreciate either the eagerness of the British and American public to see a new front opened or the very large difficulties of logistics which a major invasion effort would encounter at present.

Germany has meanwhile paid a heavy price for its eastern victories. In addition to troop losses certainly equal to those suffered by the imperial armies in the First World War, it has sacrificed some degree of prestige and severely strained its economic system. The shortage of labor must be infinitely greater in Germany than here. More serious has been the devastation of industrial districts by British and, to a very limited degree, American bombing.

In any study of this year's battle on the eastern front two things stand out clearly. First, both the Red Army and the Wehrmacht are markedly weaker than a year ago. Neither has had sufficient reserves of material and manpower to attempt a full-scale offensive along the entire front. Instead, each has pursued limited objectives, with the Germans retaining the initiative and showing an amazing ability to overcome transportation troubles. The weakening, however, has not been equal, and the Russians, as has already been noted, are showing the effect of the loss of vital industrial territory in occasional shortages of weapons, while the Germans have not as yet evidenced any deficiencies of this sort.

Second, it is certain that Hitler will fail to accomplish his main objectives of the year. In April he expected to destroy the Red Army. When this attempt failed, he directed his attention to the Caucasus and later to severing communication lines between southern and central Russia. At most not over two months of passably good fighting weather remain to him before winter checks operations everywhere but in the extreme south. An advance upon Moscow from the south would encounter intense weather difficulties as well as enormously strong resistance. The advance in the Caucasus has been greatly slowed down and faces extremely arduous terrain in the coming weeks. Since neither the Luftwaffe nor the loss of Novorossisk has knocked out the Black Sea fleet, an attempt to reach the Baku oil fields by a sea-borne invasion south of the Caucasus does not offer much chance of success.

It is only in this region that the German armies have even come close to their goal. All the direct railway lines by which Baku oil normally travels north have now been severed, and German success in reaching the Volga has knocked out a long stretch of that stream as a line of transport. Under these conditions it is apparent that the main Soviet problem will soon be oil. Caucasus oil in small quantities can still be sent north by a combination of shipping across the Caspian and indirect railway transport. Some reserves have probably been stored, and new fields directly west of the Urals are unquestionably being developed. Russian shortages, not only of oil but of food, raw materials, and men, are being brushed aside all too confidently by American and especially British commentators.

Nevertheless, when Hitler's September 30 speech is read in connection with the Russian campaign it becomes apparent that victory has once more eluded the Third Reich and that Germany, for the first time in the present war, faces a well-defined threat of defeat. For with the gains of the last two months in Atlantic shipping, an Anglo-American invasion of Western Europe is passing out of the pipe-dream stage.

Even before Hitler's speech a new line of strategy was obviously being considered by the Germans. Stated briefly, the most likely German procedure in the months ahead will be to consolidate territory taken in the east and to avoid paying too heavy a price for any further conquests. The supply department will certainly be better prepared against the weather than it was last year. Much of the Luftwaffe will be transferred to the west, where the people of the Rhineland have already been promised added air protection and a quick resumption of offensive air war. Many divisions will also be sent to France and the Netherlands.

If this plan is adopted, the Soviet Union will continue to be a vital factor, for Germany will be gambling on the inability of the depleted, under-equipped Red Army to undertake an offensive with real punch in it. Their gamble would not necessarily be unwise, since the present war, which has witnessed prodigies of endurance and valor in defensive fighting by the Soviets, has not seen a single Russian offensive which has possessed the quick-moving, hard-hitting, decisive character of the German blitzkrieg.

The European phase of the war thus has several encouraging features. Unless the German armies in the very limited time remaining before winter are able to perform miracles, 1943 will see them forced either to adopt a defensive in the east in order to be ready to meet invasion in the west or to concentrate in one section of Europe only at the risk of disaster elsewhere. This more favorable outlook should not blind Americans to the problems ahead. We must win at sea and hold our dominance in the air. Russia must be kept well supplied. Finally, unless our military tactics and leadership have improved greatly, green American troops and often defeated British, even with superior air power, may prove far from equal to Hitler's veterans. What the Russian front provides is simply an opportunity to gain the initiative if we act with speed and force. We must not lose sight of the fact that the Axis is still winning the war and that we have not yet reached the turning-point which precedes the long road to victory. There are merely indications that it may not lie far ahead.

Workers in Uniform

BY HAROLD MAGER

AMERICA is moving toward an acute man-power crisis as our war effort mounts steadily in volume and power. We are now beginning to scrape the bottom of the man-power barrel for the precious human fuel that feeds the war machine. Paul V. McNutt, chairman of the War Manpower Commission, admitted as much the other day in testimony before the Tolan committee investigating national defense migration. Mr. McNutt declared that "the continued success of voluntary efforts cannot be assured, and we are moving rapidly into a situation where the government must intervene increasingly in the labor market." Labor conscription, he warned, was "inevitable."

There is a strong likelihood that before the end of 1943 the number of soldiers in uniform will be matched by the number of workers in uniform. We have made the first beginnings. The government has already asserted its right to dispose of the services of its more than two million employees in any way it sees fit; and the War Manpower Commission, working closely with Selective Service, has ordered miners in twelve Western states to remain on the job, unless released by the United States Employment Service, on pain of reclassification by their local draft boards. Senator Austin of Vermont has just introduced a "work or fight" bill giving broad powers to the director of Selective Service to order the activities of all persons from eighteen to sixty-five who are deferred from military service.

The attainment of goals set for 1943 will require an upheaval in traditional modes of work and living such as the nation has never experienced before. In the first place, the entire labor force of the country (inclusive of the armed forces) must expand from 57,000,000 in June, 1942, to 62,500,000 by December, 1943. If this were the only change required, it would be no small achievement, for no competent economist in the field has ever placed the number of new entrants that could be absorbed in a year at more than 3,500,000. The really astounding change, however, will take place within the existing labor force. The estimated addition of about 4,000,000 workers to war industries and an equal number to the armed forces, coupled with replacements for essential work and transfers from non-essential to essential work, will require the placing of 18,000,000 persons in new jobs. At least 11,000,000 workers will have to be trained for semi-skilled work of some kind. In the coming year the labor map of America will be completely transformed. Not only must this tremendous expansion be achieved, but sources of additional man-power must be explored, labor mobility increased, and labor pirating prevented.

The shortage of man-power has been felt particularly in agriculture, where prodigious increases in production have been called for in spite of a continually dwindling supply of able-bodied farm hands. The production goals for 1942 stagger the imagination. According to Fred S. Wallace, chief of the Agricultural Adjustment Agency, the farmers this year have undertaken to increase the production of milk over the 1935-39 average by an amount sufficient to float every battleship, aircraft carrier, cruiser, destroyer, and submarine in the United States navy; of meat, to lay a seven-lane highway one inch thick from New York to San Francisco; of eggs, to form a double line reaching from the earth to the moon; of canned fruit, to form a row of cases bridging the Atlantic between New York and Liverpool; of canned vegetables, to form a double row of cases stretching across the Pacific from Los Angeles to Vladivostok. I repeat, these are merely the increases in production. Meanwhile, farmers are not only being called to the colors but are leaving the land for better-paying jobs in war plants, while those that remain are unable to count upon an adequate supply of migratory workers for the harvest and are using agricultural machinery that is poorer than last year's and will be still worse next year.

This vast kaleidoscope of labor shifting and relocation cannot be left to the ordinary mechanism of supply and demand. The allocation of labor resources should no more be controlled by the operation of blind market forces than the allocation of materials in short supply. We have reached a stage where it is necessary to institute labor priorities, control labor inventories, and expedite labor mobility by breaking down transportation bottlenecks. Otherwise we shall not attain our 1943 production goals.

There is much that can be done before we introduce conscription of labor. We are approaching, to be sure, an absolute shortage, but certain existing local shortages could be quickly overcome if the government tackled the problem in earnest. While thirty-five major centers of war production, including Los Angeles, Seattle, Detroit, Buffalo, and Philadelphia, are now suffering from a serious lack of workers, hundreds of communities throughout the country have large pools of unemployed. Wendell Lund, director of the Labor Production Division of the War Production Board, testified before the Tolan committee on September 17 that New York City alone had half a million unemployed workers—probably an inflated figure but worth mentioning because of the authority of the source. Are men ready to pick up and migrate to the centers of war production? If the labor migrations of the past two years are not sufficient evidence, look at the thousands who stormed the recruiting offices of the Kaiser Shipbuilding Company in New York City a few days ago, ready to cross the country to Oregon.

The first task is to establish a genuine national labor market to replace the network of local labor markets that dot the country: labor reserves are widely scattered, while the demand in industry is highly concentrated. This task can be accomplished only by taking the United States Employment Service out of local politics. The Employment Service should be the central agency for recruiting and placing labor. Unfortunately, it is handicapped by a provision of the Labor Department—Federal Security Agency Appropriations Act for 1943 which calls for a return to state control after the war. The effect of this clause is to keep some, though by no means all, of the state directors over-dependent on local interests. To insure labor mobility—a particularly pressing problem now that gasoline and rubber rationing has curtailed the range of the jalopies—the government, through the Employment Service, should provide workers and their families with transportation to their new place of employment.

Secondly, the President's anti-discrimination policy in employment should be strictly enforced. One method of doing this would be to turn over all hiring to the Employment Service. A simpler method—one that requires no additional legislation—would be for the government to exercise its power to direct the hiring practices of government contractors. The time has come to give substance to what has so far been simply a high moral ideal.

Third, labor-utilization experts should be assigned to large war plants to devise means of increasing labor productivity. This does not mean speed-up. It does mean that those plants which have a surplus of skilled labor—and there are many such—should be compelled to disgorge. This is no time for labor hoarding with an eye to the peace. Labor-utilization experts might also serve on labor-management production committees to promote training programs, the upgrading of unskilled workers into skilled workers, and the breaking down of complicated jobs into simpler functions. Increasing productivity is one of the important ways of adding to our labor supply. Many more bombers will come off the assembly lines now that the necessary man-hours for construction have been reduced from 75,000 to 18,000.

These are things that can be done now. They do not have to wait upon conscription. The broader problem, however, will soon demand solution. The government agencies responsible for the allocation of our human resources are giving it earnest consideration. If the Austin "work or fight" bill is not killed in committee, Congress too will have to consider the problem. At this time it is important for the American people to be made aware of its transcendent importance. Unless they get behind such a measure, it is not likely to be passed by Congress; and unless it is passed, we shall hardly be able to achieve the goals we have set for 1943.

Without passing on the merits of the Austin bill, one may enumerate the basic principles which such legislation should embody if labor is not to find itself in chains. These principles were first enunciated in the "Essential Work Order" providing for the mobilization of labor in Great Britain. First, where workers are assigned by the government to specific work, the standards of wages and employment should in no case be less favorable than those agreed upon between trade unions and employers. Second, every worker must be guaranteed a minimum wage not less than his normal wage as long as he is capable of and available for work during normal working hours. Third, no worker may give up his job and no employer may discharge a worker without permission of the proper governmental authorities, subject to the right of appeal to a local committee on which workers and employers are represented.

The inclusion of these principles is not intended merely as a quid pro quo for labor. They are vital to the very existence of a free working force. While the times may decree that labor give ground to a dangerous extent, they don't decree that it throw all protection to the winds.

In the Wind

ASKED BY a reporter from the Washington Post what he thought about the coming elections, Patrick Henry Drewry, chairman of the Democratic Campaign Committee in Congress, said sharply, "There are no issues in this Congressional campaign."

THE "VOTE FOR VICTORY" supplement to the New Republic lists Clare Boothe Luce as a Socialist candidate for Congress.

THE C. I. O. UNION for shipbuilding workers recently held a convention in New York and protested, among other things, against the government's deportation proceedings against Harry Bridges. The headline of the Houston (Texas) Chronicle's report of the convention read: "Bridges Deportation Is Approved by Union."

FROM A STORY in Woman, a British Ladies' Home Journal: "While she talked he saw in the line of her chin, in the sweep of her brows, and in the wide set of her eyes why she was the sportswear buyer for a great merchandising house."

Behind the Enemy Line

[Any strategy of political war, to be effective, must keep close watch upon the twists and turns of the enemy's thinking. In introducing as a permanent feature of the Political War section a column devoted to analysis of the Axis leaders' most revealing statements, we give first place to Dr. Goebbels, the chief engineer of Axis propaganda.]

ONCE Dr. Joseph Goebbels wanted to be a great writer. Today he commands a thousand pens. When he wishes to propagate an idea, a brigade of writers marches into action. Nevertheless, he has not quite renounced his old ambition. Once a week he takes up his pen. In each issue of the weekly Das Reich appears a column signed with his name. These weekly sermons provide the only authentic contact we still have with the members of the Nazi government. They are therefore, unintentionally, of some value as a source of information. An experienced analyst can often deduce from them what is going on in the heads of the ruling Nazis and in the heads of the German people.

The mid-September column was informative through its mere choice of theme. "It is understandable," the Minister began, "that the question how long the war will last should be posed ever more eagerly." Here is authentic news that the German people are "eagerly" asking this question, so eagerly that the highest German morale official feels obliged to take up the matter in his paper.

Of course he has no answer to it. "There is no definite answer. . . . Experience teaches us that often peace does not come when it seems near, and just as often is suddenly here when it was still scarcely expected." Expressed more concretely: in 1940 you were unpleasantly surprised by the continuation of the war; is it not possible, then, that you will be pleasantly surprised by its sudden end?

We can leave aside the question whether many readers will be encouraged by this vague prospect. The core of the statement is that the war's long duration is a subject of talk in Germany and that an early end to it is "still scarcely expected" by the oppressed people. This reminds us that popular psychology in a war is determined not only by successes or failures, by the prospect of victory or defeat, but also by the mere duration of the war. Its length becomes an independent factor in morale. For Germans, who have really been in the war since 1933, its endless prolongation probably begins to be more irritating than anything else.

The column affords us a glance not only at the mood of the German people but also at that of the government. After Goebbels has tried to offer some comfort for the length of the war, he speaks of its outcome in terms that are well worth noting. Of course everything will come out well—and why are we sure of that? Here he becomes really interesting. For he develops a theory known internationally in the First World War as the "Faust pawn theory." He even uses the same word—Faustpfand—that from 1916 on was so often in the mouths of Bethmann-Hollweg and Hertling. In those days the theory ran as follows: We have seized a huge amount of the enemy's territory; that is the pawn which he must redeem from us. Even if we should not be strong enough to win new victories, this pawn guarantees the result. The conquered territories are an article of exchange with which we shall always be able to negotiate a profitable peace.

Exactly the same argument is advanced by Goebbels now. Nothing is so stupid, he says, as the English thesis that a country can lose the battles but win the war. No; battles win territory, and conquered territory becomes the "Faust pawn in the hand of the victor. We possess so many of these pawns that we do not need to be anxious about the outcome of the war. The final victor will be the one who in the last round holds the greatest number of pawns."

Experience shows that in the final round the pawns may be snatched from the hand that holds them—that is the flaw in the theory. But that is not important. What is important is the disclosure that the idea of using conquered territory as a pawn has occurred to Goebbels—and that means to the Nazi regime. For this is a theory on which one leans only when the luck has turned. Only those who no longer seriously believe in complete victory consider the next best alternative: after all, we still have the pawns and we can use them for trading. Two years ago it would not have occurred to the Hitler government for a moment to talk about the outcome of the war in terms of the pawn theory. That Goebbels has now done so, if only in a couple of sentences, is a striking indication of how Berlin's ruling group assesses the war situation.

The Spider of Ankara

DEVELOPMENTS in Russia are again bringing Turkey into the front line of the political struggle. While the danger of a German attack comes closer day by day, Turkey continues to hold to its policy of "active neutrality." Instead, for instance, of capitulating to German demands for the right of transit and the passage of the Dardanelles, Turkey has sent reinforcements to its eastern frontiers. All demands which represent an encroachment on its sovereignty have so far been rejected. On the other hand Turkey takes great care not to antagonize Hitler. Leading Turks attend Papen's ever more frequent parties, dubbed "propaganda with Rhine wine." And Papen reports to his chief that he is winning the Turkish heart.

When President İnönü made Saraçoglu Prime Minister, one read between the lines of the German press: "At last an opportunist who will be led into the right path by our successes." But Saraçoglu signed the pact of friendship with Berlin only because it served his country. Military decisions had to be postponed at all costs at that time. So with Menemençoglu, who has taken over the Foreign Office. In the opinion of Free Europe (London) his direction of it will be solely in the interests of Turkey.

One of Papen's few real successes has been to effect a breach in the Turkish press. When journalists from Ankara and Istanbul recently visited London, no representation of Cumhuriyet, the widely read daily, was included. Only two years ago its London correspondent was able to send it a personal message from Churchill. Now it seems completely under Goebbels's thumb.

Pro-Ally Turks are deeply concerned about the continued abuse of diplomatic immunity by those two headquarters of espionage, the German embassy at Ankara and the German consulate at Alexandretta. Under the management of the notorious Middle East specialist, Ernst Grobba, trained German fifth-columnists—Arab followers of El Hussein, ex-Mufti of Jerusalem, and Indian followers of Subhas Bose—are being sent from the Sanjak on their various assignments. And in Turkey itself plotting goes on incessantly. Ludwig Moyzisch is Gestapo chief. His official designation is "commercial attaché," which makes him the subordinate of Herr Jenke, whose wife, Ribbentrop's sister, is the chief wire-puller in all the Nazi intrigues in Ankara. The excellent Turkish secret police also keep a watchful eye on Victor Friede, representative of the Allgemeine Elektrische Gesellschaft. It was Friede who proposed that Germany supply Turkey with rolling stock and aircraft. This would have opened a previously closed frontier to an army of Nazi technicians—and others.

However, Turkey has so far preferred to buy its locomotives from England and its fighting aircraft from America. It also gets wheat from the British Empire. The Allies show every understanding of Turkey's supply problems.

Mr. Steinhardt, the United States ambassador, is the most popular foreign diplomat in Ankara. Turkey's inclusion in the Lease-Lend Act was his work. But the political value of his popularity, or of that of the Allies in general, should not be exaggerated. It was the same in Bulgaria and the same in Rumania. The majority of the population was against Germany. But that did not mean anything when the governments were forced at the point of the gun to march with Berlin.

In the case of Turkey the chief danger lies in the fact that its leadership, as a whole, is extremely weak. There is no one who has inherited the political genius or the courage of Kemal Ataturk. It is with rather small people that Papen has to deal, and he knows it. For the moment, he continues to rely on flattery and money. But should there be a major disaster in Russia, his love songs would give way to a threatening roar.

The Road to Lublin

BY MAX MANDELLAUB

WHAT will happen to us now?" a Spanish refugee asked. He had served in the French army, and we met him on the day of the armistice somewhere on a road in France.

"Happen to us?" said my Austrian comrade; "we'll all die in Lublin."

"Lublin?"

"Don't you know that place in Poland on the Bistritz River where the Nazis are concentrating thousands of Jews for death?" The Austrian was a bald, fat little fellow with great spectacles on his nose. For months during the retreat he repeated constantly, half ironically and half tragically, "Why are we running in the wrong direction? We'll have to go all the way back for our final destination—Lublin."

News from France now confirms the prophetic words of the fat little Austrian. Thousands of refugees have been arrested, both in occupied and unoccupied France. During the last days of August twenty-five thousand were arrested and concentrated near Lyons. The Paris round-up gave Hitler thirty thousand victims. More than three hundred Jews committed suicide in a few days. Twelve thousand from the occupied zone and ten thousand from the unoccupied are said to have been deported already. They took a thousand from the concentration camp of Gurs, a thousand from Les Milles, seven hundred from Rivesaltes, and seven hundred from Le Vernet. For years these men have been under continual threat; directly under the control of the Nazi Armistice Commission, they have been held ready for the final tragedy—deportation to the east. There are more than a hundred thousand Spanish Loyalist refugees still in France who face the same fate.

We have watched with monstrous impassivity the dénouement of this drama. There have been some feeble protests, some brief announcements in the press—nothing more. Since the collapse of France everyone has known that there were still thousands of human beings who sooner or later would be victims of Hitler's sadism. Everyone has known that France could no longer offer protection. The most one could expect was isolated acts of solidarity from the French people.

When we read that some high officials of the Catholic church in France have made declarations in favor of the refugees, we must realize that this is not enough to save them. When we are told that 50 per cent of the refugees have found asylum in private homes, that French gendarmes have been dismissed for refusing to execute orders of arrest, or that public demonstrations have broken out spontaneously in many cities, we must doubt the effectiveness of such reactions. It is dangerous to emphasize them for fear they may create the impression that a solution can be found inside France and that we in this country need do nothing.

The French people have been psychologically and politically prepared for a long time to tolerate inhuman measures against the refugees. The gendarme who now receives from Hitler, through Laval, an order to arrest these helpless, miserable people is the same one who guarded the Spanish refugees in inhuman concentration camps in France after the Loyalist defeat, the same one who arrested thousands of victims of Hitler's terror on the day the war against Hitler broke out the same who arrested tens of thousands of Italian anti-fascists the very day that the common enemy of these anti-fascists and of France stabbed the republic in the back. The French people have been witnesses of this inhuman, cruel, and stupid policy. Why should they be surprised that these permanent, notorious "undesirables" are again arrested, this time by order of Laval? Hitler's political machine works punctually to eliminate all possible isolated reactions of a dominated, terrorized population against Laval's man-hunt. These men, "the scum of the earth," have been hunted from country to country, from city to city, from concentration camp to concentration camp. Some of them tried to escape, to cross the Swiss border or, if they were not Spaniards, the Spanish border. Neither Franco nor the federal police in Berne wanted them.

When the enemies of the Spanish democracy were in danger, various embassies in Madrid opened wide their doors to give refuge to the friends of Franco's rebellion. Many embassies rented whole blocks in order to be able to protect, under the cover of diplomatic immunity, the greatest possible number of the enemies of liberty in Spain. The Jews and the friends of democracy in France have found no open door in any embassy.

International law permitted thousands of soldiers—French, Polish, Senegalese, and Spahis—to find asylum for months, some of them until now, in neutral Switzerland. Thus more than fifty thousand men avoided becoming prisoners of the Nazis. These new prisoners of Hitler are civilian refugees, some political, some not, and for them there is no law of asylum. Franco's soldiers on the Pyrenees watch the mountains, ready to fire and to kill. Switzerland, the home of the International Red Cross, has been indifferent and terribly "neutral" toward refugees who are threatened by deportation and

Leaders and People

History will show Winston Churchill at his best on the day he flew over the Channel to propose to Paul Reynaud that Great Britain and France merge in a national union. In making this revolutionary proposal he assumed a responsibility that no other Prime Minister would have dared to risk. He allowed neither tradition nor constitutional considerations to stand in his way. He went to France without even summoning Parliament, knowing that if he should succeed in saving France and reducing the danger of a Hitler victory, an immense majority of the British people would support him.

Churchill's act stands as a symbol today. Now, even more than in 1940, what the British, the Americans, and all free men want is to win this war. The issue is one of life or death, and they do not care if traditions, prejudices, even laws go by the board. This puts in the hands of the leaders of the United Nations a tremendous power with a corresponding responsibility—a responsibility that can be honorably discharged only if they really are conducting a peoples' war for a peoples' victory.

death. The guard on the border around Geneva and the Jura has been reinforced. Many fugitives who entered in spite of this have been sent back.

Have we not our share of responsibility? What have we waited for so long? For miracles? For clemency—clemency from Hitler and his lackeys? For more than two years these unfortunates have implored us for visas. A bureaucracy without comprehension of the situation has prolonged the procedure with every increase of danger, often refused to grant a visa. A limited number only have succeeded in leaving France. Those who had no money or personal friends or relatives abroad seldom had even a chance to fill out an application. They waited for the day of their crucifixion. That day has come. Soldiers with fixed bayonets watch the newly established concentration camps; livestock cars are ready to deport them.

Is there really no way at this very last moment to save those who have not yet been deported? Could they not be given provisory visas and held at Ellis Island or some other place where they could be investigated? Could they not be allowed to find refuge for a few months in the numerous embassies still existing in France?

Of course a thousand imperative reasons will be invoked against this, and Hitler will once more have his prey. If these new slaves can still hate, they will not know against whom to turn the greater share of their hatred—the executioner or the friends who let them die.

"Political War"

"I urge you not to minimize the situation, not to let expense or usual duties influence your response. This is war."

—Edward Babcock, president of the National Council of Farmers Cooperatives, as quoted by Drew Pearson, October 1, 1942.

And this is the spirit that will win the war. But what war is Mr. Babcock talking about? Not, alas, the war against Hitler. Mr. Babcock's war is the one which has been conducted in Congress against the President's anti-inflation measure by one of the largest and most highly mechanized lobbies in history.

Like the Battle of Stalingrad, the Battle of Congress has swayed back and forth for days and weeks. As of October 1, the Russians are falling back, but the farm lobby has managed to advance American living costs by 4 per cent and the morning paper carries the rousing headline: "FARM BLOC LEADER CALLS IT VICTORY."

Inflation, Heil!

A Vote Against the Axis

IN FORCING the vote by which the Chamber of Deputies asked the Argentine government to break relations with the Axis, the Socialists and Radicals were well aware that nothing immediate would happen; Castillo has the solid backing of the Senate in his pro-Nazi policy. But the opposition deputies had two important objectives: First, they wanted to make the Chamber the symbol and perhaps the last trench of Argentine democratic resistance. Castillo may suppress one paper after another and order his police to charge on the crowds that shout "Down with Hitler" in the street, but for the moment he cannot easily dissolve Congress. Second, they wanted to force the Senate to accept the odium of vetoing this most popular act of the Chamber of Deputies.

The pro-Axis policy of the Castillo administration continues to have a most unfortunate effect on the rest of Latin America. Not only does Argentine neutrality make a mockery of inter-continental solidarity, but the greatest South American power has been converted into the headquarters for all the Nazi agents formerly active in Brazil, Colombia, and Central America.

National Unity in Rio

THEIR patriotic feelings aroused by the entrance of their country into war, and in response to an official appeal for national unity, several prominent Brazilian refugees living in Buenos Aires and Montevideo went to Rio to offer the government their services. Among them were Jorge Amado, the well-known writer, and Mayor Sisson, former general secretary of the Aliança Nacional Libertadora. All of them were promptly imprisoned on the famous island of Das Cobras. Two months earlier General Flores da Cunha, associate of Getulio Vargas before he became dictator and former governor of Rio Grande do Sul, met with the same reception.

Beat the Dunderheads

BY ROBERT BENDINER

IF YOU had a servant who went about the house muttering that the most dangerous enemies of this country were not Hitler and Mussolini but the President of the United States and that we compelled a peaceful Japan to make war on us, what would you do? If you are an average citizen the chances are you would get rid of her without a qualm. You might even go so far as to mention her to the FBI, just to be sure that she wasn't a paid agent or that she didn't translate her sentiments into action. Certainly you would not give her a letter of recommendation to help her carry on. What is more, you would probably feel virtuous and would go around for weeks telling your friends how shocked you were and how you told the creature off.

But suppose that instead of dusting off your furniture or cooking your meals, the servant is engaged in speaking for you in the Congress of the United States. What do you do then? You shrug your shoulders, you are not interested in politics. You vote a straight party ticket. Did anyone tell you that your Congressman said in the House of Representatives exactly what you fired your maid for saying? Yes, but that's campaign talk. You can't be expected to follow his every word in the Congressional Record. Anyway, what people said before Pearl Harbor is water over the dam. Lots of us were wrong then. So off you go to the polls in November and vote for men you would put out of your house if they talked at your table the way they talk every day on the floor of Congress.

Is the picture overdrawn? If you think so, just pick up a book called "The Illustrious Dunderheads," * edited by Rex Stout and published none too soon to be of service in the present campaign. Here is a compilation of choice remarks by Representatives and Senators on the foreign policy of the United States, some of them made before December 7, 1941, and some after that date. With an introduction by Frank Sullivan and cartoons by William Gropper, it looks offhand like one of those entertaining little volumes of boners designed to titillate your sense of superiority. It is nothing of the kind. It will entertain you only if you get a lift from "Mein Kampf" or the crafty and bitter lies of the copperhead press.

If voters will take the trouble to equip themselves with this hair-raiser before they go to the polls next month, they will soon see what I mean. How many Michigan voters, I wonder, know that Representative Hoffman had the effrontery to tell his colleagues nearly a month after Pearl Harbor that "all of us know that there is another war right here within our own government, carried on by an enemy more dangerous than either the one on the Atlantic or the one on the Pacific"? Or that, with a struggle for survival on our hands, he proposed that "perhaps nothing but a march on Washington will ever restore this government to the people"? If these were merely well-intentioned mistakes, then perhaps history has dealt too harshly with Benedict Arnold.

I wonder, too, how many Kansans recall the remark of their man Lambertson that "this hysteria about national defense is 'hooley,' and I am ready to stake my political future on that proposition." This is the same statesman who called Greece "an aggressor nation" and who, like his fellow-demagogues, lacked the courage to vote against the declaration of war even while he insisted that "we were maneuvered into it" by the Administration. Then there is Knutson of Minnesota, whose enthusiasm for the war must surely be tempered by his expressed preference for the Nazi system of government over the British; Rankin of Mississippi, who deplored our being harassed into war by "Wall Street and a little group of our international Jewish brethren"; Short of Missouri, who denounced England and France for declaring war on Germany "after being clearly forewarned by Colonel Lindbergh that it would be utterly impossible for them to compete with Germany's air force"; Brooks of Illinois, who found that the Axis had "chosen not to declare war upon us" but that the Administration wouldn't "let them get away with that"; and far too many others even without counting those who merely placed a misguided trust in three thousand miles of water.

It is a bitter irony that in a world struggle for freedoms which demand representative government the stock of Congress should have fallen so low. One might almost suspect sabotage. The irony is sharpened by the circumstance that a slothful electorate has left the defense of Congress to the very men who have done most to bring it into disrepute. It is they who have now appropriated the role of democracy's savior against the inroads of a dictatorial President (as you will read on every page of "The Dunderheads"). They are in a strategic position. Attack them, and you advertise to the world the antics of parliamentary government; yield to them, and they will wreck that government themselves.

There is only one answer to these gentlemen: beat them so badly in November that they will slink back into the obscurity that becomes them. "The Dunderheads" will help you perform that war-time duty.

I Worked for McCormick

BY GREER WILLIAMS

IN MY five years as a reporter for the Chicago Tribune I had an excellent opportunity to observe the inner workings of the institution which has labeled itself the "World's Greatest Newspaper" and which has indulged in so many reckless utterances since Pearl Harbor. Like many of my colleagues, I had no sympathy with the policies of Colonel Robert Rutherford McCormick, but I stayed on simply because, from the professional newspaperman's point of view, the Tribune is a good place to work. In the Middle West, at least, the prestige of working for the Tribune is still considerable, and if Colonel McCormick's paternalism at times almost suffocates one, his enterprise does afford a measure of security to its employees. Nevertheless, with the founding of Marshall Field's Chicago Sun many Tribune men found welcome release.

An important aspect of the Tribune story which has been neglected in the volume of well-deserved criticism recently directed at the McCormick institution is the relationship between the Colonel and his staff. It is natural to assume that McCormick is a dictator who personally wills all the crooked thinking that is manifest in the Tribune, but the truth is often otherwise. Those who study the paper solely on the basis of its content cannot know that over the years McCormick, like Hitler, has so isolated himself from his fellow-men that he now hears only what his Elite Guard think he wants to hear. A religious reader of his own paper, the Colonel bases many of his strong convictions on what he sees in it. And reporters, copy readers, and editors, with exaggerated deference to his feelings, fit the facts to meet his views whether ordered to do so or not. Thus the Colonel feels quite sincere when he boasts, "In discharging its fundamental responsibility as a newspaper the Tribune has no political, financial, or social tie-ups which compromise its freedom to report the truth."

Complete subservience to the boss's prejudices is shown in the treatment given any assignment from the Tribune Tower's twenty-fourth floor, or what is known as an "RRMC" assignment. For example, the RRMC assignment may ask a simple question, "How many WPA musicians are of military age?" The reporter, of course, will not make a straightforward answer. He will probably find that the WPA musicians' project is a haven for young Communists and pacifists. It took me six months to answer the RRMC question, "What is known of the relation between syphilis and unemployment?" I first tried writing a story giving the known facts, but this was not what was wanted. I was expected to prove that syphilis was more prevalent among Chicago relief clients than among the employed, which I finally did, after hounding four government agencies into making a joint survey.

The Colonel's whim is the reporter's hard work. Many assignments arise from the Colonel's drive to town in an armored car from his estate, Cantigny Farm, in Wheaton. The reporter may be asked to find the offender after the Colonel has jotted down the number of a speeding automobile or has spotted a hole in the pavement. One morning the Colonel's car almost ran down three or four stray dogs. As soon as he got to the office, he issued an edict: "There are too many stray dogs on the street." The next day the Tribune was campaigning against them.

On one occasion the Colonel advanced the notion that sap rises in trees because of the pumping action of wind in the branches. The story I wrote on the upward pull of sap by capillary action and vacuum created by evaporation on the leaf surfaces ignored the wind notion as scientifically ridiculous. So the Colonel dictated a note: "Our sap expert missed a trick. . . ." Since I had by that time quit the Tribune, someone else had to repeat the painful procedure of having a botanical authority laugh in his face, and then report to the Colonel in delicate terms that he was cockeyed.

I claim to have received the funniest RRMC assignment ever made: "Everyone should be interested to know how hard a lobster pinches. Crabs, clams, oysters. This information should be easy to get I suppose. RRMC." They may be still looking for it; I couldn't find it. The experts on crustaceans and mollusks laughed at me and asked, "Who cares?"

Occasionally McCormick gets an answer that he doesn't like but has to take. About five years ago a state policeman who was an ex-convict was accused of fixing a jury. Because it was embarrassing to the Democratic administration of the late Governor Henry Horner, the Tribune began raising a daily question: "How is it that the governor can appoint an ex-convict to the state police force?" The Governor had an assistant search his McCormick correspondence files and make a visit to the state penitentiary; he then wrote McCormick the answer. McCormick, it seems, had asked the Governor to make his chauffeur a state policeman without pay so that he could carry a gun. The Governor had replied, "I'm loath to do so," but had finally yielded to McCormick's nagging.

The chauffeur, Horner wrote McCormick, was also an ex-convict, "and that is how the Governor can appoint an ex-convict as state policeman." The Tribune pressed the matter no farther.

When Horner became governor in 1933, the Tribune, which had been friendly to him as probate judge of Cook County, suddenly turned against him. Horner went to the Colonel and asked if he didn't think him the same "honest Henry Horner" as of old. The Colonel said yes, he did, but that the Tribune would "ride roughshod" over anyone who supported the New Deal.

The Tribune, however, has not ridden roughshod over the pro-New Deal Boss Kelly, mayor of Chicago, from whom it has received many favors. One was the passage by the City Council five years ago of a year-round daylight-saving ordinance, which no one seemed to be pushing except the Tribune. The public was not impressed, and on the first opportunity voted to restrict daylight-saving time to the customary April-to-September period. Elimination of the one-hour normal time differential between New York and Chicago would have compelled the Chicago afternoon papers to go to press without the closing stock-market quotations. The Tribune is a morning paper.

Tribune men, while treated like gentlemen some of the time, are often dealt with in summary fashion and given servile tasks. An editor once assigned a reporter to investigate the economic and social status of the patrons of the private school his daughter was entering. When the Colonel went to the opera, he let the City Desk know, and a reporter was sent over to arrange a proper reception. I was once sent to the railroad station to see that the Colonel had no difficulty in meeting the train on which his wife was coming in.

The Colonel's conception of his high authority was well illustrated in 1935 when he removed Rhode Island's star from the large American flag hanging in the Tribune Tower lobby. He had just read the story of a Tribune reporter on the "dictatorship" of the Democratic Party set up in Rhode Island through the "packing" of the state Supreme Court. The Colonel suggested a page-one story on his action, but a lieutenant pointed out that mutilation of the flag was a jailing offense.

The big trouble with the Colonel, most people say, is that he has no humility and no humor. Only on rare occasions has he given any sign of possessing these qualities. Once when a Springfield reporter wrote that McCormick had come to town in his Rolls Royce and looked like Republican Presidential timber, the Colonel replied, "The Rolls Royce is a good car and will take a man almost any place except the White House." And when the "Tribune family" recently presented him with a framed facsimile of the Stanley Johnston story of the Lexington sinking, the Colonel wept and said, "I am a lonely man; you are all I've got." Recalling similar instances of tearfulness since the tidal wave of McCormick unpopularity started rolling last winter, the hard-hearted say the iron-willed Colonel is beginning to crack.

BOOKS and the ARTS

PRIMITIVE PAINTING

BY CLEMENT GREENBERG

PRIMITIVE" painting belongs to the Industrial Age. It emerged toward the close of the eighteenth century and defined itself as independent of tradition, whether that of sophisticated art or that of folk art. It was mainly an effort to find a new outlet for the plebeian "artistic energy" that was left without an object by the dying out of folk art in an urban civilization. This outlet could not be found in sophisticated art, because the persons who embodied such "energy" were too poor or too isolated to possess themselves of the culture that sophisticated art presupposes. All this was pointed out by a German scholar, Nicola Michailow, in a very important, almost epochal, article which appeared in the Zeitschrift für die Kunstgeschichte, Numbers 5 and 6, in 1935 (prompted partly, one may suppose, by the Nazis' solicitude for anything and everything that can be construed as "folk"). The practitioners of Laienmalerei (lay or unprofessional painting), as Michailow calls it, had to fill by their own independent efforts the vacuum left by the extinction of living folk art. It is to the lack of formal training and of almost every other advantage of a continuous tradition that their painting owes its "primitive" character. The self-taught painter, Michailow adds, is to be found mostly among the petty bourgeoisie, that much-maligned class, which more than any other has inherited the "primeval creative urge of the Volk." Yet, paradoxically, the first individuals sufficiently cut off from all pictorial traditions to paint in the primitive way were aristocrats in comparatively backward regions like North Germany. Thus Frederick William I, King of Prussia, was one of the first "primitive" painters of whom there is any record. It was only later on that the masses became traditionless enough to produce such painters.

Why did so much of this popular "creative urge" find its avenue in easel-painting? Michailow does not attempt to answer the question, although it is a crucial one. Answers offer themselves, however. First, there was a demand for portraits and wall pictures by the new middle class arising in provincial towns and villages, which could afford to spend modest amounts on such satisfactions and which at the same time was more or less out of touch with metropolitan culture. This would show that popular painting was in the beginning a move to supply a market as well as to satisfy a "creative" urge. Secondly, industrial methods first made possible the wide circulation of the materials for painting and of reproductions of academic art. The importance of this last is easily overlooked. Michailow and Jean Lipman, in her recent book, "American Primitive Painting,"* both tend to exaggerate by omission the non-derivative character of primitive and popular painting. Yet I feel sure that in most cases it was through acquaintance with reproductions that the purchaser came to want pictures and the amateur to want to paint them. Moreover, it is unthinkable that self-taught artists would have dared to paint, as they did so often, pure landscapes and still lifes, had not sophisticated art already provided them with examples. Consider only how long it was before sophisticated art arrived at the landscape and the still life.

Michailow and Mrs. Lipman also fail to touch on a very important distinction to be made in the corpus of work lumped together as "primitive" painting. There were professional "primitive" painters who made a living by their art, and there were and are amateur primitive painters who paint chiefly for their own satisfaction. The professionals were apt to be more responsive to the influence of contemporary academic painting (some of the portraits reproduced in Mrs. Lipman's book seem to derive their conception, if not their execution, from the fashionable painting of the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries—and it is not altogether a question of similarity in styles of dress); and there seems also to be a sort of craft continuity between the work of one professional painter and another: they had trade secrets in common and tried to meet the demands of a public taste. The amateurs, on the other hand, paint with less technical competence but with more daring and originality. Although no hard and fast line can be drawn between the two groups, it would seem that only persons whose painting had nothing to do with money dared to produce work of such a frankly primitive character as is seen today in the pictures of self-taught artists like Hershfield and Vivin. Such painters are rightly called primitives, but it is the work of professionals, of popular painters—including lady watercolorists—not of amateurs and primitives, that largely makes up the American tradition of "primitive" painting with which Mrs. Lipman's book deals; and a tradition it was, so much so that it almost escapes Michailow's definition of primitive painting and requires one of its own.

Elsewhere in his article Michailow observes that Laienmalerei has flourished most splendidly in those outlying countries of Western civilization over which metropolitan culture was comparatively thinly spread—Germany, the Balkans, and North America. One might add that if it was the absence of tradition that was all-important, then our country was ideally situated to produce primitive art; for here we had in the beginning almost no tradition at all of pictorial or decorative folk art among white people. Those who settled our country as its "folk" were iconoclastic Protestants, and whatever art they maintained was until the nineteenth century dependent on transfusions from Europe. Unlike the German or Bulgarian primitive painter, the American suffered from neither the memory nor the competition of an anterior indigenous tradition. He could begin painting as an independent and original entrepreneur, untrammelled by the tariffs, patents, and prescriptions of the past. For this reason, perhaps, the United States produced the most uniquely native and substantial body of popular painting to be seen before the twentieth century, * Oxford University Press. $5.

Mrs. Lipman's conscientious and coolly written text is an important if brief contribution to the subject. It presents the fact of a school, a trade, and a pastime of popular painting which flourished vigorously in New England and the Middle Atlantic states from the last quarter of the eighteenth century until about 1875. Its practitioners were itinerant "limners" or portraitists, scene and flower painters, decorators, lady water-colorists, and pure and simple amateurs. Mrs. Lipman analyzes their art—stressing its "abstract" quality—describes their methods of work, and quotes extensively from the recipes and hints by which the somewhat quaint tricks of this trade were circulated. (For many amateurs, at least, this painting seems to have been a part of the typically American business of practical self-improvement.) American popular painting was an art characterized by its insistence upon rhythmic design and balance, by comparatively pure color—although not so frank by far as in the work of contemporary primitives, and much more receptive to the half-tones of academic painting—and by strong, unselfconscious emotion translated in both literary and painters' terms. The artist makes up for a certain repetitiveness by his quiet, steady fervor and his appetite for his work. His painting goes back to the first assumptions of pictorial art and reexamines them in all their original freshness, reminding one again of the excitement there is in simply discovering that it is possible to depict three-dimensional things on a flat surface. But unlike children's art, this painting is not simple-minded; it achieves subtleties by means that seem only in themselves simple and crude. Its best common quality, in fact, is this ambiguity created by the simple thing itself and the richness of its effect.

There are, however, demands which this art cannot ordinarily meet. The reliance upon formulas and ready-made elements is often hardly compensated for by the freshness of invention elsewhere. The tight design and the insistent rhythms, to which the naive artist is always prone to surrender himself, are a liability as well as an asset, for they tend to overcome everything else and destroy dramatic movement; and it is only by its very intensity that even some of the best of this popular painting can retrieve itself from decoration. Nor did many of the self-taught artists who worked in oil take full advantage of their medium; they might just as well have painted in tempera so far as the final result is concerned; and perhaps, given their liking for firm contours, flat surfaces, and large areas of uniform color, they would actually have found tempera a more congenial medium. But on the other hand, one of the real charms of their art is precisely the result of their clumsiness with such a flexible medium as oil. Having made these reservations, I find it possible to go on to praise this painting seriously and without condescension, agreeing with Mrs. Lipman that more than one of these popular artists "arrived at a power and originality and beauty which were not surpassed by the greatest of the academic American painters." This was true indeed of such painters as Joseph Pickett, Joseph H. Headley (who did townscapes around Troy, New York, between 1840 and 1860), and the anonymous master of the Runaway Horse (circa 1850), and several others who painted portraits and still lifes before the Civil War. In the cases of Headley and the master of the Runaway, popular painting approaches sophisticated art in its fluency, while in Pickett's case it is wholly primitive and attains a kind of force only possible to primitive art. But significantly enough, Pickett really falls outside this period—his dates are from 1848 to 1918—and his status as a picture painter was strictly amateur.

The American popular painting trade was unable to survive the competition of photography and the cheap reproduction. According to Mrs. Lipman, it can be considered to have died in the eighteen-seventies. Yet it lingered on in some places. It seems to me that there was a pictorial notion in the design and draftsmanship of some of the Currier and Ives prints which continued as well as superseded popular art. What was lost—and as it seems now, irrevocably—was a precious tact in the use of color.

The illustrations in Mrs. Lipman's book do not sacrifice aesthetic merit to documentary interest. Those in black and white are excellent; the color plates, however, are rather poor, and perhaps less well chosen—four of them are detachable from the book. But Mrs. Lipman's book is valuable enough without them.

The Appeal to Morals

A TIME FOR GREATNESS. By Herbert Agar. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

THOMAS PAINE did not hesitate to write of "times that try men's souls"; so Herbert Agar is in the true succession of our pamphleteers when he demands of us that we meet the crucial days in which we live with high resolve and purged souls. His affirmation of the reality of spiritual values and his appeal to the conscience are reminiscent of the many powerful voices in our history which have couched their appeals in the vocabulary of our evangelical tradition. Bryan, Theodore Roosevelt, Beveridge, and Wilson used this vocabulary in the last generation. In our own day it is not the fashion, but Herbert Agar knows how to use it eloquently. In this book of essays, almost sermons, on America's duty to the world he once again demonstrates the vitality of the moral appeal. He has always seen the present conflict as a moral crisis and warned of its implications in words burning with the fervor of a crusader. This book defines the essential issue between democracy and Nazism as an ethical one, and does so with clarity and skill.

Mr. Agar's preoccupation with the moral issue, however, results in both distinction and limitation. It makes him master of a style that is almost Lincolnesque in its scriptural overtones; yet it also makes him curiously insensitive to the genius of American radicalism. He is an exponent of what he calls "creative conservatism." Basically, he interprets the present cataclysm not as the birth pangs of a new human society but as a struggle between savages who are out to destroy our traditions and civilized men determined to preserve them. Thus in one place he declares, "The savages who assail us may teach us to reexamine our faith, to review the greatness of our tradition, to remember that we have not done it justice"; and in another, "There is no economic reason, no Marxian necessity, which explains why American labor relations had to be poisoned for decades. They were poisoned because American business men did not live up to the American idea, and because their repressive conduct bred similar excesses, madnnesses, and revenges on the part of labor." Such statements ignore the instrumentalism with which native American radicalism checks the easy generalizations of both religious and social absolutists. They overlook the inherent anti-social elements in human nature itself and the influence of economic and other environmental stimuli in determining whether the social or the unsocial instincts shall predominate in group conduct. Agar falls into the error of a prophet who hopes the world will be saved by his preaching and so does not go on to probe the nature of man and society in order to find a way to make environment an active ally of the better instincts of men. He contributes no radical criticism of our social and economic order.

He feels the Negro's inequality deeply and writes nobly of the need for his improvement. Here he comes closer than in any other part of his book to the radical premise: "Where there are widespread want, considerable illiteracy, and much poor health, it seems natural for man to seize on any chance to oppress or degrade his less fortunate neighbor. . . . If we fail to offer to all our citizens equality in 'recreation for the spirit,' it is not reasonable to blame those who have been denied because their spirits are sometimes warped." Exactly. But to recognize so plain a fact is a critique of our whole bungling effort to relate man and society in such a way as to release the best in the individual and to create the maximum benefits for all. An absolutism that scorns plans for economic equalities as concessions to materialism is based upon a dualism of the "carnal flesh" and the "spirit" which is tenable neither in philosophy nor in sociology. The love of liberty is more than a tradition; it is a creative impulse moving within events to mold things as well as ideas into instruments of human happiness.

Ours is indeed a "time for greatness," greatness of moral passion, as Agar so movingly pleads, but greatness also of brain and muscle to plan and build a machinery for living that will give all men an equal chance in life.

Jane vs. Jane!

JANE'S FIGHTING SHIPS, 1941. Edited by Francis E. McMurtrie. The Macmillan Company. $19.

JANE'S ALL THE WORLD'S AIRCRAFT, 1941. Compiled and Edited by Leonard Bridgman. The Macmillan Company. $19.

IN THE War Loss section of the latest edition of "Jane's Fighting Ships" the sinking of the Bismarck is chronicled in two terse lines: "Torpedoed by H.M.S. Dorsetshire after being reduced to a sinking condition by the gunfire of H.M.S. King George V and Rodney, May 27, 1941." This account seems to do something less than justice to the part played by aircraft in the sinking of Hitler's mightiest battleship, but the balance is redressed by "Jane's All the World's Aircraft," which in the course of a rather fuller report of the event states:

It was another occasion on which air reconnaissance and air torpedoes made all the difference, though the actual killing was done, as it usually must be done, by the guns and heavy torpedoes of the ships. When the Bismarck seemed likely to escape, she was found by a Coastal Command "Catalina" and then was repeatedly attacked by "Swordfish" from both carriers. Torpedoes so damaged the rudders and screws of the enemy that ships of the home fleet were able to overhaul and sink her.

Even this report will be considered by some airmen to overemphasize the role of the fleet, for, the story goes, pilots of the fleet air arm were all ready to dive in and administer the coup de grâce when they were expressly ordered by the admiral in command to keep off and leave that honor to the naval gunners.

As this episode illustrates, experts on both sides of the "ships-versus-planes" controversy will find endless material in these two great yearbooks. Speaking as a complete amateur, my own conclusion is that air power has changed the nature of naval warfare to an extent that the tradition-bound British and American navies have yet to recognize. This does not mean that warships of all kinds are necessarily condemned to the fate of the dodo, but it does seem probable that the huge battlewagons have had their day unless new ways of protecting them from air assault are discovered. The following table compiled from the War Loss section of "Fighting Ships" tells a story confirmed, since this book went to press, by the battles of the Coral Sea and Midway, in which the opposing surface craft never came within sight of each other.

BRITISH NAVAL LOSSES IN WORLD WAR II

Class	Air action	Subma- rines	Sunk by		Miscell. and doubtful
			Surface craft
5 Battleships ..	2 .....	2 .....	1
4 Carriers .....	1 .....	2 .....	1
18 Cruisers .....	8 .....	4 .....	1		5*
71 Destroyers ..	23 .....	4 .....	12		32*

* Most of the ships listed in this column are reported simply as "sunk" or "torpedoed"; so that it probably includes many victims of planes and submarines.

This is the first year that the two Janes have been published in America, although they have long been widely known and used here. "Fighting Ships," the publishers can claim, is regarded as essential chartroom equipment by every navy in the world, and its younger relative is no less useful to fliers. Both volumes are indispensable items for every newspaper library.

The space of a review does not permit even the baldest summary of their contents. "Fighting Ships" is a complete guide to the world's navies—so complete that it even takes note of the one thirty-seven-ton gasoline-powered patrol boat which constitutes the Nicaraguan fleet. The illustrations are profuse and are selected for their practical value. There are photographs of most first-class vessels and of typical representatives of other classes, diagrams and sections showing general construction and arrangement of fire-power, and silhouettes of individual ships and types to assist quick recognition of friend or foe.

Jane's "Aircraft" is no less complete but is organized on a different plan. Its first, or historical, section provides a detailed description of the flying services of all nations and includes a long review of the achievements of the R. A. F. and the British Fleet Air Arm in the second year of the war.

This covers the concluding stages of the Battle of Britain and the story of the night blitz during the winter of 1940-41, taking us on to the beginnings of the British offensive over Germany. We learn why this offensive was so long in coming and why it has not yet reached maximum effectiveness. Britain started the war with a small air force still in the early stages of expansion. The demand on its manufacturers for planes of all types to carry on the many different missions which devolved on the R. A. F. was terrific. The first task was to build up fighter strength, and concentration on this type proved fortunate, for, even so, reserves were dangerously depleted before the day in mid-September, 1940, when Göring was forced to call off his daylight raiders.

Meanwhile only medium bombers in comparatively small numbers were available for offensive operations, which in consequence were seldom more than nuisance raids. This year giant four-motored bombers are for the first time being turned out in quantity. Jane gives some particulars on three of these monsters—the Halifaxes, Stirlings, and Manchesteres—but notes that no details are available for publication on the latest and mightiest—the Avro Lancaster.

Not all of Jane's "Aircraft" is devoted to military aviation. Part B reviews worldwide developments in civil aviation in a way that suggests the tremendous scope for air travel and transport after the war. Parts C and D are an encyclopedia of modern aeroplanes and aero-engines of all nations, civil and military, with as many details as war-time censorships permit. It is an impressive record of the degree to which man has conquered the air since the Wright brothers first took wings, and one that ought to give pause to blue-water strategists who think they can discern limits to that conquest.

Blackmur as Poet

THE SECOND WORLD. By R. P. Blackmur. The Cum-mington Press: Cummington, Massachusetts. $2.50.

THERE are, it seems to me, two kinds of modern poets—those who want to write poetry and those who do. Those who want to write poetry are forced, depending upon the motivation or intensity of their desire, to seek substitutes, stage effects, claptrap, to simulate the thunders and subtleties of the true poet. A poet cannot even for a moment rely on his political angle to elevate his verse. Nor can he let his "regionalism" carry his work, even partially. And playing up to the fashionable expectations of the day, whether in rhetoric or liberalism, will not hide a failure in performance or perception. If the poet has not achieved the state of perfect rapport with true poetic experience and cannot get the body of a deed into the actual clothes of a poem, nothing will help him, neither the White Cliffs of Dover, the Battle of Bunker Hill, nor the dust which is but plain dust in the eyes.

R. P. Blackmur belongs with those who do write poetry. This new volume, his second, is slender compared with "From Jordan's Delight," published in 1937, but it shows a substantial advance in technique and content if not in lyricism. Nowhere is there evidence that the poet has had to call on sleight-of-hand for insight. Nor has he fallen into

MYTHOLOGY

By Edith Hamilton

"In a prose at once edged and colorful she has thrown the whole of even familiar Greek and Norse mythology into a fresh and luminous context. She has distilled into incidental observations the whole meaning of mythology itself to the modern scholar and man of letters. Though there is hardly a footnote, every page is a condensation of literary and anthropological learning.

"MYTHOLOGY is more than a guide book of gods and goddesses, heroes and heroines of the Greek and Norse world. It is a wise discourse on mythology itself, and shows what can happen when love and erudition animate a gifted writer," continues Mr. Edman.

"This beautiful book, retelling the old tales, has a bright and shining quality that only the imagination and understanding of the author of THE GREEK WAY and THE ROMAN WAY could give it."—Harper's. Illustrated by Steele Savage. $3.50 the other extreme of writing in a vacuum or trying to row a paper boat on the surrealist stream of fiery muddiness. Rather the poems in this book are nakedly of and about the human spirit, seriously concerned with the state of the individual caught in the enormous trap of a universe of things and theories.

It isn't easy to write poetry of a high metaphysical order. Blackmur avoids rhetorical bombast, occult mystification, over-modernized trimmings. In the longest and best poem in the book, Before Sentence Is Passed, the individual is presented as the accused prisoner in the courtroom of the world, and the speech of defense—and accusation—is the entire poem. It is one of the keen pleasures of this poem that the poet does not resort to the accoutrements of up-to-dateness to prop a failure of spiritual integrity. Yet the eloquence of the prisoner's despair is shrewdly balanced by the everyday quality of the poem's idiom.

As to "influence," the border line at which the modern mediocrities pretend to write poems, I find it an achievement in itself that Blackmur has refused to work by the poetic headlights of the last five years. For it was during this time that the reputations of Auden and Spender shone their brightest, with the additional luminaries, Dylan Thomas and George Barker, not to mention Delmore Schwartz on the American side, helping in their own way to make the poetic scene brighter. Blackmur's tie with the academic school—Tate, Ransom, and others—is more evident, but even there he emerges as himself rather than as a reflection. To go into one technical example of how Blackmur avoids the usual sin of serious parody and transcends his "influence," I quote from Allen Tate's excellent poem The Wolves:

There are wolves in the next room waiting
 With heads bent low, thrust out, breathing
 At nothing in the dark; . . .

When Blackmur writes,

There is disorder, like heavy breathing in the next room, Like people making way when no one comes.

we have a new creation out of the "waiting," the "breathing," and the "zerness" (no one, nothing); the natural disorder of all things is brought to comprehensible terms of sheer insight.

I have spent time on the long poem because it is practically half of the book. There are eight other poems, more lyrical perhaps than this one but all of a high order. Some of the lyrics are polished to the point of hardness, as the fine Missa Vocis, and the short title poem is memorable and apt. The fault of Blackmur is his deadly seriousness unlightened by even the grim humor of irony, a lack of playfulness, an overearnestness which results at times in such rawness as "Ambassador plenipotentiary, / he says, to bargain fleas for lice"—a combination of words only a humorous poem could carry off with equanimity. Another fault of this volume is its slowness, a little thin for five years' work, the restraint—if it is that—a bit overdone. But considering its general excellence, perhaps I am carping. Definitely, Mr. Blackmur is writing some of the most technically perfect poems of today.

A word about the format: "The Second World" is exquisitely done—neatly bound, hand-set by Katharine Frazier, and hand-printed on, shall I say, pre-war quality paper.

Post-War Economics

AGENDA FOR A POST-WAR WORLD. By J. B. Condliffe. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

PROBLEMS OF POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION. Edited by Henry P. Jordan. American Council on Public Affairs. $3.25.

FEDERALISM AND FREEDOM. By Sir George Young. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

J. B. CONDLIFFE has tucked the basis for a good peace into "Agenda for the Post-War World." Lucid, forceful, and not over-ambitious or visionary, it deals with immediate realities in a satisfactorily hard-headed fashion. Its essence can be conveyed in a phrase—a phrase that needs to be repeated daily until the end of the war: Peace begins at home. It is clear to Mr. Condliffe, and perforce clear to his readers, that international policies, whether short-range or long-range, can be enforced only by supra-national institutions. Effective supra-national institutions can in turn be established soundly only to the extent that the power to act in specific fields—rather than general power—is ceded by national sovereignties. It is necessary to delegate specific powers to supra-national institutions to gain specific ends, and the war-time United Command can be considered the first such delegation; talk of a general delegation of power is merely a kind of intellectual game, and unnecessarily abstract.

The nations of the world, always assuming our total victory, will perforce diminish their own national sovereignty exactly in the measure that the United States diminishes its own. This is just political horse sense, both because of memories of 1919 and because of pure power calculations. But we are not asked to diminish our national sovereignty for the sake of a vague internationalism; we are asked to conceive and to implement international policies. Our government is one of de jure regional representation, modified by de facto pressure-group representation. To achieve a national policy we shuffle obliquely through expedients and compromise, with the outcome often left to the baleful accidents of committee seniority. It is this government which is to have the ultimate and effective responsibility for making peace.

There can be no effective international settlement without the abatement of the intensive claims of pressure groups—even of the claims of progressive groups which we have hitherto approved. Mr. Condliffe notes that a great part of the economic war which has been waged for the past twenty-five years springs from motives of social welfare directed toward improving national or group standards of living. "Social security and employment were not safeguarded after the last war by breaking up the world market into a series of protected national markets," since tariffs and immigration laws and crop subsidies could not remove the causes of maladjustment in the national economic systems, but instead sheltered them. "Stability which leads to stagnation gives no security." It is our dreary habit to freeze things when trouble brews, as if there were some special beatitude in the status quo. We do this in the name of security; but every freezing order imperils the mobility of capital and labor and engenders a conflict with advancing technology; and, worse, every such gain in security, if it is a gain, is made at a very real sacrifice of freedom.

The increased mobility of capital and labor in a diminished world is one of the keys to the situation. Legislation pressed for by labor unions unfortunately all too often decreases the mobility of labor. And after the war the large proportion of savings that will be invested in government bonds will tend perilously to immobilize capital. On one point Mr. Condliffe is weak: he envisions a large-scale government program of public works as a protection against depression. Public works are indeed a sort of stop-gap, but since they are not means of production, they are much less desirable than other forms of new investment.

As a footnote to Mr. Condliffe's views there is small prospect of the present Congress assisting in abating the claims of pressure groups; and that is why, in spite of the wails of the Klocks and the Sokolskys, the President must intervene to the extent that his time permits in every possible primary and election in which a Congressional seat is at stake; only thus is there a faint hope of obtaining legislators capable of at least a national, not to mention a global, view.

I have been dwelling on Mr. Condliffe's general views, but I have by no means done justice to the brilliance of his detailed arguments. Avoiding the sophistical traps of a purely historical approach, he nevertheless makes the simple point that peace treaties have never failed for lack of expert advice. Actually, Versailles failed because of the unwillingness of trading nations to adapt their economies to international necessities. A simple statement, that, but loaded. Think of what it means in terms of the wheat farmer or the shoe worker; think of what it would mean to work toward the large welfare goal of allowing goods to be produced wherever in the world they could be produced best and cheapest, without regard to political barriers and pressures!

Mr. Condliffe then explains in terms that might even make an impression on Henry Luce why no enduring peace of domination is possible. A period of United Nations domination might usefully become an interval in which supra-national institutions might be founded. Mr. Condliffe does not propose to act the benevolent fool: an equal voice in international affairs will not immediately be lavished upon the Axis nations. Upon the cessation of hostilities we must use our power for certain obvious ends; but the very process of pursuing these ends offers the opportunities of erecting sound and genuine supra-national institutions.

This is where we run into the problem of cleaning house at home. The great danger is that we shall try to cure troubles by treating symptoms, with different experts called in for each symptom. A dreary forecast of the result is to be had in the symposium edited by Henry P. Jordan. Each of his experts is here to be seen patently grinding his own ax. What could one expect from an expert on the gold standard but a plea for its resurrection? The present expert, George S. Hirschland, has rationalized his view of world affairs to the extent that he can commit a sentence such as this to paper: "We have seen the most vicious economic nationalism and totalitarianism growing out of foreign-exchange control." Specialists invariably develop monomanias. The only contribution of real value is the article by the late Donald W. McConnell on Latin American trade. He sees that no nation, in a truly pacific world, will have the right to insist on the export, or even the financing, of monocultural surpluses. Stop-gap loans, such as those we are now making to South America, are merely storing trouble for the future. The only genuine solution to the economic problems of South America—and indeed of Asia and Africa and Eastern Europe too—is the gradual industrialization of these countries. The real meaning of an agricultural surplus is that a nation has advanced its production potential to the point at which it can afford to draw labor and resources off into industry; which means an advance in living standards.

True, in the short run this policy will curtail our export market. But as McConnell says, "our trade will not suffer in the end. For if the economic history of the last hundred years has proved nothing else, it has shown that mutual industrialization increases trade among the countries involved rather than otherwise." Latin America will ask where the capital is to come from, wanting none of dollar diplomacy. Modern governmental practices are amply able to marshal capital, which is as much labor and material as money; it is only the old-fashioned banking capital which is not presently available. Given a vigorous internal mobilization of resources, any South American nation can work wonders for itself with only technical assistance from the outside. And this, by abating the pressure of surplus politics, would be a very real contribution to the peace.

In this field we have done nothing. As I write, a report comes from Puerto Rico concerning "the catastrophic economic situation there," in which 40 per cent of employable labor is unemployed. The eyes of the world are on the United States. If we can accomplish so little in one of our own dependencies, how shall we claim the trust and confidence of undeveloped nations anywhere? No final solution of the Puerto Rican problem can come until the island's standard of living is raised approximately to the level of ours. That means a vast job in education and technical training, as well as industrialization and the cessation of monoculture. And what is true of Puerto Rico is true of the world.

Mr. Condliffe hardly thinks it worth while to name and describe the needed supra-national institutions; everyone knows pretty well what they should be, and the naming and describing of them has become a sort of game of pushing abstractions about. "The acid test of all such proposals," he writes, "is their application, not to the little and weak countries, but to the great and powerful." And that means that in the end the United States will determine by its own actions what degree of international cooperation will be possible. "The alternative to international action is the resumption of the struggle for power."

In contrast to the institutional approach of Mr. Condliffe, we have the giddy constitutional approach of Sir George Young in "Federalism and Freedom." Sir George is a brilliant disputer, trained in the best British tradition. His polemics are overwhelming, momentarily. But his abstract constitutional approach—which incidentally advocates a United States of Europe as both the necessary and the only feasible form of federalism—is like playing with blocks: what do you do when you have put up your edifice? Why you knock it down and begin all over again.

There Is So a Santa!

Dear Sirs: Fearing that some of your young readers may have been upset by Keith Hutchison's article There Ain't No Santa in The Nation of September 19, I have endeavored to reassure them in the following letter.

No, Virginia, Keith Hutchison is wrong and the New York Sun is still right. There is so a Santa! If you have given the proper attention to your arithmetic homework, Virginia, you should not find it too hard to see that he has not disposed of Santa by the mere process of subtraction.

Let us reconsider the case of Keith Hutchison's friend, Mr. X, whose tax ten his 1941 income amounted to $100,000. When at the end of last year Mr. X liquidated a lot of his investments and put the proceeds into tax-exempt bonds, resulting in a reduction of his 1942 tax bill to only $10,000, what Mr. X really accomplished by his substitution of investments was a reduction of his income to a fraction of what it had been formerly. Mr. X must be an incredibly ridiculous investor to have made such a change in his investments at the end of 1941 after his investment adviser had told him, as he must have, that high-grade bonds weakened very badly during the progress of World War I, whereas equities pursued an opposite trend during that time.

At any rate, Mr. X could not permanently retain the $90,000 refund which he would get if the Ruml plan were adopted. An investor who can reduce his tax bill by $90,000 by switching his holdings into tax-exempt bonds must be a very rich man. We cannot live forever, Virginia, and death is surely as certain as taxes. When Mr. X dies, if his net estate is only $1,000,000, and apparently it must be very much in excess of that, at least one-third of that $90,000 refund will find its way back to Uncle Sam's Treasury even if the rates of the 1941 federal estate tax should not be increased. If the net estate of Mr. X exceeds $4,000,000, then one-half of that refund will go back to the treasury by way of the federal estate tax at the 1941 rate.

But even were this not so, it would be worth all the refunds to men like Mr. X if all the working people in America could be relieved from the worry of being a year behind in their income taxes. That, Virginia, could never be measured in cash terms.

Our soldiers are not earning in the army what they formerly earned in private life, but they have to pay their taxes on what they earned last year, and they must also worry about taking care of the loved ones whom they left behind them. Having considered the case of Keith Hutchison's Mr. X, let us now consider the case of Mr. Y. His 1941 tax bill was $1,000. He will be drafted soon, along with hundreds of thousands of other married men, and may be in the army shortly after Christmas. His 1942 tax bill, at increased rates, will be much more than $1,000. His army pay will not enable him to keep his life insurance in force, much less relieve him from worry about how his wife and child will meet the constantly increasing cost of living. He has not completed paying the tax on his 1941 income, and next year while he is learning to shoot and drive a tank he will be considerably worried about paying his 1942 tax bill.

Buck Private Y will need Santa very much, and so will his buddies. But do not be alarmed when someone tells you that there is no Santa. The hearts of the American people will not permit them to forget Private Y and his buddies.

SEYMOUR J. WILNER

New York, September 29

Mr. X and Private Y

Dear Sirs: Mr. Wilner ought to know that taxpayers in the highest brackets must earn more than 10 per cent on equities in order to get a return after taxation equal to that obtainable from tax-exempt bonds. So that Mr. X may very well have increased his net income by reducing his gross income and is by no means a ridiculous investor. Nor, at the moment, does it look as if he were weakening his capital position by the change. It is true that high-grade bonds slumped badly during the last war, but this time, both here and in England, they have held up extremely well. As for the Treasury finally catching up with Mr. X after his death, even on Mr. Wilner's own showing, his estate will only be liable for part of that $90,000 refund, assuming it is still intact. But if Mr. X celebrates the enactment of the Ruml plan by a spell of riotous living and thus dissipates his refund, the Treasury will be out of luck except for whatever it receives from additional liquor taxes.

Now to turn to the case of Buck Private Y. Sudden changes in income have always created hardships, and the Treasury has always been willing to make a deal with the honestly harassed taxpayer. But, as Mr. Wilner was no doubt taught at law school, hard cases make bad law, and relief for men in the position of Buck Private Y should not be made an excuse for easing the load on Mr. X's broad shoulders. Nevertheless, I am prepared to agree that the present situation does call for special consideration—beyond that proposed by the current tax bill—for men joining the forces at a great sacrifice of income. This, I think, could be accomplished simply and fairly by forgiving such men taxes on their earned income for the six months prior to their joining up.

What Did Cripps Promise?

Dear Sirs: Louis Fischer has written in The Nation (September 19), "Cripps failed because he promised India a responsible government at the beginning of his negotiations and then withdrew that promise." When confronted with the charge, "Cripps made no . . . denial." "Something had happened behind the scenes."

Sir Stafford has certainly met the assertion with a vigorous and forthright denial. On April 11, the date of the exchange of letters on which Mr. Fischer places such store, Sir Stafford said of the demand that the constitution might now be changed, "In this respect I would point out that you made this suggestion for the first time last night, nearly three weeks after you received the first proposals, and I would further remark that every other representative with whom I have discussed this view has accepted the practical impossibility of any such legislative change in the middle of a war and at such a moment as the present" (italics mine).

Upon his arrival on March 23 and again on March 25 and 30 Cripps had reiterated the principle that "no real, major, fundamental changes can be made in the War Cabinet's conclusions."

Mr. Fischer accuses the British government of sabotaging negotiations that might have been successful "if Sir Stafford Cripps had been able to stick to his promise." Speaking in the House of Commons on September 12 about the scheme which he brought with him to India and which he maintains was never subject to any fundamental alterations in the course of the discussions, Sir Stafford said, "The Congress Working Committee had passed a resolution accepting the proposals. Mr. Gandhi intervened, and the resolution was subsequently reversed" (italics mine).

In his farewell broadcast he complained, "Criticism has been showered on the scheme from all sides; parties and individuals vied with one another in competition to discover the greatest number of defects. . . . Had the Congress leaders felt themselves able to join hands with other leaders who were willing, then indeed a great work ought to have been accomplished." At Karachi he said that the Indian National Congress Party "wanted all or nothing—they couldn't have all, so they got nothing."

MARVIN B. GELBER
Toronto, Ont., September 25

Dear Sirs: When a person undertakes to correct a statement in a printed article he should be accurate himself. Mr. Gelber says that Cripps has met "with a most vigorous and forthright denial" the charge which I made in my Nation articles that he offered India an immediate national government and then withdrew his promise. Mr. Gelber thereupon quotes the alleged Cripps denial: "In this respect I would point out that you made this suggestion for the first time last night." But if you will reexamine Sir Stafford's letter of April 11 from which Mr. Gelber takes this quotation you will find that the denial refers not to my charge of a promise made and withdrawn but, as Cripps puts it, to Azad's suggestion "that the constitution might now be changed." As Cripps said in his New Delhi interview on March 29 (see The Nation of September 26), a Cabinet government could be introduced without changing the constitution. "A good deal could be done by changing the conventions or adopting new ones," Cripps said.

Mr. Gelber says, secondly, that Cripps reiterated the principle that "no real, major, fundamental changes can be made in the War Cabinet's conclusions." That is beside the point. We are not the judges of whether Cripps's offer of a national government constituted such a change or not. The fact is that he made the offer.

Finally Mr. Gelber accepts Cripps's allegation, made in the House of Commons on September 12, that "the Congress Working Committee had passed a resolution accepting the proposals. Mr. Gandhi intervened and the resolution was subsequently reversed." Mr. Rajagopalachari, who was then a member of the Working Committee and is probably the only one of the members not under arrest now, has vigorously denied this assertion by Cripps (see the New York Times of September 15). If Sir Stafford wishes us to believe this he will have to produce the resolution.

I would like also to make a very brief reference to the letter which you printed in your issue of September 26 from W. T. Stace. Having "worked for twenty years as a British civil servant in Ceylon," Mr. Stace inevitably repeats the obsolete British argument of Indian disunity. I take vigorous exception, however, to his statement that "Congress demands that it be a single government of a united India." Where did he get that? Congress does not demand that it rule India. Mr. Gandhi said to me, as he has said in writing, and as Nehru and others have said, that if the British surrender political power, "a provisional coalition government consisting of the princes, the Moslems, and Congress will be formed." The Indian situation is bad enough without the injection of unfounded statements.

Ambassador Hayes Denies

Dear Sirs: The article in your issue of August 8 entitled A New Plan for Spain has just come to the attention of Ambassador Hayes in Madrid. He requests me to deny for him quite categorically the allegation that he is, or at any time has been, a party to any plan for establishing a new Spanish provisional government or for restoring the monarchy in Spain.

His speech at Barcelona on July 30, which you describe as "amazing," dealt almost wholly with American war preparations and with the firm determination of the United States, in conjunction with its allies, to fight the present war through to a victorious conclusion in support of the fundamental principles enunciated in the Atlantic Charter.

The Shape of Things

STREET FIGHTING IS STILL CONTINUING IN Stalingrad despite the Berlin radio announcement that assault tactics were to be abandoned and that the city was to be destroyed by heavy guns and bombers. But the intensity of the struggle seems to have diminished, and the latest German thrusts may be designed to cover the construction of siege lines. Such lines, however, would offer very inadequate winter quarters, and unless the long-distance pounding of Stalingrad succeeds where direct assault failed—a most unlikely contingency—a Nazi retreat westward to less exposed positions appears inevitable. There are some indications that the German High Command may be hoping to stabilize the Volga front sufficiently to enable troops to be diverted to the Caucasus. The capture of the Grozny oil fields would not only be an important success materially but could be presented to the German people as compensation for the failure to take Stalingrad. However, Timoshenko's relief army, which has been exerting strong pressure north-west of Stalingrad, is likely to inhibit troop transfers on a large scale. Meanwhile, it is not enough to cheer Russian stubbornness. Portents of German difficulties in the east ought to be a signal for stronger action in the west. And in this connection the striking success of the American heavy bombers over Lille is encouraging. The raid proved emphatically that these machines combine tremendous offensive power with the ability not merely to resist enemy fighters but to destroy them in wholesale lots. If sufficient numbers can be made available, they seem destined to play a big part in establishing absolute air superiority over the invasion coast.

HITLER'S EXECUTIONERS CONTINUE TO work overtime in all parts of occupied Europe, but the reports of their rifles cannot blot out the defiant voices of their victims. In the past week the Trondheim district of Norway has been suffering a reign of terror. Following the successful dynamiting of a key electric plant and other acts of sabotage the Nazi authorities proclaimed a state of emergency along a 500-mile strip of coast and started wholesale arrests. Within four days at least thirty-four hostages were shot. There was not even a pretense that these men were the "guilty" parties. Some were prominent citizens who were placed against a wall without even a drum-head court-martial; others were taken from prisons where they were being held as hostages in connection with quite different incidents. According to some reports reaching here, mostly via Stockholm, the Nazis garrisons are in a jittery state, fearing invasion and hoping to forestall any possibility of an uprising behind their coastal defenses. But such stories must always be received with caution. They could be of German origin, despite their neutral labels, and intended perhaps to encourage an Allied invasion attempt with insufficient forces in a part of Norway where the Nazis are particularly well prepared.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH INDICATES A MUCH stiffer attitude toward the man-power situation in the capital. Boys of eighteen and nineteen are to be drafted; a national labor service is inevitable. But as yet there is no indication of a decision on the vital question of balancing military and civilian needs for man-power. Our high military authorities are still talking of an army and navy totaling at least ten million men. It is admitted that not more than three or four million of these men can possibly be moved overseas in 1943, and that our productive resources will be strained to the utmost in supplying an armed force of this size—particularly since it cannot be raised without withdrawing about five million additional men from production. Such a decision, as a correspondent of the New York Sun points out, can only mean that plans are being laid to make the United States secure first, "after which the Allies can be helped." It assumes the worst possible eventualities in Europe and Asia—the collapse of Russia, the successful invasion of England, the defeat of China, and the loss of Australia and India. It is, in a word, isolationism at its blindest. For the experiences of the past few months show that Russia, China, and Great Britain, with some aid from us, are capable of withstanding the worst that the Axis can offer. But they also show that victory can only be achieved by greatly stepping up our assistance, both in men and supplies. Since the number of men that we can send and maintain overseas is drastically limited by the shortage of ships, it would seem only common sense that we should concentrate on producing supplies for the Allied armies now in the field and ships to deliver these supplies.

THE SENATE DESERVES LITTLE PRAISE FOR its prompt passage of the tax bill. For on every test vote it sought to increase the tax burden on the little man in order to reduce the tax on the well-to-do. It adopted the so-called victory tax, which falls primarily on the lower middle-income groups. The La Follette amendment, which would have substantially increased the tax on corporation war profits, was decisively defeated. On the following day the Senate, by a vote of fifty-two to thirty-four, removed from the bill a provision to tax income from local and state securities issued after January 1, 1943. Although this provision would have yielded only $15,000,000 next year, it was of crucial importance as the first step toward the elimination of tax-exempt securities. The sharp increase in surtax rates in the present tax bill greatly magnifies the inequity resulting from tax-exempt securities. While previously it could be argued that the holders of such securities paid a tax in their willingness to accept a low rate of interest on state and municipal bonds, such an argument has little meaning in the face of present surtax rates or the necessity for curtailing consumer spending power in every way possible. The Senators apparently know only one rule when it comes to tax policy: stay off the toes of those who squawk the loudest!

FROM TWO HIGH CATHOLIC AUTHORITIES within the past month have come a pair of interesting reversals. One was voluntary, generous, and humble; the other was three years overdue and made on pain of a $100,000 libel action. Both are welcome. For the first we have to thank the Reverend Robert I. Gannon, president of Fordham University, who is not satisfied merely to insist that although he was an isolationist before Pearl Harbor he is all for a vigorous prosecution of the war now that we are in it. Scorning that easy formula of the unconvinced, he said to 1,300 students at the annual Mass of the Holy Ghost:

We used to say that if the Soviet were wiped off the face of the earth it would be good riddance and that the feeble and guilty old British Empire was not worth one American life. We protested violently when we saw our President, as we used to put it, "spoiling for a fight." . . . Today it is humiliating, but many of us are ready to stand up and confess that we were wrong and he was right. It was our war from the first.

THE SECOND MEA CULPA IS RECORDED IN the withdrawal by the Brooklyn Tablet of the libelous attacks on Lawrence A. Fernsworth which appeared in the pages of that pro-Coughlin diocesan journal in 1939. The articles in question accused Fernsworth, a reputable correspondent for the New York Times and the London Times, of having accepted money from the Loyalist government of Spain and implied that he had "betrayed his trust as a news correspondent." The Tablet now admits it "has no evidence in its possession supporting the charges" and is consequently withdrawing them. One of the authors of those attacks is the Reverend Joseph F. Thorning, one of the most active Franco propagandists in this country. We are delighted to have Mr. Fernsworth's name publicly cleared in this fashion, but it is well to note that the irresponsible Thorning is still gunning for correspondents. His most recent victim is Harold Callendar, whose reports on South America conflict with Thorning's friendly feeling for the Falange.

THE UNION FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION HAS come through its first test by fire with integrity and courage. It has given up what no struggling young organization of the left can readily afford to sacrifice, namely, a dynamic and popular leader with a gift for oratory and an invaluable flair for raising funds. These, among others, were the assets which the U. D. A. yielded when it invited its president, Dr. Frank Kingdon, to take a "leave of absence." Valuable as they are, we believe the Union would have lost more—ultimately its very life—if it had chosen to countenance Dr. Kingdon's decision to take the stump for John J. Bennett in the campaign for the governorship of New York. It is no sin to support Bennett, and the U. D. A. has made it clear that aside from its three top officers its members are free to do so, though its Board of Directors unanimously adopted a resolution in favor of Dean Alfange, the American Labor Party candidate. Dr. Kingdon's action, however, raises problems considerably deeper than the right of a U. D. A. member to support the candidate of his choice. Not only was he the organization's spokesman and identified in the public mind as such, but he happens to have been one of the prime movers in securing the Labor Party's nomination for Alfange. A member of the innermost councils of the party, he made an impassioned plea a few weeks ago for a strong campaign in order to prevent the Democratic Party—and the Administration—from being thrown on the mercy of the reactionaries gathered around James A. Farley, and in order to preserve for the A. L. P. the balance of power without which it would lose much of its political reason for being. Dr. Kingdon has given no adequate explanation for his change of heart, nor did he consult either the A. L. P. or the U. D. A. itself in making his lightning switch. His continuation in office would have nullified the Union's usefulness both as a support for the New Deal and as a liberal check on the Administration, and would seriously have compromised its position as an independent force.

COLONEL ROBERT R. McCORMICK AND WHAT he calls the world's greatest newspaper—the Chicago Tribune to you—are given their due in a pamphlet recently issued by the Chicago branch of the Union for Democratic Action. In seventy-two brisk pages, further enlivened by numerous and pointed cartoons, the pamphlet tells the fantastic tale of a newspaper which in the name of national defense and patriotism has praised and pampered fascists and near fascists at home, parroted the propaganda of the Axis, played fast and loose with military secrets, and in general done everything it could get away with—and a great deal it shouldn't have been allowed to get away with—to discredit the war effort. It makes interesting—and hair-raising—reading, and the U. D. A. of Chicago is to be commended for its enterprise in bringing together for the first time, so far as we know, all the pertinent and damning facts about Colonel McCosmic and his blatant journal.

Caught in the Networks

PLANS for a national radio series under the sponsorship of the Cooperative League have been disrupted by the refusal of the National Broadcasting Company and the Columbia Broadcasting System to sell time for this purpose. The series was to take the form of thirteen dramatizations of cooperative history followed by an appeal to listeners to write for a booklet explaining how to join an existing cooperative society or form a new one.

While agreeing that these programs were unacceptable, the two networks failed to agree on reasons. N. B. C.'s explanation was that the Cooperative League's advertising campaign was designed to promote new memberships and thus contravened the company's "very long-established regulation" barring the sale of time to anyone for this purpose. Columbia based its refusal on the code of the National Association of Broadcasters, which prohibits the sale of time for programs devoted to "public controversial issues." In its view, the programs offered by the league were barred by this clause since they "were designed to promote a fundamental change in the present system of marketing and distribution of goods and services, whereby cooperative associations would largely supplant retail stores and other common distribution establishments."

Columbia specifically stated that it would be willing to accept a program sponsored by a cooperative store so long as it advertised goods offered for sale. But apparently if such a program went beyond the merits of cooperative branded goods and talked of the cooperative idea or of cooperative methods and organization, it would be taboo. Yet unless such matters can be mentioned, the cooperative movement is severely handicapped in attracting new members and in encouraging consumers to form cooperative societies in new localities.

We do not dispute the merits of Columbia's policy, which is founded on the reasonable premise "that the ability to buy time should not determine the extent to which a particular side of a public controversial issue should be broadcast." But we do question the assumption that consumers' cooperation is an issue of this kind.

Who, we would like to know, has ever challenged on political, economic, or moral grounds the right of consumers to go into business for themselves? Who has challenged their right to govern such a business on the democratic principle of one member, one vote, their right to buy goods from such a business on a cash basis, their right to divide up the profits among themselves in proportion to the amount of their purchases?

Perhaps the broadcasting companies are not aware that the economic basis of consumers' cooperation is so simple and so unassailable. Perhaps they do not know the extent of the movement or the fact that it has many friends and no public enemies. Columbia might have learned this from its experience in giving free time to the cooperative movement. In accordance with its policy it would have had to allot equal time to any responsible person or group that wished to state an opposing view, but, it admits, no unfavorable reactions or complaints have ever been evoked by broadcasts on consumer cooperation. A strange kind of controversy!

This is not the same thing as saying that consumers' cooperation has no enemies at all. It has plenty—many of them clients of the radio networks—who will be delighted at any interference with its plans for expansion. These enemies, however, have never challenged the movement openly, nor could they do so without attacking their own cherished faith in private enterprise. So they have always resorted to undercover methods—attempts to divert supplies from cooperative organizations, whispering campaigns, and so on. But the mere fact that there must be two parties to an assault and battery does not make that crime a public controversial issue unless the assailant is prepared to come out and defend his action as in the public interest.

We believe, therefore, that the Cooperative League is thoroughly justified in appealing to Congress, the Federal Communications Commission, and other government agencies for a searching inquiry into the reasons why its programs have been refused the air. We wish it luck in this new battle with monopoly.

The Coming Oil Shortage

A SUBCOMMITTEE of the Senate Public Lands Committee has opened a series of hearings of the greatest importance to the war effort. These hearings have yet to attract the attention they deserve in our press. Senator O'Mahoney of Wyoming, one of the ablest and most progressive members of the upper house of Congress, is chairman of the subcommittee. Its purpose, as announced, is to find means "to encourage the discovery of oil and gas on the public domain during the continuance of the present war." An enormous quantity of petroleum will be needed to fuel our ships, trucks, tanks, and planes. We are also dependent on petroleum for large quantities of synthetic toluene for TNT and for a major share of the materials which go into synthetic rubber. One set of figures will serve to illuminate the problem. We are producing less than four million barrels of crude oil a day; we may soon be needing five million barrels for aviation gas alone. The committee wants an answer to several questions: How can we best encourage the development of new sources of oil? What can we do to speed up the finding of new oil fields? Are coal and shale a feasible source of synthetic oil? Must we not begin to plan now for a possible oil shortage? "The mistakes in the production of rubber and steel," as O'Mahoney told the Senate on September 21, "must not be repeated with respect to oil."

Many contending motives, factions, and interests are attempting to use these hearings for their purposes. One of the keys to an understanding of them lies in a controversy between Leon Henderson and Harold L. Ickes. As Secretary of the Interior and War Petroleum Coordinator, Ickes, with the backing of the oil companies, wants an increase in the price of oil to encourage the development of new wells. Henderson, as head of the Office of Price Administration, is trying to apply to oil a policy he has consistently followed in other spheres. He has sought to encourage expanded production by offering a premium price for new production rather than by allowing an over-all price increase.

In every case, industries have naturally preferred the over-all increase. Oil is no exception. From the consumer's and the government's point of view, this means paying a higher price for the oil we already have in the hope that we shall thereby encourage some proportion of those who get the higher prices to go out and look for more oil. Most of the prospecting for new wells is done by independents. Most of the profits of the price increase would go to the big companies, many of which prefer to sit tight on their oil reserves. Senator O'Mahoney pointed out at the opening of the hearings that while the major oil companies now produce from about 3,800,000 acres, or 80 per cent of known reserves, these same companies control some 49,000,000 acres of "oil lands" which may also hold large quantities of oil. Would it not be wiser to have the government take these lands over and subsidize drilling on them than to raise the price of crude and then hope and pray that the majors will drill? Present conditions are not exactly ideal for the operations of Adam Smith's classical economics.

The real purpose of the majors is to get a higher price for oil, and they are backing a move to take control over prices away from Henderson and vest it in Ickes. An executive order which would do so has been at the White House awaiting signature for some time. We hope the President will not sign it. New sources of oil are worth money, but let us pay it to the men who really find them. If we want to speed discovery, the way to do so is to expand the work of government geologists, to plan and organize oil prospecting instead of leaving it to chance and an increase in prices. The war will not be won in any sphere by reliance upon laissez faire.

As important as finding new sources of oil is the finding of alternative sources of war materials we are now obtaining from petroleum. The impending oil scarcity makes it more than ever essential to develop and expand the production of ethyl alcohol and butyl alcohol for synthetic rubber. Butylene from butyl alcohol could also be used in the making of aviation gas. We are bringing an oil shortage nearer by depending too much on petroleum—and on the oil trust—for war materials which can be made as well from the fermentation of farm and forest products.

On the Diplomatic Front

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

IS IT the genius of the democratic nations to come to life only in the face of defeat—after a Dunkirk, a Pearl Harbor—and to relax at the first sign of improvement? This last week has witnessed one of those discouraging waves of optimism following a mood of grim awareness generated by the heroism and horror of the Stalingrad siege.

The wave rose on Hitler's speech acknowledging that the period of great offensives was over and the job of defending and using gains had begun. It swelled as the Germans announced the end of the frontal assault on Stalingrad. It mounted to a crest in the announcement by the Belgian Minister of Justice that "we are in 1918," and that the only remaining question is how long Germany's final struggle will last. With Churchill's speech on Monday the wave broke and rolled up the beach.

I don't doubt Mr. Churchill's sincerity. The British Prime Minister has never been afraid of unpleasant truths. But truth is not merely a set of facts. Undoubtedly the Germans are not advancing as they did in 1940 and 1941. Undoubtedly they are tired. And surely the crucial question is—how long will the struggle last? But the use made of those facts and the answer to that question depend partly on how our leaders want us to feel. And today, I suspect, they want to distract our attention from the continuing bitter struggle in Russia and the desperate need for a major diversion in the west. They want us to feel that the tide is about to turn. We have worried too much for their peace of mind; we have demanded too much for their comfort. So they draw a long breath of relief over the miracle of Stalingrad and emphasize the signs of weakness in the Reich. Optimism, used at the right moment, can be a most effective political weapon.

All of this makes me glad that Wendell Willkie spoke as he did. His blunt and undiplomatic diplomacy sent a lot of pretensions crashing, and it obviously served as a tonic to whole populations. As usual after stimulants, there will be a let-down unless action follows the urgent warnings broadcast by Mr. Willkie. But in the long run the relations of the Western nations with their Eastern allies will, I am sure, be bettered as a result of the warm feeling and vigorous opinions expressed by Mr. Roosevelt's maverick ambassador.

An even less official—and far less useful—venture in diplomacy was the Open Letter from the Editors of Life to the People of England. The excitement produced in Britain by this outburst, though a tribute to the power of Mr. Luce, is hardly justified by the facts. Life may be read—or looked at—by millions of people, but it isn't their elected spokesman.

When Life talks about "Your Side" and "Our Side," implying that the first is a selfish devotion to the idea of empire while the second is a passion for freedom for everybody, its foolishness is as embarrassing to sensible Americans as it must be infuriating to Englishmen. The root of Life's error lies in its blowzy use of the words "you" and "we." It ignores the fact that many thousands of British subjects are far more critical of their government's policy in India, to take the one concrete example mentioned, than any editor of Life. It ignores the equally pertinent fact that Americans are not all convinced fighters for freedom but include also such contrary elements as Mr. Hearst and Mr. Dies and Mr. Fish and Mr. Breckinridge Long. (And incidentally, it fails to mention the considerable embarrassment occasioned in England by the efforts of American army officers on British soil to discourage friendly and democratic relations between the local population and American Negro soldiers.) It forgets, too, that "Your Side" is not only India and Colonel Blimp but a courageous willingness to fight on alone before "Our Side" even came into being, and a readiness to accept more social change and to sacrifice more social privileges than "Our Side" has yet contemplated. It forgets, or pretends to forget, that "Our Side" includes the long and unended appeasement of Vichy and Franco and a dozen other capitulations to the spirit of fascism at home and abroad. "We" had better wait about issuing invitations to other nations to "move over," until we sweep out a little of the debris that litters "Our Side."

And meanwhile the British people needn't worry. We'll keep on fighting along with them in spite of Life's ultimatum. And we'll fight for the empire, too, since the empire includes not only India but the great self-governing dominions, and the islands of the Caribbean, and Malta, and other sources of the power and will to win of the alliance against Hitler. We can't spare the British Empire; everybody knows that, really; even Mr. Luce.

Secretary Welles deserves the full support of everyone in his energetic exposure of Nazi activities in Argentina and Chile. It is unfortunate that these two nations have been linked in a bond of disloyalty to the democratic cause, since Chile is, essentially, sympathetic to the Allies, even officially, while Argentina's government is openly pro-Axis. But their joint insistence on "neutrality" forces them into a common role. And it was essential that Mr. Welles speak out and denounce the effect of their policy. Even if the result is a growth of ill-feeling between both countries and the United States—expressed in the case of Chile by the postponement of President Riso's long-expected visit to Washington—the price will not be too high.

But this final exposure of activities which have been going on for months and years more than justifies the stand The Nation has taken on the State Department's attitude toward Latin America. Criticized for our undue suspicions and attacked for endangering the Good Neighbor policy, we have insisted since long before the Rio conference that the existence of pro-Axis dictatorships was a certain source of danger to the whole hemisphere and have pointed out the undenied evidence of Nazi intrigue spreading through the continent from Argentina to the Rio Grande. We have shown the close relationship of Fascist Spain with every reactionary clique and government in Latin America—especially with the Castillo regime in Argentina. And so it is interesting but not surprising to discover through the official stories from Washington that the threads of plotting and spying run through Chile and Cuba to a center in Madrid. There is the headquarters of Spanish-American fascism, of Axis intrigue, focused in a government with which we maintain friendly relations, which we pamper and appease with precious cargoes of oil and wheat and with promises of future trade and money for "restoring cultural treasures." And so we go on feathering Hitler's nests—the nests of spies he is so assiduously building in our own threatened hemisphere.

The best move along the diplomatic front was the announcement by the United States and Britain, timed to coincide with China's Independence Day celebration, that both nations would immediately open negotiations to end extra-territorial rights and privileges in China. The political importance of this move can hardly be exaggerated. Long overdue, it will help to wipe out the underlying sense of injustice which has always corroded China's relations with us and added to the bitterness created by our long appeasement of Japan. Now that China is no longer to be treated as a "second-class power" by its allies, other important developments become possible. The proposal made by the Chinese Foreign Minister, T. V. Soong, that the United Nations should set up an executive council during the war as a basis for a permanent post-war international organization is a logical sequel to the promised end of the unequal treaties. It is, moreover, the most constructive suggestion put forward yet by one of the Allied leaders and deserves full and general discussion.

The Return of Bernard Baruch

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, October 9

BEST news of the week is the appointment of Benjamin V. Cohen, of the old team of Corcoran and Cohen, as chief counsel to Director of Economic Stabilization James F. Byrnes. This country never had two public servants who were harder working, more devoted, less concerned with personal interests, and more maligned than Corcoran and Cohen. A younger New Dealer of great promise who is also going on Byrnes's legal staff is Edward F. Prichard, once Justice Felix Frankfurter's law clerk. Appointments of this kind inspire confidence in Byrnes.

May I dwell for a moment on the story of Corcoran and Cohen and the broader trends it reflects and illumines? The first ebb of the New Deal as a creative and positive force set in with the Little Steel strike; the President's "a plague o' both your houses" voiced the fact that the middle classes were tired of reform. The second ebb set in with the appointment of the National Defense Advisory Commission in the spring of 1940, when the President felt that he had to make his peace with big business if he were successfully to mobilize the country for the war he had long seen coming. King John gave the barons a charter; F. D. R. handed them the heads of Corcoran and Cohen on a platter.

In the spring of 1940 a visitor to the offices of Corcoran and Cohen, then in the new Interior Building, encountered an unaccustomed atmosphere of relaxation and quiet. The President felt, so went the story, that he could not win a third term and prepare the country for war unless he had at least part of the big-business crowd with him, and that this was not possible so long as the bogymen of the right press, Corcoran and Cohen, were central figures of the New Deal. At first, there were whispered assurances that after election all would be different, but the coalition with big business was the line of least resistance. Cohen became a glorified messenger boy to London and elsewhere and, though still comparatively a young man, a kind of elder statesman for the surviving New Dealers; Corcoran became a successful corporation lawyer.

In Washington, a curiously febrile and rootless town, where it is often thought that history can be made by getting a great man's ear, the decline and fall of Corcoran and Cohen was sometimes regarded as the result of palace politics. People "in the know," which includes almost everyone in the capital, said that Harry Hopkins, Corcoran's rival, had got closer to the royal bedchamber and made off with the President's confidence and affection. No doubt there were many at Paris who knew from the very best confidential sources that the mob would never have broken into the Bastille if Marie Antoinette had not been so dissatisfied with her new hair-do.

Politics on the grand scale is impersonal as well as amoral, and it is only in Lilliputian and moralistic pulpits that the passing of Corcoran and Cohen from power could become a sermon on Presidential "ingratitude." The real meaning of the Scripture text "Put not your faith in princes" is that princes are not their own masters. Those who possess great power are prisoner to the necessities which govern its retention and use. The forces which pushed Corcoran and Cohen aside are the same forces which have converted the fifth floor of the Social Security Building in Washington, where WPB's topmost are housed, into a scene from Wall Street. Our limited government, if it was to fight the war, had to come to terms with the independent sovereignties that dominate our economy. The eclipse of Corcoran and Cohen was part of the bargain.

Those who think in terms of personality and palace politics say that we have entered upon a Baruch period. Byrnes, like Baruch, is a South Carolinian; they are supposed to be old friends; Baruch has supplied campaign funds for Byrnes. It is said that "Baruch men," notably Ferdinand Eberstadt and C. E. Wilson, are now in control at the WPB. Eberstadt is probably the most powerful figure in the War Production Board. Nelson has become more and more ludicrous with a "get-tough" policy that gets tough only with those who offend the big-business crowd. He has grown less and less important, not because he has less power but because he shows less and less capacity for issuing it. Eberstadt, as vice-chairman of the Office of Program Determination, has the power to coordinate and revise all the war-production schedules. As former head of the Army-Navy Munitions Board, he represents the army bureaucracy, a combination of brass hats and dollar-a-year men in uniform, as against the WPB bureaucracy of dollar-a-year men in mufti slightly seasoned by New Dealers and a few stray laborites. The chief advantage of the latter over the former is that when you put a dollar-a-year man in a uniform, the camouflage makes him harder to spot, and the sense of being a "military man" makes him feel above criticism.

Eberstadt is a small-time Wall Streeter, once a partner in Dillon, Read, then head of a banking firm of his own. He is likable, hard-working, well-meaning, and patriotic, but his mental horizons are not much broader than those of the Bankers' Club. He is shrewd enough and man of good-will enough to be friendly to labor, but neither the feeling nor the man are big enough to have much effect on the course of events. The first branch chief he appointed was a Standard Oil executive, Thomas R. Armstrong, who is disliked and feared all over Latin America. Armstrong as head of the Foreign Requirements Liaison Branch of the WPB will be able to coordinate and revise all export programs. Eberstadt appointed him, in upstanding, Boy Scout, American Magazine fashion, because "he's the best man for the job." Armstrong remains on Standard Oil's pay roll while serving the government, and Eberstadt is the kind of man who honestly does not understand why people should be upset by Armstrong's connections. Yet Armstrong's record is so bad that even the State Department is on the war path.

The extent of Baruch's influence is open to question. But Baruch is the symbol of this kind of naive acceptance of the view that only the big-business crowd can run a war economy. Baruch's War Industries Board was a paradise for the dollar-a-year men; labor and liberal influences were shunted off and neatly compartmented in spheres where they could have no effect on production problems. The term dollar-a-year man in that far-off era was one of honor, and though Baruch talks of victorious clashes with industry, these reminiscences, like all autobiography, are tinged with fiction. The automobile industry thumbed its nose at Baruch and got away with it; he never did succeed in curtailing the output of passenger cars, much less in forcing conversion of the industry.

The report of Baruch's War Industries Board contains much that is useful, but it must be read as a work of the imagination. The good things of which it tells did, indeed, happen but usually on so slight a scale as to be guideposts rather than feats. The Baruch report on rubber is the measure of the man's trustful attitude toward big business, his gullibility in dealing with its experts. For all its defects, industrial mobilization under Roosevelt has been more effective than it was under Wilson and Baruch, in part because the emergency is greater, in part because popular forces like the labor movement are better organized, though still only half awake. From this point of view, the return of Baruch, whether as influence or symbol, is not encouraging.

When Do Americans Fight?

BY MARGARET MEAD

AT ANY time in their history, in war or in peace, the way in which a people handles the problem of aggression is important. Cultures have patterned aggression in many different ways: they have regarded it as primary and rewarded it; regarded it as incidental and undesirable and extinguished it; regarded it as primary and punished it; regarded it as secondary and developed it. The degree to which one individual will fight, attempt to dominate or destroy persons or objects which interfere with his attainment of a goal, is of very great concern in human societies, and almost all societies of which we know are, in some measure, concerned with the problem—with staying the baby's hand, with slapping the baby's hand, or with reinforcing the baby's aimless slap by a cheer or the comment: "How fierce and cruel he is." And there is a definite relationship between the expectancy, the fear, the disapproval, the cheer in the parent's voice and the later fighting behavior of those babies grown to manhood.

The question is not: Are we aggressive enough? as if aggression were something which merely varied quantitatively from high to low, like temperature or blood pressure or the amount of a vitamin stored in one's liver. Such a question gets us nowhere. Let us ask instead: What kind of pattern of aggressive behavior have we, as Americans? When is aggression justified in our eyes and when is it condemned? Who can be aggressive to whom, where? And with the answers to such questions as these we can look at the present world scene, which calls for the exercise of certain types of aggression, and ask: Have we, as Americans, the kind of aggressiveness that the present world developments demand? If not, what has to be done to alter the way we see the world—something actually easier to do than to alter the form of American aggressiveness?

A good place to study the American pattern is a playground where each mother is shouting her admonitions at her child. "Stand up for yourself! Don't come crying to me when he takes your shovel. Get it back. You're big enough to look after yourself." "Jimmy! Look out, he's just a little baby, don't hit him." "Well, hit him back if he hits you. Don't stand there like a sissy and take it." "Go on, make him learn he can't hit you without getting hurt." "Tommy, don't pull that little boy's hair. He's smaller than you are. He doesn't know any better. If you want to fight, pick on someone your own size." "No, I won't ask his mother to make him give it back. Go and get it yourself if you want it. He's not much bigger than you are." And as each mother leads her dirt-smeared champion home, she thinks to herself either: "He can stand up for himself all right. He can take it, and he can dish it out. He's got what it takes," or in a worried unadmitted undertone: "I wish he'd stand up for himself more. He's brave enough when it comes to teasing kids smaller than he is or pulling the girls' hair, but he won't stand up to anything his size."

When the children get a little older, when a teacher instead of a parent is in charge, a playground director instead of a nurse, a new note, the notion of rules, enters in more prominently: "Play fair." "It's his turn now." "Let him have it for a while now, Jimmy. You've had it a long time." "No, boys, turn about is fair play." "It's not fair to take the little boy's ball, Jimmy, he's smaller than you are." "Billy! do you think it's fair to grab everything just because you're bigger than the others? I'm ashamed of you."

Educators commenting on the contradictory threads in our culture have stressed that we confuse children about aggression; that we teach them to be tough and to stand up for themselves and at the same time teach them that aggression is wrong and should be suppressed. But actually there is a pattern which underlies these contradictory orders, and a very clear one. It is obscured, however, in the mind of the educated thinker by his knowledge of Anglo-Saxon institutions. To him fair play means certain definite things. It means "obeying the rules," and the "rules" are thought of as a device for keeping people from bullying or taking an unfair advantage of the other person. One's character is defined by the way in which the rules are embodied in one's behavior—and "That's not cricket" may even be applied to making love to the wife of a man who is in a weaker position than oneself. Our games traditions, although altered and transformed, are Anglo-Saxon in form; and fair play does mean for us, as for the English, a standard of behavior between the weak and the strong—a standard which is curiously incomprehensible to the German. During the last war articles used to appear in German papers exploring this curious Anglo-Saxon notion called "fair play." The phrase was always rendered in English—for there was no translation.

Now the element which is so difficult to translate in the idea of "fair play" is not the fact that there are rules. Rules are an integral part of German life, rules for the behavior of inferior to superior, for persons of every status, for every formal situation: rules for the hunter, who is ashamed if he does not hit his quarry in the appointed, difficult, and honorable spot; rules for the man of honor, who must know when to be insulted or be forever disgraced. The point that was incomprehensible was the inclusion of the other person's weakness in the rules, the exclusion of the idea that the purpose of strength is to triumph over weakness. According to the rules of the game, when one's opponent is stronger than oneself, maximum effort is called forth; when one's opponent is weaker, maximum effort is no longer compatible with fair play. The Anglo-Saxon fear that a boy will be a coward contains in it the fear that he will also be a bully. The "fair play" character always finds the greater strength of his opponent a stimulus. When the other is stronger, he puts out more effort, is "braver," and when the other is weaker, he reduces his effort, is "gentle." The coward, however, doesn't see the situation that way at all—another person's greater strength is a signal to him to cringe; and such an attitude finds its counterpart in bullying whenever the chance occurs.

In America a new twist has been given to this Anglo-Saxon view. Our attitude toward bullies and cowards, toward hitting below the belt and hitting a man when he is down, is the same as the English attitude. But the American child is taught to think about each situation as it comes up rather than to relax into an implicit acceptance of a set of rules which all those whom he meets will play by. And for a very good reason. Practically every American boy who is not tied to his mother's apron strings is going to encounter other boys whose ideas of fighting are very different from his own: perhaps Negroes, whose view of what is fair is dangerously distorted by the fact that they themselves have been too long "fair game" for white people, or perhaps Puerto Rican and Mexican children, whose romanticism takes a direction other than fair play. He may meet Irish children to whom fighting is something that one does naturally, like eating, rather than part of an elaborate game. When one ten-year-old American boy—especially in a large city—meets another bigger than he is, he can never be sure that the other boy knows the rules. He has to be tough, gauge the situation on its merits, shift his expectation one way or another in quick response to the look in the other boy's eye. He is growing up and going out into a world that is not orderly and dependable—as was the world of English boys before the war, when the toughest public house had its established code—but into a world which is too mixed and too unpredictable to allow him to rely on a code.

So the American mother, watching her three-year-old learn to make his way among other children, is faced with a very real dilemma. She shares the Anglo-Saxon attitude toward relative strengths, toward bullies and cowards and hitting a man when he is down. She also shares the Anglo-Saxon belief that fighting should be curbed. The type of legislation which outlawed dueling and the attitude which has never wanted a standing army are parts of American culture as they are of English culture. Fighting is crude and uncivilized, especially if the weapons are efficient. Guns and knives are the weapons of foreigners and criminals; fists, if you must fight, for the Englishman and the American. At the same time the American mother is more impressed with the dangers which little boys will encounter in a world full of tough, strange foreign characters, of mixed breeds and manners, than she is with her little boy's potential aggressiveness. "He has to learn to look after himself" means something different on the edge of an American slum even from what it means in the East End of London. Will he be tough enough? That is the question which lurks in the American mother's eyes as she watches her two-year-old stand passive while another child yanks his toy out of his hand. Where the English mother can see—in her mind's eye—generations of schoolmasters and policemen umpiring the roughest games, assuring that 99 per cent of the children of the land will play by the same rules, the American mother sees instead a melee of frontier battles, gangster battles, tong wars, feuds, Indian attacks, and hijacking. American history mixes with the front pages of the tabloids; G-men and gangsters stride through her imagination. Her baby boy is going out to face this world of violence—and she looks across at her husband, belt unbuttoned, slumped comfortably, reading the sports news. He hardly ever gets angry, doesn't half stand up for his rights, could have had a raise years ago, but didn't like to start a row about it. If her small Jimmy, standing with toes turned in, looking very small in his new overalls, is going to get along in this world and be more successful than his Dad—and for what else did she bear him?—he'll have to be a good deal tougher than his Dad, who lets himself be pushed around.

Thus the American boy's capacity for aggression is determined by various influences: the respect for the rules, the insistence on fair play, which we share with England; the confused, turbulent, unpatterned quality of American life; and the American insistence that the child shall be more successful than his father, which means tougher than his father. All these influences are given a special tone by the fact that it is women, the mother and the nurse and the sister, who exhort the baby boy to be tough.

When a man is teaching his son to double up his fist or throw a spear, he is teaching him something that he himself has learned, a skill, a way of doing things. He is not teaching the child merely to be aggressive or even to be assertive, but how to behave once his aggression is aroused, how to defend himself and how to attack. He is able to concentrate on the way of doing it and need not emphasize the necessity or the inappropriateness of aggression. For the mother's contradictory, "Don't hit that little boy, Jimmy," and, "Stand up for yourself, can't you?" the father can substitute, "Here, not like that, son. Plant your feet now, plant your feet." Fighting behavior which is taught to males by males has inevitably a different quality from fighting behavior which is taught to males by females. American women, ambivalent toward fighting, considering it at once wrong and necessary, succeed in teaching their children that fighting must always be done in self-defense, and yet that you have to practice getting angry. Where a male mentor could emphasize practicing a technique of throwing spears or shooting arrows among savages, or of boxing, fencing, or wrestling among ourselves, it is not appropriate for women in our culture to stand about on street corners and give instructions in the technique of upper cuts. They must confine themselves to vague exhortations about "standing up for yourself" without giving any detailed advice. So the American boy learns that aggression and fighting are wrong, to be avoided as low, and likely to arouse his mother's and often his father's disapproval, and also that aggression and fighting are necessary and, in fact, compulsory whenever anyone tries to pick on him, push him around. "You have to be tough to get along in this world."

The chip on the shoulder is the folk expression of this set of attitudes. By putting a chip on his shoulder and then waiting to have it knocked off, a boy can epitomize all the contradictory orders which have been given. He isn't being aggressive, going about knocking nice little boys down. No, indeed. He doesn't hit anybody. But he has to get some practice in fighting; he must have a few fights to his credit just to be sure he can fight. So he sets the chip on his shoulder which defines the situation: here is a boy who knows he shouldn't start a fight, but who wants to prove he's game; the boy who knocks off the chip must be strong enough to be a legitimate opponent, and it is always right to fight back. The other boy, the boy who has to knock the chip off, can argue: "He started it, Mom. He was looking for a fight, or he wouldn't have put the chip on his shoulder. He'd a thought I was a sissy if I'd pretended it wasn't there." Out of a number of conflicting traditions, out of the confusion which can be built in the male mind when females urge his maleness insistently upon him, there has emerged a special American form of aggressiveness; aggressiveness which can never be shown except when the other fellow starts it; aggressiveness which is so unsure of itself that it has to be proved.

When will the American fight? When the game is fair; when he can't be told that he started the fight, or that he is pushing around someone smaller than he is?

Yes. And with his back to the wall, as the English fight best? No. The back-to-the-wall position depends on the English basic assurance that they have more aggression than they need. When your back is against the wall, then, by the rules of the game, every ounce of aggression that is in you must come out. And if you keep the rules and hit hard, you always win. That is the English conviction. But the American is a little different. His gaze has been concentrated not on the rules, but upon his strength in the face of variable and unpredictable circumstances. He doesn't know whether he has enough aggressiveness, and he doesn't need the same absolute license to display it. Back-to-the-wall positions are therefore not best for him. His best position is in a fight which somebody else started, for which he cannot blame himself and for which no one else can blame him, getting in good hard punches and surprising himself at how well he is doing. And despite his characteristic boasting, his "We won the last war, and we'll win this one," the American is always surprised when he does do anything like as well as he says he is going to, if his aggressiveness is at stake.

Boasting is part of the American character—the child is expected to outdistance the parent, to be brighter, stronger, more aggressive, more successful. For the American child boasting is a sort of whistling in the dark, a necessary precautionary measure as he tries to live up to an unknown demand upon his unknown strength. In war time great and unknown demands are made upon young men who had learned to settle down into the friendly human relations which men, as opposed to women, expect from men in this society. They must suddenly display again the aggressiveness which their mothers enjoined upon them and in which they are relatively unskilled. Boasting is very necessary. When Mersa Matruh fell to Rommel, in June, 1942, the headlines blazoned it for an hour, but later editions of the evening papers came out with: "American Planes Bomb Wake Island." Were we escaping from reality, smuggling away into small print the news that our side had taken a terrible defeat? Or were we merely indulging in the extra touch of boasting which was necessary if, in the face of defeat, we were to go on fighting? I think the latter.

Speakers, editors, and propagandists—consciously and unconsciously—are dealing every day with this two-edged problem of how to phrase the conflict so as to bring out our full fighting strength. We must see the enemy as stronger—either in men or resources or wickedness—or we cannot fight at all. That "must" we share with the English; it is part of the rules of the game. We may, of course, interfere unendingly in the affairs of very small countries under the heading of "keeping order," but that we rationalize as a policeman's job, not as a real fight. If the fight is to be real, the enemy must be as strong, preferably quite a little stronger. There must be a good chance that we may lose. But at the same time, since our pattern of aggressiveness is based on the undefined, excessive demands made by mothers who articulately disapproved of all the techniques of aggression in small boys—who told them at one and the same time to “stand up for yourself” and “not to keep getting into fights”—there is an unsureness in our approach to a battle which has to be compensated for by boasting and overconfidence in our side. The taxi-driver in Detroit summed up this position when he said to me on the day MacArthur’s arrival in Australia was announced: “It just makes me feel good, it makes me want to go and enlist. I was in the last one, and I think I’ll get into this one. Makes you want to fight to hear about a man like that.” What exactly had MacArthur done at that moment? Merely reached Australia. But he was the symbol of our side, and he had come through to fight again. Everybody felt good; everybody could go on now.

Pearl Harbor has been compared to Dunkirk—to Dunkirk which woke the English up. But the Pearl Harbor which woke the Americans up was not the defeat we suffered there—because we didn’t know about that for quite a while afterward and we reacted to the later details negatively and poorly. The Pearl Harbor which woke America up was just the fact that Japan came along and pushed the chip off our shoulder and left us free to fight where our hands had been tied before. For two years we had been engaged in “national defense”; unwilling to start anything, watching our enemies strengthen their lines about us, hog-tied by our phrasing of life, which forbade our starting a war—a phrasing which we share with the other democracies and which will some day be the basis of a better world. But right at the moment it was a handicap. And then Japan pushed the chip off, and we could fight—fight with a clear conscience, because we didn’t start this fight; Japan did.

What to Tell Germany

BY HEINZ POL

THE propaganda directed against Germany by the United Nations has not yet hit the nail on the head. Primarily the fault lies not with the propaganda agencies, which have greatly improved in recent months. It is a result of the failure of the United Nations to work out a concrete and effective policy with regard to post-war Germany. For lack of certain well-defined objectives, our propaganda experts have been unable to affect the morale of the enemy in any appreciable degree or to influence the hidden currents of opposition within the Reich. During the First World War German military and civilian authorities feared nothing more than the propaganda of the Allies. By its quantity and its quality this propaganda was devastatingly effective, while German counter-efforts were weak and after the first few months became purely defensive. After the war the German propaganda experts concentrated upon learning from their own previous mistakes and from the successful technique of their opponents. Hitler’s advent to power was to no small extent attributable to the conviction of these experts that the propaganda methods of the Nazis would be tremendously effective in the coming war.

The propaganda of the Allies in the period 1914 to 1918 was successful because it was not limited to destructive demands. It did not simply appeal to the German people to get rid of the Kaiser and his clique; it declared most emphatically that peace could be made the moment the German people elected a free democratic government. It also stressed the importance of the reconstruction of Europe and the creation of a League of Nations. In other words, it pointed to the goal and showed how to reach it.

German books on war propaganda agree that Allied promises had a decisive influence in breaking down the resistance of the German people. Karl Pintschovius, General Ludendorff, General von Metzsch, Oberst von Altrichter, Major Albrecht Blau, and other leaders who have written on the subject reveal an almost panicky fear that in a second world war the enemies of Germany might use the same methods, and they conclude that this second war must be so brief that the propaganda of the anti-German powers will not have time to make itself felt. Fear of a collapse of the German people’s spirit of resistance in a long-drawn-out war is fully justified by the events of 1917-18. In those years Allied propaganda made a far deeper impression on the people than Germany’s seemingly brilliant military situation.

There can be no doubt that today, after three years of war, the disappointment among the greater part of the German population over the unexpected length of the war is much deeper than it was in 1917 or 1918. This disappointment is breeding doubts about the meaning of the war and misgivings about its outcome. There is a growing desire to find an acceptable way out. Of course, conditions within Germany in 1914-18 were entirely different from what they are today. Organized liberal and Socialist parties existed in those days, and their legal press served as a forum for the discussion of such questions as Wilson's Fourteen Points or the form of a democratic government. Opposition exists within Hitler's Reich, but it is not organized; it has no forum, and nobody knows how strong it is. The present propaganda of the United Nations, therefore, must not only carry to the German people the message of 1914-18 but, beyond that, do the work of the German democrats and Socialists of that time. All slogans must be given a positive content. All demands must be concrete and all proposals submitted in detail—not, moreover, in a threatening tone but in one of helpful understanding. This means that we should not hold out to the German people the advantage of being rid of Hitler unless we are able to suggest by whom they are to replace him and his party. The British are especially weak in this respect, the American propagandists having tended in recent months to abandon this line of attack.

It is poor propaganda to urge people to start an insurrection against their government. Good propaganda tries to bring latent ideas of revolution to maturity by showing the way to a better future. This fundamental principle was well understood by the Allies in the last war. Most of the people who might be influenced by United Nations propaganda today are fully aware that Hitler and his machine must be destroyed. What they do not know is what will happen afterward. Unfortunately, our propaganda gives them barely a hint. The German people do not know exactly who is included under the term "Nazi" or who, in the opinion of the world, is expected to take over power once the present regime has been overthrown. Even among the oppositional groups in Germany there is no unanimity on who comes under the heading of Nazi. Clever propaganda would announce that Nazis are all those who deliberately brought the Hitler regime to power and all who are today supporting it as party or state officials or as responsible leaders of industry, education, or the armed forces. Many of these men are not members of the Nazi Party and do not call themselves Nazis. Nevertheless, they are the backbone of Hitlerism.

On the other hand, there are hundreds of thousands or even millions of party members—or members of the countless party organizations—who cannot be held guilty. Many became members because they were forced to or because they did not understand what it was all about; others believed in Hitler's promises of social betterment and his pledges of peace. These millions, soldiers and civilians, should be reached by a carefully worked-out technique. After three years of victories which have brought peace no nearer, the masses have become confused. If rightly or wrongly they get the impression that "all Nazis" will be punished after the war, their determination to continue the struggle is strengthened and all hope of turning their confusion into defeatism is destroyed. Goebbels will say—as he does already: "You see, the world wants to destroy the German people to the last man. We are all in the same boat." The simultaneous declarations by President Roosevelt and the British government of an intention to put "war criminals" on trial after the armistice should go far to dispel this fear, since both statements repudiate the doctrine that the German people as a whole share their leaders' culpability and are therefore to be punished.

It is equally important to present the anti-Axis view of the future reconstruction of Europe, and of Germany in particular. And of course a propaganda dealing with the problems of peace can be effective only if the powers engaged in it have themselves reached an agreement about the post-war world. Only then will it be able to answer the questions which an ever-increasing number of people in Germany are asking: Will Germany be occupied by military forces for an indefinite period? Will the German people be allowed to elect for themselves an independent government, after the last traces of Hitlerism have been wiped out? Will the victorious powers be satisfied with confining Germany to its pre-Hitler boundaries or will they dismember it? Will they be willing, after the end of the Nazi regime, to support the German people economically; above all, will they lift the food blockade at the beginning of an armistice? Will there be another Versailles, only a hundred times worse in every respect? Goebbels has given clear answers to these questions. He keeps telling the Germans that the Allies will destroy and dismember their country, that Germans will become slaves, that Germany's wealth will be turned over to foreign powers; in other words, that the Treaty of Versailles was mere child's play compared to what they must expect if they capitulate to the enemy now. Unfortunately, Goebbels can base his predictions on various statements made by spokesmen of the United Nations.

Nevertheless, it would be a relatively simple task to widen the already existing breach between the various groups inside Germany and precipitate an uprising or at least a breakdown. "In the army the belief is gaining ground that Germany would obtain a decent peace if she had a people's government," wrote Ludendorff in his "War Memoirs," adding that this belief, nourished by propaganda from the outside, was weakening the will of the German people to continue the war. Today the situation is fundamentally the same.

To give clear answers to the questions of the German people does not mean to promise more than one is willing to keep. Promises given merely for their effect do not pay. The German people must be made to realize that they share responsibility for Hitler's crimes. They must be told that they are under a moral obligation to pay for the damage, that reconciliation will be impossible as long as they look upon their obligation as a punishment instead of as a moral necessity. They must be told that the sincerity of their conversion will be tested during a cooling-off period, and that after that period Germany can have full participation in the future organization of Europe and the world. Naturally it is not feasible to discuss openly every detail of the war and peace aims of the United Nations, but basic conditions should be clearly outlined.

It goes without saying that propaganda cannot rely on short-wave transmissions alone. Germany must be systematically bombarded from the air with pamphlets, leaflets, newspapers. Comparatively few persons can listen to short-wave news in Germany, but a leaflet can be easily concealed and passed on to hundreds of people. Moreover, written or printed words are usually more impressive than anything heard over the radio.

An effort should also be made to obtain favorable discussions of the United Nations' peace aims in the press of neutral countries. One of the great virtues of Allied propaganda during the last war was its reasonable and disguised influence on the neutral press. Papers in neutral countries are ordinarily eager to discuss war and peace aims if definite, interesting material is available. Persons who have arrived here recently from Stockholm, Zurich, Lisbon, or Ankara report, however, that the propaganda of the United Nations is definitely deficient both in quality and in quantity. Nor is enough attention paid to the production and distribution of various types of propaganda booklets, printed in a number of languages. These ought to be available at all newsstands and bookshops in neutral capitals. As a matter of fact, almost the only ones to be seen are imported from Nazi Germany, which has for many years turned out a great deal of excellent and psychologically well-adapted propaganda material for foreign consumption. Germany is posting observers everywhere abroad—not only Gestapo agents and saboteurs, but business men, financial experts, and artists. If a clever propaganda were conducted in the press of neutral cities, these German visitors might have a good deal to report at home.

Furthermore, we have the German prisoners of war. Though the number up to now is not high, it warrants the effort to influence them. It is true that the Geneva Convention prohibits propaganda against their own country among war prisoners, but the Nazis have never paid any attention to the rule and try frantically to convert their own prisoners into supporters of the New Order. The Russians for their part report extremely encouraging experiments in turning their German prisoners against National Socialism and the Hitler regime.

And now a last hint: no propaganda addressed to the German people should be anonymous. The average German has great respect for the authority of prominent persons, and statements or promises in the name of the American or British people are not one-tenth as effective as those coming from Roosevelt, Hull, Sumner Welles, Willkie, Churchill, Eden, or Cripps. A message of such "authenticity" demands a reply; the German propaganda machine must invent denials. Anonymous statements can be ignored, and anyway the German people are inclined to mistrust them.

The basic requirement of anti-Nazi propaganda is that it be specific: it must have specific aims, deal with specific facts, and have specific authority behind it.

Scrap: the Next Step

THE current scrap-collection drive sponsored by the newspapers has created a widespread scrap-consciousness and seems likely to achieve the immediate objective of the War Production Board—the accumulation of sufficient old metal to see the steel industry through the normally lean winter months. There is, however, always a danger in campaigns which are nine-tenths ballyhoo and one-tenth organization. They go over with a bang, but the publicity tap is apt to be turned off before sufficient moisture has reached the roots of organization.

In this matter of scrap the essential job is to keep an adequate supply of material flowing to the steel mills for the duration, and while the bulk of the supply will be, as it always has been in the past, produced from commercial sources, we shall have to rely on voluntary effort for the marginal tonnage which is likely to make all the difference between victory and defeat. In the past few months the steel industry—the pivot of our war-production program—has been in a critical position. Its output has been a long way short of meeting the demands on it, with the result that armament production has been curtailed; yet it has not been operating at capacity, mainly because of a lack of scrap iron and steel. By the middle of next year capacity is scheduled to increase from the present 88,000,000 ingot tons annually to 98,000,000 ingot tons, but this expansion will be wasted if there is insufficient material to charge the furnaces.

Most steel is made out of a mixture of pig iron and scrap, with the latter averaging between 50 and 60 per cent of the total. This means that next year at least 50,000,000 tons of scrap will be required in order to keep the industry working at capacity. About half this quantity will come from within the industry itself; it will be the "home scrap" derived from trimming and cutting ingots into usable shapes and sizes. The proportion of "home scrap" is, however, rather below normal at present, partly because an unreported but appreciable tonnage of steel is being shipped under lend-lease in the form of raw ingots.

To this extent the dependence of the industry on "purchased scrap" has become greater just at the moment when the usual sources of supply are tending to shrink. For instance, the railroads provide the greatest steady supply of scrap, having sold 4,700,000 tons in 1940 and 4,500,000 tons in 1941. This year, according to a statement in the Wall Street Journal of August 29, the total may be only 3,500,000 tons. The reason is that with traffic at record levels and new equipment restricted, the railroads are making do with track that would normally be discarded and patching up freight cars and locomotives instead of sending them to the scrap heap. Similar considerations are restricting the flow from the utilities and other industries. On the other hand, the intense activity of the metal-using industries means the furnaces will receive a large reflux of steel scrap in the shape of borings, shavings, and so on.

Supplies of scrap in bulk from normal industrial channels will not, however, produce the 25,000,000 tons which will be needed next year, and the balance must be made up from what may be termed marginal scrap. This may be divided into three categories—dormant industrial scrap, household scrap, and what, for want of a better description, I shall call disowned scrap. Household scrap is self-explanatory, but the border line between the other two is sometimes blurred. By and large, dormant industrial scrap includes abandoned railroads, factories, large buildings, sunken vessels, bridges, and other forms of structural metal, the salvaging of which is not commercially profitable. This category is the special pigeon of War Materials, Inc., a government corporation provided with large capital funds. Its purpose is to organize and finance the demolition of scrap-rich property without much regard to cost, and if it does not get tangled in legal snares, it should make an important contribution.

Disowned scrap arises partly from our national habit of moving on to the next pasture and partly from another national habit of dumping in the nearest empty lot any property for which we have no further use. By definition it is rural rather than urban in character, though I think a good deal might be brought to light by the systematic search of empty city houses. It is to be found on the sites of abandoned enterprises too small to be worth the attention of War Materials, Inc.—in sawmills, quarries, and mines, on deserted farms and in tumble-down houses, in fields, woods, and ravines.

I have recently had opportunities to survey the prevalence of disowned scrap in a sparsely inhabited district of New England and in a prosperous New York suburban area and, as a result, have reached the conclusion that a systematic combing of the countryside would produce a very large tonnage of material. But the job will require a lot of hard voluntary labor. In every community we need a band of Scrap Scouts of all ages prepared to use their eyes, legs, and muscles. Their first task would be to survey their district, marking down scrap accumulations and reporting any big stuff to the nearest branch of War Materials, Inc. They would then devote themselves to gathering in everything they could handle with the aid of simple equipment and cart away in trucks. In some cases that I have in mind, small-scale demolitions and excavations would have to be carried out, but a great deal of scrap only needs to be disentangled from the undergrowth and dragged to the nearest road.

Work of this sort makes an appeal to the sporting and collecting instincts, and I do not believe there would be any difficulty in recruiting volunteers. Perhaps the newspaper publishers, who have reason to be proud of the success of their salvage campaign to date, will take a lead in promoting Scouting for Scrap on a national scale.

In the Wind

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY LEADERS are apparently in a state of utter confusion over the issues of the coming election. Last week this column reported Representative Patrick Henry Drewry, chairman of the Democratic Party's Campaign Committee in the House, as saying, "There are no issues in this Congressional campaign." Now Senator Joseph Guffey of Pennsylvania, chairman of the same committee in the Senate, says that the only issues are local ones. Harry Hopkins, who is handling many election problems for the President, says that the only issue is the war.

ESSO MARKETERS, a subdivision of Standard Oil, is distributing free to school teachers a map of the world which, it says, students and teachers will find "of real assistance in following the complicated strategy of this global war." On the back of the map is an article defending the oil industry's position in the dispute over synthetic-rubber processes.

GOVERNOR FRANK DIXON of Alabama, now fighting the government order against racial discrimination in war industries, once wrote a lyrical introduction to the guide to his state published by the Federal Writers' Project. "We want the readers of this volume to realize that although we take pride in what it shows, we are not yet satisfied. When our land closely resembles paradise, we will rest content with Alabama."

THE REORGANIZED FORCES of the prohibition movement are making rapid headway if recent election results are any indication. This year there have been thirty-one "local-option" elections. Before they were held three counties were dry and twenty-eight wet. Now fifteen are dry and sixteen wet.

Free Spain

BY JUAN NEGRIN

[Among the Spanish refugees lately arrived in Mexico were three members of the constitutional government who had been living in France. On their arrival they joined the other Spanish ministers now in Mexico in a message to Dr. Juan Negrín in London asking him for instructions to guide the emigration. Dr. Negrín replied in a cable addressed to the Republican leader Antonio Velao, chairman of the recently created Spanish Democratic Union. His message, which constitutes the first political directive he has issued to his followers since he left Spain, is reproduced below, with the omission of a few brief passages dealing with matters of interest only to Spaniards in exile.]

THANKS for your loyalty, which I reciprocate. It is sealed by the acknowledgment of our common duty—not to cease until the moment arrives to answer to our country for the tasks intrusted to us in 1937<sup>1</sup> and ratified unanimously by Parliament, as prescribed by the constitution, up to its last meeting in Figueras in February, 1939.

I regret that the impossibility of communicating with you by means free from outside intervention obliges me to reply with these general considerations, which I cable for greater security of reception.

For the same reason I ask to be granted as heretofore full powers to act as the march of events may require, until the joint deliberations I desire become possible.

I have made my acts conform—and I think this should inspire our whole attitude—to the policy and decisions adopted without dissent at meetings in Paris and Montgeron in 1940, in the firm decision to accept those responsibilities that we cannot decline without deserting our duty and to await imperturbably the day when the Spanish people can freely judge our conduct and pronounce the verdict to which we all must bow. We know this day can only come with the liberation of Spain—already discernible today—in which our faith has never wavered even during the most trying periods.

Every instant has its dominant desire, and the present one is to win the war. On that we must concentrate our energies without allowing ourselves to be distracted by those things which later will be essential but today are secondary. Let us devote ourselves to that and advise all our friends to do the same, serving where we can even if our collaboration is not asked for or is even avoided.

Let us advise those who follow our inspiration not to allow themselves to be swept away by the hysteria of a "dynamism" which would reduce itself to shadow boxing and which might endanger other subtler efforts whose value is not immediately apparent.

It is essential not to waste our forces.

It is necessary to persuade our people, if they trust us, to wait without nervousness, reminding them that five more months of resistance would have changed the destiny of Spain and of the world.<sup>1</sup> They must be convinced that now the equivalent of resistance is patience.

For our part, we must preserve the same calm that through three years enabled us to keep open the only possible road toward the establishment of the constitutional legality of the Spanish republic, the calm with which we disdained all maneuvers and intrigues and endured all calumnies and instigations to persecution.

The government cannot, without abusing the hospitality that it is obliged to enjoy, act through its own proper apparatus in a way that is adequate to the political needs of Spain. Such functions belong rather to the political parties which fought in Spain and of which the government is a representative coalition. But it is in our power to stimulate persons and organizations to keep alive faith in the recovery of our country and to promote unity among all who consider it their immediate duty to prevent the totalitarian Nazi regime from consolidating itself in Spain.

The limits of unity are defined first by the purpose to secure the liberation of Spain and the reestablishment of the legal institutions which the nation created and which only the nation can modify.<sup>2</sup> Secondly, unity is limited by men's behavior, in the past as well as in the future, since we cannot permit ourselves to be confounded with those who, having delivered the defenseless people to the enemy, tried through calumnies to find an excuse for their crime.<sup>3</sup> On the other hand we cannot reject those who through blindness or error let themselves be used as unconscious agents of the totalitarian powers and who accept in advance the definitive and undoubtedly generous verdict that the country will pronounce in due time. Even less could we shut out those former comrades who fought with us in the alliance forged by the unequivocal and sovereign command of the people's will and consecrated by sorrow and death.

We would be compounding indignity with cowardice if, in order to cajole an enemy who pours his hate over our persecuted countrymen without distinction, we were to repudiate those that have paid and are paying to the common cause the costly tribute of blood.

Repudiations, which no one dared to make during the fight, must be reserved for the moment when we are restored to Spain, and the Spanish people are in a position to decide. Until then all who were faithful to the policy of resistance to the last must hold together.

Though from this distance it is impossible to appreciate in all its details and implications the development of the Spanish Democratic Union,<sup>1</sup> I consider its work of unification very efficient and hope that it will take root and spread.

If the circumstances to which I referred at the beginning prevent me from being more explicit in regard to our problems, I am obliged to be still more general when referring to our relations with the countries to which we are linked by a common cause. But a few words will be enough for our mutual understanding.

Since the destiny of Spain is bound up today with that of the United Nations—just as for three years their destiny hung on us although we were unable to make them understand it—our interests require us not to interfere in a war policy which, unhappily for everyone, we cannot influence. Having been deprived by the temporary defeat of the Spanish republic of any chance actively to affect the course of the war, we should abstain from recriminations and complaints which amount to baying at the moon, diminishing the morale in our ranks with profit only to the enemy.

Spain, always positive rather than negative in its opposition to fascism, will always be able to point to the epic and incommensurable sacrifices of those three years in which it could have served as an impregnable barrier to the Axis had it not been for the suicidal mania of the very people whom it defended. Spain's government, today dispersed, was able to foresee and understand. When we escaped from Spain we calculated accurately, as events have shown, what was going to happen. Therefore we limited ourselves to protecting our people and trying to avoid any dissension in our ranks.

When, in the summer of 1939, the war broke out in exactly the circumstances that we had predicted to influential and friendly elements in the countries affected, we offered to undertake a mediation which, judging by

War Criminal No. 1

On a man like Himmler the Allies' decision to demand the surrender of the "war criminals" after the war will have little effect. Like the other Nazi leaders he knows that there is no corner of the earth to which he can escape. But it will have an effect on the servile officials in the vassal countries. And for every European fighter for freedom it will mean more than all the other statements by Allied leaders put together. It is to be hoped that President Roosevelt's announcement will for weeks and months be used to close every daily broadcast to Europe from Britain and the United States.

But in taking action against the war criminals in general, "war criminal number 1" should not be neglected. More than any Hitler or Himmler, it is fascism itself which in the last twenty years has been responsible for the major crimes against mankind. It is fascism that must be outlawed. No pretext of "self-determination"—even of the generous sort embodied in the Atlantic Charter—should be permitted to countenance the survival of a single fascist regime.

what happened just two years later, was not entirely unrealistic.

Afterward we did everything in our power to help crystallize the present Allied coalition, the only one that, acting with initiative, audacity, decision, and inspiration, can obtain victory. Fortunately for the entire world, the extraordinary difficulties inherent in a coalition of such heterogeneous countries are offset by the coincidence of exceptional leaders in the four principal nations—it is not our function to determine the wisdom or the ineptitude of the others.

In regard to our formal relations, we must not conceal the authority with which we were invested, and rather than agree to an "ex" we prefer to omit the titles we claim.

Through information from the most direct source, I know that last summer only unforeseen developments in the war prevented the Nazi proconsuls in Spain from fully adhering to the Axis. In the fall the threat was repeated. To foretell the exact moment when it will occur again should be left to devotees of roulette or astrology, but we can be sure that it will happen when Hitler gives the order; in accordance with the German general staff's strategic plans for shifting the war toward Western and Equatorial Africa and South America.

May that development never take place, but if the prognostication should fulfil itself, the Spanish people whom we represent, forgetting their injuries and once more ready to make the sacrifice, will perform their duty.

No Neutrals Today

REAL neutrality is impossible for any European nation today. In one way or another the few governments not yet drawn into the war are compelled by the Nazis to cooperate with them.

Until very recently the Swiss, in spite of their well-known technical ability, had built no airplanes. Now they have started an airplane factory deep in the heart of Switzerland. The Journal de Genève carried an interesting account of this new activity:

In the heart of Switzerland a new airplane factory, the Pilatus Flugzeugwerke, has started operations. . . . By taking part in the official ceremony of inauguration the authorities have shown that they are in sympathy with this new industry, which will be devoted primarily to the construction of airplanes for mountainous countries in which, as here, landing possibilities are very limited. Thus the new factory has a promising future in our export industry.

There is no doubt that this new venture has received Germany's blessing. First, Germany is particularly interested in finding safe places for the production of airplanes, and Switzerland, by reason of its geographical position and formal neutrality, seems to be ideal for this purpose. Second, British bombers flying to northern Italy have frequently trespassed upon Swiss territory. The Swiss with their few planes could not protect their sky against these intrusions. Now Germany figures that Switzerland, in defending its own sky, will at the same time protect the Italian cities of Turin and Milan.

The Swiss papers speak openly about plans for the export of these new Swiss planes. There is no doubt that the direction of the export is Germany. One new type of Swiss plane—the so-called SB-2—is specially designed to land on a very small spot. This is of particular importance to Germany not only in the Caucasus but also in Norway.

The chairman of the board of directors of the Pilatus Werke is Herr Bührle, who is associated with the metal works of Winterthur, which exports almost exclusively to Germany. The financing is handled by the Elektrobank, whose German connections are well known.

There are no available figures covering the extent of the new Swiss plane production and export. However, it is known that the quantity of raw aluminum shipped to Germany from Switzerland has fallen off considerably. It is probable that Germany consents to the reduction because it will get the aluminum anyway in the form of manufactured goods, of which the most important will be the specially constructed Swiss airplanes.

would deny that Wendell Willkie has done a remarkable job. He brought to all the countries he visited a sense of the eagerness of the American people to strike. He brings back to America the clamor of the other United Nations for a general offensive against the Axis. For four weeks he was a kind of anti-Goebbels trying to reach the masses with a message that would fire their imagination.

Others may criticize him for being indiscreet.

For super-discreet behavior we give them the leading statesmen of the period before 1939. They were most admirable in their restraint. They did not think, they did not talk, they did not act. And the result of such wise statesmanship is the world as we have it today.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

AMONG the morale vitamins which are administered regularly to the German people the favorite is the allusion to the hell which would begin for every German if the war were lost. This inferno is usually described only in general terms, but at times Goebbels considers it appropriate to be more specific. Then for some weeks the public is flooded with details about the suffering that would follow defeat.

At the end of September one of these floods was let loose. A "devilish plan concocted in England and America" was unmasked. If Germany should be beaten, all children between two and six would be torn from their parents. All would be dragged off to foreign lands. Only victory will save German mothers and fathers from this monstrous atrocity.

The rock from which Goebbels's rod brought forth this flow was a letter to the editor in a Dutch newspaper published in London. The Vrij Nederland had discussed the needed reeducation of the German people, and a reader proposed that German children, instead of being brought up at home, might be transported to a democratic milieu abroad; then when they were grown up and returned to Germany they would form the nucleus of a true democracy there. The thought was not exactly a brilliant one. In any case it was only the individual idea of an individual Dutchman living in London.

In Goebbels's presentation, however, it underwent two changes. The extravagant method of reeducation suggested became a design to "exterminate the German people"; and the proposal of a newspaper reader became "the plan of Churchill and Roosevelt," those "British-American race fanatics." "Here, and not in the so-called Atlantic Charter," Goebbels wrote, "we see their true devilish purpose. . . . The world is stunned by the revelation."

Without interruption since then, the German propaganda machine has harped furiously on the rape-of-the-children fable. Obviously Dr. Goebbels is convinced that stories of this kind stand a good chance of being believed by a large part of his public. And we should be closing our minds to useful information if we did not try to understand why this chance in fact exists.

It is clear that the present-day German mentality cannot grasp the difference between a private and a public printed statement. The English radio, to which so many Germans listen, admitted that the proposal was actually published. Therefore, to the German mind, the voice that uttered it was the voice of Churchill. Can anything be printed in any country, especially a country at war, which is not ordered or at least sanctioned from "on high"? After ten years of the Nazi system very few persons in Germany can conceive of such a thing. In consequence German internal propaganda finds it fairly easy to present any private brainstorm in the Allied countries as the plan of the Allied governments.

But stories like that of the rape of the children are supported by still another circumstance. The average German knows of course that his government is capable of every brutality and every crime. And the conclusion he draws is not "This government is like that—in distinction from others," but "All governments are like that—all, without distinction."

It should also be remembered that even before Hitler just such stories as that of the children's deportation made a peculiarly strong impression on the German imagination. In 1919 millions believed the tale that Clemenceau demanded the death of twenty million Germans. In 1929 during the plebiscite "against the Young plan," millions believed that the plan provided for the deportation of hundreds of thousands of German workers to forced labor in foreign countries. Today the knowledge that many crimes of this type—mass deportation and the like—have been committed by Germany makes the idea of a retaliation in kind so much the more credible.

Most Germans consider it inevitable that they would be very badly treated after defeat. This conviction is so strong among them that to combat it becomes one of the real problems of Allied propaganda.

ORDER OF THE DAY

BY THOMAS MANN

I HAVE days now," says Tonio Kröger, the hero of one of my early tales, to his Russian friend, "when I would like to state things in general terms rather than go on telling stories." Certainly I should have to go far back in my life to find a time when my narrative output was not accompanied by theoretical excursions, critical analyses, yes, controversial productions. The novel of the young man of twenty-three, "Buddenbrooks," was the only one not interrupted in its composition by one or another piece of topical or occasional writing; and almost immediately after it was finished the era of that kind of work set in. From the beginning it always had for me an active and combative character, in contrast to the dream life of imaginative writing. In the German edition of my works there are five volumes containing hundreds of articles and essays; that shows how strong, throughout my life, has been the impulse to direct exposition, analysis, assumption of a controversial position. Indeed, it has often enough seemed to me that this wish to contribute through the medium of language to the enlightenment of the world has been, though not a more profound, at least a warmer and more passionate feeling than the careful, patient devotion to the weaving of epic music.

Not in vain had the masters of our European critique of morals—Montaigne, Chamfort, Macaulay, Emerson, Taine, Renan; Schopenhauer with his intellectual world-grasp; Nietzsche and his cultural dicta; Georg Brandes, the northern Saint-Beuve, with his illuminating analysis of literatures—not in vain had all these played upon my youth, and the impression they made upon my eagerly receptive young mind was as great as that made by the masters of imaginative writing—Tolstoi, Dostoevski, Thackeray, Balzac, Ibsen. The world of intellect seemed to me a unity; variation of form did not much matter; there was as much critique of life and society in imaginative writing as there was artistic vision and sense of form in truly great criticism. I felt annoyed at what seemed to me the tendentious distinction between the "poet" (Dichter), the naive genius, and the "publicist" (Schriftsteller), the mere intellectual, which was accepted and current in Germany; and I envied the Western languages the more general and generous terms they commanded to describe the man whose tool is language—the term "writer," the term "écrivain." The distinction preserved in Germany between Dichter and Schriftsteller is in fact the same as that between culture and civilization, to which also my youth paid some literary tribute. But my distaste for its special aesthetic concepts might have taught me that I was not made to find satisfaction for long in its more general political ones. In any case, it was evident that poets with brains and a good style were not a Western monopoly; for there was Lessing, in whom Germany actually experienced something that might be described as the birth of poetry out of the spirit of criticism. Germany's greatest dramatist, who was at the same time its greatest rhetorician and dialectician, Schiller, presented it with the most profound and brilliant essay in the language, the immortal "Naive and Sentimental Poetry." Figures like Heine and Nietzsche bear witness to the close bond between lyric and critique. What, I asked myself, are the Germans after, with their mechanical antithesis? Mechanical, because it draws a rigid line between "writing" and "creating," whereas the line does not run outwardly, between products, but inwardly, inside the organic personality. Enthusiasts for simplification underestimate the difficulties of such a division, which is constantly being blurred and blotted out by the operative principle in language. An art whose medium is the word must always evince a high degree of critical creativeness; language itself is criticism of life; it calls by name, it hits things off, it characterizes and judges by virtue of giving life to what it deals with.

For my own part, I have always felt like both author and publicist at once; indeed, I reject the view that an author may not be controversial, that he must accept the world as it is, in all simpleness and high-mindedness, not saying a word, and then give it back transmuted in his art. I know full well the feeling which Lessing called "that rascally irascibility"; though I did not believe that the artist was degraded when he recognized badness, stupidity, baseness, and corruption in the world, when he felt irate and gave expression to the feeling. The author as a being who sees nothing, marks nothing, guesses nothing, whose pure simplicity calmly lets itself be used as a front by wickedness and self-interest—that may suit our beloved "things as they are," but true artists have never been such simpletons as that.

The Hebrew prophets, wrathfully warning and admonishing their people, were poets too, and mighty ones, though their poetry took critical form; and prophecy, on the other hand, as sensitive anticipation, suffering and clairvoyant perception of the time and the future, is an essential element of all higher employ of language, of all creative writing. I have only to look round in my own small domain to be aware of the fact; and I can but smile when I hear it said of me that my stories have no inner reference to the new time and its problems; that exile was needed "to force him out of his aristocratic retirement and make him assume his natural role of leadership."<sup>1</sup> Really? "Fiorenza," "Death in Venice," "Mario and the Magician," to say nothing of "The Magic Mountain"—all that was aristocratic retirement, unconscious and unconcerned about the problem of the time? But as for my political heart-searchings and the kind of leadership usually bound up with them, they are not merely nine years old, they go back almost a generation, and it took not exile but the year 1914 and the moral and political world crisis in the midst of which we still are to make of me an avowed and confessed combatant.

It was then that I wrote "The Reflections of a Non-Political Man," a work of shattering introspectiveness, passionate self-assertion, and militant defense of an intellectual Germany, in which was rooted all that I had so far had to give, all my product up to "Death in Venice." This book, then, was the extended prologue to a long series of manifestos and attestations.<sup>2</sup> They serve to mark the crises of events, and sometimes of my own personal destiny as well. Only two of them go back to the time before my emigration. Of the German Republic was originally written for the leading German periodical, Die Neue Rundschau, as a tribute to Gerhart Hauptmann on his sixtieth birthday; and then it was given as a lecture, already against considerable opposition, in the Beethovensaal in Berlin. It was addressed particularly to the youth of Germany, in an effort to reconcile them with the domestic political results of the war of 1914-18; the voice of traditional culture sought to speak out on the side and in favor of the new necessities; to give democracy a gloss of the familiar by linking it with German romanticism. At the same time it is a good illustration of the way self-examination and self-justification go hand in hand with intent to instruct; and good evidence for the social character of intellectual effort, which, for all its solitary nature, yet claims to be representative and is inwardly concerned to help others attain clarity. However, this address, written ten years before Hitler's seizure of power, and to some extent keeping within the academic frame, bears witness to my early horror of German nationalism in defeat, and of what—having already provoked the assassination of Rathenau—was brewing within it. When I spoke out in favor of the Weimar Republic, whose officials applauded my words amid the catcalls of the gallery, I did not do so for its own sake, for I knew its weaknesses, its inadequacy to a revolutionary situation, and even its errors of principle. That which, quite against my nature and inclination, drove me into the arena was the feeling that it was my duty to pledge all the intellectual credit I had—and that not only in a literary but a personal sense—in a public hall, before an actual audience, to the struggle against the frightful, world-menacing thing which I saw growing and increasing, and of which the world was to learn—too late.

In 1925 appeared the novel of which the Republic speech was an offshoot, "The Magic Mountain." Its almost riotous success in Germany might have reassured me that a feeling for my kind of Germanness was not lacking there, nor a freely arising sympathy and concern for the problems of the time. But such a consolation would have been illusory. The Reichstag elections of 1930 resulted in the first mass successes of that demagoguery, committed to every sort of violence and lies, which already bore the name of the National Socialist German Workers' Party, every single word of the combination being a fraud. And with the feeling that it might soon be all up with free speech in Germany, I repeated, now almost at the eleventh hour, my attempt to avert the calamity by persuasion. It sounds quixotic now. On the spot where I had talked of the German Republic I addressed the Appeal to Reason to an audience some elements of which were in noisy opposition. Its essential purpose was to make the German citizen understand that if German freedom and world peace were anyhow to be saved, his political station in the struggle was by the side of the workingman. A bourgeois-Socialist alliance, a compromise between democracy and socialism, which to-day the whole world sees as the indispensable condition of future well-being and the price of victory in the present war, might at that moment have saved Germany and the world from catastrophe. But the idea was only sentimental raving, doomed to be drowned out by peals of mocking laughter. There are acts at the recollection of which one shakes one's head, yet is aware that one was obliged to commit them, and would commit them again.

These addresses of 1923 and 1930 were still directed to Germany only; they were contributions to a still free or at least half-free internal discussion. Europe Beware, written in Switzerland five years later, was a warning addressed to the world at large, a world which had long ago given signs of not caring at all to be warned. The essay originated in an address which I had intended to make before the Comité permanent des lettres et des arts of the League of Nations, then sitting at Nice, of which I was a member. Circumstances prevented me from being present at the sittings of that year, but my speech was translated into French and read in my absence; there was a lively discussion, some members agreeing but the majority dissenting. The French in particular found très exagéré the pessimism of my description of the state of Europe and the dangers threatening the Continent. Poor France!

The biggest battle yet rages at Stalin-grad to a shrill accompaniment of eerie political moves. A Democratic President sends a Republican rival to criticize him from the comparative security of the Kremlin, and Stalin tells an American newsman that America was promises.

When dirty linen is washed in public, what goes on in private? You can not hope to know unless you see the war in terms of its master-strategy and from the inside as John Scott saw it:—as a duel for Europe between Stalin and Hitler.

The democracies of the world had pocketed up the Japanese attentat in Manchoukuo. They had submitted to the affront in Abyssinia. There followed the Spanish civil war and that shameful connivance at a fascist insurrection by the governing clique of the great powers; it took the form of "non-intervention" and it paved the way to Munich. The article called I Stand with the Spanish People I wrote for the paper of a Socialist-feminist organization in Switzerland.

The creation of a German-language organ for the free discussion of moral, political, and aesthetic problems, the bi-monthly periodical Mass und Wert, was decided on in collaboration with the courageous Zürich publisher Emil Oprecht, and it was arranged that I should be its editor. The restrictions upon its sphere of influence due to the forays of Hitler Germany ended its existence after twenty-four numbers had appeared. An essay bearing the same name introduced the first number.

Of all my political utterances the one which has made the profoundest impression and had the widest circulation is the reply to the communication of the dean of the philosophical faculty of Bonn University apprising me that in consequence of my loss of German citizenship I had been divested of the doctorate I held from that university. It was written at the end of 1936 in the same study at Küsnacht on the Lake of Zürich where I finished "Joseph in Egypt" and wrote the greater part of "The Beloved Returns," while already preparing for my Princeton professorship. Oprecht was to bring it out in pamphlet form, and I well remember how he grasped my hand in his emotion after I had read it aloud to him that New Year's Eve. How great and splendid is the writer's mission! His it is to couch in adequate and permanent form matter which moves thousands to their depths to read. How the dignity and the recognition of the mission are heightened in times like these! This letter—by the way, it did actually go off to the dean to whom it is addressed—was quickly translated into almost all languages, even Japanese, and was talked about everywhere. In Germany it circulated in typed copies or in the quaint camouflaged pamphlets of the underground propaganda. Possession of the text was dangerous; so the young folk learned it by heart, thus owning it in a way the police could not fasten on.

I wrote The Coming Victory of Democracy while still in Switzerland, and it was printed in German in Stockholm. This was the first piece of work entirely for the American public; thus it constitutes the bridge in my life, the literary transition from the Old World, whose ground was slipping from under my feet, to the new, where, however, I had formed contacts through repeated visits since the year after leaving Germany.

On my first visit to California, in 1938, in Beverly Hills, I wrote down the considerations set forth under the title A Brother. This is the only one of my political articles directly occupied with the personality whom fate has ordained as the instrument to test the courage and conscience of our society, to say nothing of its wisdom—a test which for too long it has ill sustained. Thanks to his own baseness he has indeed succeeded in exposing much of our own. The ineffable disgust this man has always inspired in me is here held in check by an ironic approach which seems to me to bring the little study closest to the artist sphere.

It pleases me that owing to the chronological sequence the piece on Pastor Niemöller's last sermons should form the conclusion of the forthcoming volume. The little preface was conceived in sincere admiration for the witness here borne for his faith by a priest and churchman with whose intellectual sphere I have otherwise not much in common. What makes it an appropriate close to the collection is that it repeats and reaffirms the leading theme of the whole—namely, the indivisibility of the human being, the totality of spirit. It flowed from the subject that the political should frankly speak the language of religion—and rightly so. For religion is man's ultimate concern; and the moving principle of all thinking and writing is that which, in the "Joseph" series, I have called "concern with God."

VIRGINIA WOOLF AS CRITIC

BY LOUIS KRONENBERGER

AT THE same moment we are given a posthumous book by Virginia Woolf and two books about her.<sup>1</sup> Of the two, Mr. Forster's, originally a Cambridge lecture, is the brief memoir of a friend, charming yet candid, full of sharp comments and animating touches, but too short to say all it might; that of Mr. Daiches is the interpretation of a critic, painstaking, sometimes penetrating, and too long for what there is to say. Virginia Woolf's own book, like the two "Common Readers," is made up mainly of critical essays, and coming when it does, perhaps serves to emphasize what Mr. Forster and Mr. Daiches tend to slight—the importance of Virginia Woolf's criticism in the general body of her work. Mr. Forster gives but two or three sentences to her criticism, and Mr. Daiches a dozen of his 157 pages. The fact is easily explained: Virginia Woolf nowhere altered the face of criticism as she did the face of the novel, she extended no critical frontiers, she attracted no critical disciples. All the same, Mr. Forster's and Mr. Daiches's relative allotment of space may not be posterity's, for Mrs. Woolf forged her criticism into something quite as distinctive as her novels, and the best of it may well survive everything else she wrote except "To the Lighthouse" and "Mrs. Dalloway," and may conceivably survive them.

Which is all the more interesting seeing that, in addition to being no critical innovator, Virginia Woolf was in one sense really no critic. At least her real strength did not lie in any remarkable powers of mind, any systematic principles of criticism. In fifty pages of any first-rank critic we shall find more inminating ideas than in all three volumes of Mrs. Woolf. Where we do find a purely critical perception, it is likely to seem neither new nor old, and we are likely to value it for its pertinence rather than its originality, or for the light it throws on Virginia Woolf. Thus she says of Euripides, "To understand him it is not so necessary to understand Greek as to understand poetry"; or of the Elizabethans, "The Elizabethans bore us because they suffocate our imaginations rather than set them to work"; or of Sterne, "Sterne, from fear of coarseness, is forced into indecency." These are things, we feel, that beyond any question Virginia Woolf discovered for herself, but we feel too that they say more succinctly what someone else has said first.

With rare exceptions (Modern Fiction, How It Strikes a Contemporary, Mr. Bennett and Mrs. Brown—all of them more or less critical defense of her creative methods), Mrs. Woolf is hardly more a suggestive critic than she is a systematic one. She seldom reacts to literature in a purely critical way: to the writing of her own time she reacted as a writer; to the literature of the past she responded, for the most part, as a reader. She was in the one case more combative than critical, and in the other more appreciative. What seems best in her approach to the classics is a superb responsiveness: she had fine imagination and extraordinary sensibility; she was a born reader and could assimilate effortlessly, but she was also a very cultivated reader, and could correlate and compare.

Having both an aesthetic and a historical sense, she was capable of really informed appreciation; but having an artistic gift also, she chose not merely to record an author's quality but to reproduce it in a form, a framework, of her own. What she distills is much less the meaning of a writer or a period than the temperament, the savor, the personality: she is a kind of highly skilful portrait painter who catches the style of her model while imposing a style of her own. We shall not learn from her just what the Greeks or the Elizabethans, Montaigne or Chaucer, signify, but we do know how they look. She reveals them, with beautiful clarity, in a mirror: it is for others to peer down at them through a microscope. Accordingly her best work, most of which will be found in the first "Common Reader," has about it a real charm of artistry. One reads it a little less for profit than for pleasure, for its freshness, its shapeliness, its sensitiveness, for its language, its wit, its sense of poetry. The poet in Virginia Woolf constantly pleads for a hearing in these essays, as in her novels it ultimately insists on being heard.

After the first "Common Reader" the language becomes a little too fine; the style, at moments, tends to inflate the contents. For like too many other writers Virginia Woolf began to evolve something approaching a formula; she lost the secret of her earlier distinction as soon as she discovered in what it lay. What had once been highly individual begins to seem, in "The Second Common Reader," merely professional. There is less submerged poetry and more protruding rhetoric. The particular insights become fewer, the generalizations and analogies more frequent. Virginia Woolf is not so much writing about what she has read as reading something in order to write about it. A note even of cleverness has crept into it. On one page of an essay on Hazlitt a painfully smart sentence crops up, and on the next page a curiously flat one. There is something overwritten about the essay on Hardy. Mrs. Woolf still writes extremely well, but one feels that she has no desire to write differently. There is no sense here of trying to break the mold, to alter the pattern, as there always was in her fiction.

"The Death of the Moth" reveals a further decline, though some of it must be judged as early work and some as in not quite final form. But additional polish would hardly have given additional weight. Here, to be sure, are many things that give pleasure. Here is urbane and witty writing on urbane and witty writers—Gibbon, Walpole, Mme de Sévigné. Here are quick flashes of insight: Strachey, says Mrs. Woolf, succeeded with "Queen Victoria" because he respected biography as a craft, and failed at "Elizabeth and Essex" because he tried to make it into an art. "The phrase," she says of George Moore, "came before the emotion." Here are pointed, though sometimes rather shallow and even querulous, comments, as this one concerning modern poetry: "The poet is much less interested in what we have in common than in what he has apart." Here, indeed, is a good deal of the old skill. And yet there is far too much emptiness and inadequacy—nothing, for example, could be more disappointing than the essays on Henry James. Too many of these pieces are book reviews, lectures, jeux d'esprit, made-to-order things that disappoint even as they divert us. The style, moreover, is full of horrible Stracheyan flourishes.

And then we turn to the book again, and to our amazement we find that the rocking-horse has left the ground; we are mounted on a winged steed; we are sweeping in wide circles through the air and below us Europe unfolds; the ages change and pass; a miracle has taken place.

Tradition, which hampered Virginia Woolf in fiction, greatly helped her in criticism, but only up to a certain point. She was at home in the past, and happy there; she accepted what the classics had to give without quarrel, sometimes without challenge; feasted off them, time and again envied the terms on which the old writers could write—with a sense of their age and their audience behind them. Aware—heavily aware, as a novelist—that all this had broken down in her own age of flux, she was possibly a little undiscerning and literary about the past, a little too fascinated with its décor and not quite enough concerned with its large outlines. For acute as her historical sense clearly was, it preeminently reflected the student of manners; she was most at home, after all, in the eighteenth century. What almost equally drew her to the past, however, were its echoing corridors, its grace of distance, its poetry. Both these interests reveal that intense literary feeling which was so distinctive and valuable a part of Virginia Woolf, and which she could embody in entirely consonant prose. This is what she could do best, and what she could do better than anyone else of her time. She will survive, not as a critic, but as a literary essayist recording the adventures of a soul among congenial masterpieces. For on the whole she did not approach—modern authors excepted—what she could not in some real sense enjoy. Her tastes in the classics were surprisingly catholic, and her range, at first glance, seems amazingly broad. Yet the writers who are most downright, and masculine, and central in their approach to life—a Fielding or a Balzac—she for the most part left untouched. (They fathered, of course, the contemporary fiction that she most disliked.) Her own approach was at once more subterranean and aerial, and invincibly, almost defiantly, feminine.

G. B. S. Unrevealed

G. B. S.: A FULL LENGTH PORTRAIT. By Hesketh Pearson. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

HESKETH PEARSON is the justly popular author of several very entertaining biographies. Apparently he has known Bernard Shaw, casually at least, over a period of years, and the present volume, written "with the active assistance" of the subject, carries one of those very guarded imprimaturs which Shaw occasionally allows to be placed on books about himself. According to the jacket, it is "the most Boswellian biography since Boswell's 'Johnson,'" and the minimal meaning of that grandiose claim is evidently that the intention of the author was, first of all, to reveal a personality.

To the best of my knowledge none of the many previous books about Shaw has succeeded in doing anything like that, and the present one does not do it either. Mr. Pearson, in preparation for his substantial volume of nearly four hundred very closely printed pages, has obviously carefully studied previous biographers and also addressed to his subject various questions which Shaw has answered with that deceptive air of hearty frankness he previously assumed when replying to the queries of Archibald Henderson. As a result, Mr. Pearson appears to have got a certain number of new facts, as well as possibly more accurate versions of several incidents. But somehow neither the new material nor the old adds up to a warm or intimate portrait, and it is evident now if it was not before that G. B. S., who looks like one of the best subjects in the world, is actually either unrewarding or so difficult that no one yet has done a really good job.

Since it is a personality that he is after, Mr. Pearson neither attempts to synthesize the elements of Shaw's bewilderingly centrifugal philosophy nor offers any elaborate critical analysis of the plays. Like Henderson before him, and following, no doubt, Shaw's own insistence on the importance of the epoch, he devotes a great deal of space to the pre-playwriting days of Socialist activity. But Shaw remains merely a man who did energetically an amazing number of different things. He is still merely the maker of certain speeches, the author of certain pamphlets and books and plays. The heart of the machine is as obscure as ever. What old-fashioned biographies used to call "the man" as distinguished from "the works" simply isn't there—as, of course, he isn't in Henderson's even longer and even more official biography.

One difficulty with Shaw as a subject is simply that a writer has to be "explained" in terms other than his own and that Shaw is so voluble and so explicit that the critic all but inevitably finds himself using the author's own explanation of what is to be explained. But though that is the reason why criticism of Shaw has generally been less interesting as well as less rewarding than criticism of writers far less original than he, it still leaves open the question why the personality should remain so very elusive. Perhaps, of course, Shaw's own insistence that he has no personality in the ordinary sense of the term may be true. Perhaps he is only that thinking and writing and talking machine which he likes to present to the public, and is therefore one of those great men who are what they are because they are less as well as more than ordinary human beings. But the photographs are the photographs of a man, not the photographs of a machine, and the suspicion arises that there has never been anything remotely approaching a "Boswellian" biography for the simple reason that what the biographers know about Shaw is precisely what he wants them to know and not one thing more.

Of course the biographer of any living man is working under very severe limitations, and in the imprimatur mentioned above Shaw reminds his present biographer of the fact by remarking that "no sane publisher will touch a biography or essay unless he has some assurance that I am not going to be unpleasant about it." But not all living men have been so anxious as he to remain a voice and nothing else, or so successful in keeping from the public knowledge of anything except a public career. Both the present biography and Henderson's give the impression of being fully documented. But does either, or does any other book about Shaw, contain anything of importance which did not come from Shaw himself or at least pass through his censorship? Did any biographer ever actually discover anything, or did he ever present any account of any incident of importance except in the Shavian version? Shaw evidently sends acceptable inquirers away very happy indeed with written answers to all sorts of questions—which written answers obviously enhance the value of any book. But he always seemed to be laughing at Henderson's delight with the official hand-outs, and I am not sure that he is not at least smiling at Pearson also, who is so anxious to print what Shaw wants him to make public. Like a wily witness under cross-examination he seems to have nothing to conceal. Even the most personal questions concerning his sex life or the lack of it he answers with a hearty, "Why, you see it is like this." The questioner cannot think of anything else to ask. But the upshot of it all is that there wasn't really anything to tell. Being a master of rationalization Shaw neatly rationalizes away his own personality.

Since he is hardly the kind of man who keeps indiscreet private papers in a trunk where they may be discovered by prying eyes after his death, perhaps the secret of his personality or the secret of his failure to have one will die with him. But if a real portrait ever is drawn it may be by someone who has peeped through some keyholes to which no eye has to date been successfully applied. In so far as any writer has tried the method, he has always seen only what the inquisitive biologist saw when he tried to spy on the private behavior of an ape. He has, that is to say, looked straight into the eye of the subject on the other side of the door.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Great Issue

EUROPE, RUSSIA, AND THE FUTURE. By G. D. H. Cole. The Macmillan Company. $2.

THAT the peace, if it is made by the present governments of the United Nations, will be a reactionary one is more or less a foregone conclusion. It has seemed to many European liberals that the entry of the United States has tended to guarantee that the present imperialist governments will be carried over into the immediate post-war world. In Britain, also, partnership with the United States, while it has given new confidence, has encouraged the Conservatives to stand pat. One doubts whether the Tories would have been so adamant on India had Britain's only major ally been the Soviet Union. Most Socialists have had similar thoughts, I suppose, but have been too fearful of damaging the war effort to voice them. Mr. Cole has been thinking about these and germane matters, and he will not be silent. Almost every problem that lurks behind the superficial arguments of the day is courageously and often illuminatingly discussed in "Europe, Russia, and the Future."

It is the easier to draw profit from this book because its author starts from a single strategic assumption. Mr. Cole, who did not wait until June, 1941, to discover the anti-fascist character of the war, nevertheless believes that Hitler's attack on the U. S. S. R. has radically changed the political nature of the conflict. There are now, he says, only two possible endings: the establishment of Nazism as the dominant force in Europe, or the establishment of socialism. The restoration of the old state system upon a basis of capitalism he believes to be possible only if "reactionary capitalism comes back to power in the United States and finds itself in a position to dictate terms," or if the British capitalists decide to place themselves under American protection, as they may well do. That the power of the capitalists continues unbroken in Britain Mr. Cole seems well aware, though he grants some force to the fallacious argument that the institutions of war-time collectivism will turn out to be obstacles to the "restoration" of capitalism. Those institutions have in no fundamental sense altered the class relationships within Britain. Taking all these factors into account, however, Mr. Cole states clearly that because its basic economic and cultural institutions are Socialist, the Soviet Union must necessarily be the rallying point for the forces of socialism. That belief, Mr. Cole insists, does not logically involve a surrender to the Communists, nor does it mean that one should shut one's eyes to the political defects of the Soviet system. But the preeminence of the U. S. S. R. must be the guiding axiom of Socialist thought.

The reviewer agrees with both the positive demand and the reservation but wishes that Mr. Cole had more rigorously followed out the Marxist element in his thinking. At times he seems to regard Social Democracy and Sovietism as possible alternatives. At other times he appears himself to alternate between the two philosophies under the impression that he is thereby harmonizing them. One does not put oneself above factions by paying week-end visits to both, or by commuting between them in successive paragraphs. And toward the end of his book Mr. Cole's original laxity compels him to do exactly that. To one who believes, as Mr. Cole does, that the soviet is the rallying point for socialism, it is utterly inadmissible to say that though one dislikes certain features of Soviet life, it is more important to fasten one's attention upon the valuable features. If there are distortions in Soviet socialism, even though they be temporary and removable, then they will necessarily have their effect on every action and phase of the world struggle. Just as the hostility of the capitalist democracies and the cowardice and insincerity of the Second International inclined the Soviet government to mistaken policies—though this is by no means the entire explanation of those errors—so it is natural that so powerful a force as the Soviet Union, if its structure contains important defects, will, in adopting wrong tactics, deflect every other nation, government, class, and party. That such is the case the course of history visibly proves.

The result of this general weakness is that Mr. Cole is obscure at critical moments. The all-important revolution is the German revolution. Shall we, then, work for a Soviet or a Social Democratic type of revolution? he asks; and in posing the question in that fashion discloses a curious misunderstanding of revolution. We are, I suppose, to understand that a Social Democratic revolution is one that sets up a parliament and avoids or instantly curtails the period of "dual power" by suppressing the soviet or whatever organism is born of the insurrection itself. The Soviet type of revolution, one supposes, denies existence to or curtails the life of any parliament or democratic institution of the ordinary type. It is not a very good formulation, one may remark.

But Mr. Cole's answer is at least courageous, if unsatisfactory. German exiles and their friends must work for a Soviet revolution as the one that has the greater chance of success. And after the Hitler regime is overthrown, it would seem, the question of parliament must be thrashed out in the German soviets. That both the Social Democrats and the Communists are likely to be controlled by other powers, Mr. Cole hints when he says that the German revolution will be impossible if the Social Democrats push one kind of revolution and the Soviet Union another. It is here that he shows some awareness of the consequences of Soviet malformation. The Communists, he seems to think, will try to obtain control of the soviets with the intention of suppressing all other parties. He deplors this but constantly allows one to get the impression that, democratic as true soviets can be, and as he asserts they are, there is an opposition between soviets and democracy. And, he says, "If the Germans adopt Soviet communism as a means of overthrowing Hitlerism and building their new state, they will be very thorough about it . . . terribly thorough in many ways. I do not want this to happen. I want it not to happen." And strengthening one's belief that he opposes soviets to democracy in his innermost thought, Mr. Cole asserts that totalitarianism is much more natural to Germans than to Russians. He would like the new German republic to "come

A STUDY OF WAR is the fruit of fifteen years of research carried on at the University of Chicago under the direction of Quincy Wright. Just published, it contains the answers to literally hundreds of questions on the practical problems of war—its causes, its technologies, its functions, its effects on society, its economic and political control, the probabilities of predicting it, the possibilities of preventing it—all matters of universal interest today, and of front-rank importance for the future.

For every writer, commentator, teacher, student and theorist on the social phenomenon of war, this book is a virtual necessity—to be kept at hand for ready consultation. Yet A STUDY OF WAR is a book for reading and reflection as well—to every citizen who wants to examine the facts and figures on the progressing destructive intensity of warfare through the ages of Man, and to study the practical problem of war prevention in all its aspects.

With numerous statistical tables; maps; diagrams; complete index; appendixes.

Over 1,500 pages.

into the Western family of [Socialist] nations." "But frankly I doubt the possibility of this happening." Apparently he would have us work for a revolution he does not want.

One is bound to say that all this offers poor theoretical ground for unity. And yet, with Mr. Cole, one is forced to declare that close cooperation between the Second and Third Internationals is absolutely essential if we are not to be doomed to the endless disaster of consecutive wars. The problem is tremendously difficult. As I see it, the Communist Party, while remaining the only vigorous and unfailingly resolute socialist party, is nowadays incapable of valid revolution because of its too close dependence upon the present Soviet regime. Its socialism, if it did succeed in obtaining power, would duplicate the Russian Soviet defects. On the other hand, the other socialist parties have been so terrified of struggle and of the possibilities of capitalist insurrection, in the Franco style, that they have virtually ceased to be socialist. What we should have liked from the author is a discussion of the problem of surmounting this disastrous division. Is it possible that historical events will mold the two movements and in so doing knead them together? From time to time Mr. Cole seems to be on the point of discussing this question.

Liberal readers will perhaps be surprised that Mr. Cole has no interest in debating about the nature of peace treaties. That abstention, of course, is due to his realistic socialism. On the other hand, he does spend some time in somewhat ideal discussion of the principles of European reorganization. In place of these latter questions there are others which ought to have been given fundamental treatment.

The lesson of last time is that when the European Socialist revolutions begin, they will meet opposition from the Allied governments unless these latter have been changed or unless the phenomenon of dual power, with its threat of revolution, appears. (The Westminster Labor Congress of 1920, in defense of the U. S. S. R., was an embryo "state.") This is primarily a European problem, of course, but the attitude of the American people toward the new Europe will be so important that we should have been well served had Mr. Cole dealt with this aspect of the war.

However, this book so much surpasses in realism any other Socialist discussion of the post-war world that, with all its weaknesses, it cannot be ignored. Nor should plain liberals fail to read it. For the lesson of last time is surely that the immediate problems raised by the collapse of the Axis will be those Mr. Cole discusses. RALPH BATES

Anna Seghers

THE SEVENTH CROSS. By Anna Seghers. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

ANNA SEGHERS is perhaps the most talented German novelist to appear since Thomas Mann and Hermann Broch. Her abiding theme is the Socialist revolution—more specifically, the Communist Party's efforts toward it in Germany and Central Europe in the twenty years between the two wars. Her novels are "activized," filled with political activity, its problems and dangers—not those of politics pure and simple but of political action, of performance. Feminine sensibility is caught up by movement and the drive of large issues. Notwithstanding their theme, her novels really have little of what is commonly associated with the political novel. They cannot be confined within such categories as proletarian literature or "socialist realism"—however much Seghers may have tried to cut her cloth to their measure. She has too much art.

Seghers's latest novel has not the perfection of her first, "The Revolt of the Fishermen" (a fishermen's strike on an island in the North Sea); nor has it the vitality and regional flavor of "The Price on His Head" (rural Germany on the eve of Hitler); it lacks the panorama and interest of "Companions of the Road" (the Third International in exile and underground in Eastern Europe) and the excitement of "The Road Through February" (the uprising of the Austrian Socialists in 1934). It does not constitute the step in Seghers's development that was to have been expected after her previous book, "The Rescue" (a mining suburb in eastern Germany between 1929 and 1933). This was in some ways her most ambitious work. "The Seventh Cross" is less ambitious and less serious. It wants to move more by the facts of plot than by the modulation of character and situation. The balance between external adventure and interiority so characteristic of Seghers's writing is upset slightly in the direction of the former. Technically, the book is a model of tension and cumulative effect; Seghers knows her trade, and her outright talent leaves its trace on anything she touches. Thriller that it is, "The Seventh Cross" has enough of her very original obliquity of perception to place it on a higher level than any other novel about Nazi Germany that has been translated into English.

Seven men break out of a concentration camp in the Rhineland. Six of them are recaptured, alive or dead, within a few days. The seventh, after a week of wandering and hiding and of agonizingly tight scrapes, makes good his escape, aided not only by his own moral and physical toughness but even more decisively by the solidarity among conscious and unconscious anti-fascists in Germany that rises to the surface when acted upon by the right catalyst. That only one out of seven should succeed in escaping from a concentration camp is not a defeat; on the contrary, it is a triumph. For "the strong can afford to be wrong at times without loss of prestige, because even the most powerful are after all only human—yes, their mistakes make them all the more human—but he who claims omnipotence must never be wrong because there can be no alternative to omnipotence except insignificance. If one stroke, no matter how tiny, proved successful against the enemy's alleged omnipotence, everything was won." This is the first of Seghers's novels to have actually as well as morally a happy ending. Before this, the moral victories with which they always closed were unadulterated by any real ones.

The typical motifs of Seghers's previous novels—the fugitive, the awakening of political consciousness, and the intrusion of politics upon the family and the community—reappear in "The Seventh Cross." No one has got the family and the humble milieu into writing better than she has. The constant argument of her other stories is also here: how one meets the challenge to one's moral and physical courage of revolutionary action. And just as in most of her other books, the narrative is developed along multiple threads. There is a succession of discontinuous scenes, the writing eye now falling on the fugitive, now on his friends, now on the friends of his friends, now on his family, now on his pursuers, now on those whose path he is about to cross. Characteristic of Seghers's writing is the taut atmosphere in which all relations are intense, every fact evidence in a test, and each move results in a disturbance of equilibrium that exposes one to the trials of another test. Sense impressions not only establish for her the physical context but color and are colored by the struggle of the protagonist with his enemies within and without. And her style itself is a triumph, for it is as well as communicates her story. The very word order tells something, and her supple prose, with its power of understatement, accounts as much as anything else for the weight, the nervous substantiality, of her world. Much of this cannot come over into another tongue—the present translation, while satisfying the requirements of smooth English, is not adequate to Seghers's unique German.

The difficulty is to puzzle out why, Seghers being as good a writer as she is, her novels are not really first-rate. This latest book gives us perhaps more light than before, because here she has frankly embraced her weaknesses. The task of art is to impose the greatest possible organic unity upon the greatest diversity. The gauge of achievement is not only the degree of unity or perfection of form—any piece of kitsch has that—but also the resistance of the material unified. How far does the artist strain toward completeness before applying the controls of his art? The material Seghers attempts to shape is diverse, vivid, resistant to any simple logic, and pregnant with the half and double meanings of authentic experience; her initial interest in it seems to go beyond the points she extracts from it. Yet it is all weighted toward a significance and a moral derived from an incomplete—in so far as it is only political—view, which infects everything with its obligatory optimism and makes it come out as it is expected to. The trouble is not with politics in itself but with the incomplete resolutions offered by the merely political view. Either the political artist poses too elementary a situation, or else, which is much more rare, he resolves too simply, as Seghers does, situations presented in all the complexity of the real. The first does business with counterfeit money; the second practices dishonest book-keeping with genuine cash. Professor Kress and his wife, both of them genuine characters in a genuine situation, are on cool terms, but after they have taken the tremendous risk of sheltering and helping the fugitive they find a new understanding and warmth for each other. Again, one of two friends together in a restaurant recognizes the fugitive and mentions it to the other; they decide not to tell the police, and as a result an estrangement between them is healed. The difficulties of personal relationships, a problem in two terms, is solved in only one.

How could Seghers's feeling for the ambiguity of experience—which she has—have permitted her to invent such a character as Wallau? Moving spirit of the prison break and a leader of the underground opposition, he is without a flaw, infallible in principle and an absolute source of moral power. Such a character makes it too easy to exploit faith, loyalty, fortitude, and physical courage as unshaded virtues.

And then there is George Heisler, the hero of "The Seventh Cross." His character is so given through the memories of a friend that we have trouble in making up our minds about him, as about any character seriously presented in fiction. Yet at the same time his psychology, as it is presented immediately by the author, conforms too patly to what we expect—in our weakness—of the hero of any story. Outside his friend's mind George is just a tough Bolshevik, and the Stalinist prescription for that kind of hero is as trite as any other, almost.

The trouble, however, is not that Frau Seghers is a Stalinist. Let us be thankful that she is at least that, that she is for socialism. Rather—what lack in herself of intelligence or of depth or patience has allowed her extraordinary talents to be short-circuited by her political convictions? It devolved upon her own conscience as an artist to recognize that a good deal of life is as yet only explicable through its imitation in art and that it is the business of the serious novelist to explore questions in person before delivering their answers.

Memoirs of André Maurois

I REMEMBER, I REMEMBER. By André Maurois. Translated by Denver and Jane Lindley. Harper and Brothers. $3.

MARCEL PROUST said: "Wisdom cannot be handed down or taught. We must discover it ourselves after a voyage that no one can spare us, for it is an attitude toward life." André Maurois, who greatly admires Proust and certainly knows this maxim, might have used these lines as an epigraph for his memoirs, which reflect on every page the wisdom of the brilliant schoolboy, that of the Norman industrialist, that of the soldier, that of the cosmopolitan and man of the world, that, finally, of the writer who achieved the highest recognition in his own country only to find himself exiled by the same invaders who forced his parents in 1871 to emigrate from their native Alsace.

But despite the official honors bestowed upon him, a great component of André Maurois's wisdom is the very modesty which prevents him from thinking of himself as wise. Indeed, the charm of his memoirs comes chiefly from their admirable discretion. The biographer of Shelley, Byron, Disraeli, who began his literary career with a subtle and effervescent commentary upon the British during the First World War, allies a truly Anglo-Saxon discretion with a Gallic love of clarity. Just as forty years ago on the benches of Alain's famous class in the Rouen lycée he applied himself to abstruse metaphysical problems, so today he strives to understand clearly the events of his own life.

The story of his evolution from the rich manufacturer Emile Herzog into the urbane writer and academician André Maurois and that of his first idyllic marriage with a Russian girl whom he schooled as Molière's heroes used to do are related with consummate tact and grace. For the first time one is able to appreciate justly the autobiographical element in such novels as "Atmosphere of Love" and to see just how, like all really creative writers, Maurois has nourished his imaginary characters on real emotions, as he so happily says.

The last chapters of "I Remember, I Remember" present an attractive portrait of the second Mme Maurois, a worthy granddaughter of Anatole France's Egeria, Mme Arman de Caillavet, and an analysis of the weakness of France in 1940, which adds little to what the writer had already said in "Tragedy in France."

But André Maurois's memoirs do not provide a mask for political arguments. The index does not contain the name of De Gaulle, and Pétain figures here only as a member of the Academy and personal friend. Ignoring the unhappy dissension which then divided the French in America, the writer expresses thus his attitude upon arriving here in 1940: "My duty, it seemed to me, was to serve unhappy France to the extreme limit of possibility without asking anything in return. I determined in my speeches to defend, not of course what seemed to me indefensible, but French culture, the memory of our dead, the honor of our army, and above all the French children and the French prisoners who had such great need of aid from America." One cannot but approve, but is it quite loyal of Maurois to suggest that the alternative was to follow his own interests and "make a conspicuous break"? Even though the Germans have confiscated his French holdings and Vichy would outlaw him as a Jew, it is not so easy for a man whose mother and children are still in France to discern where his interests lie. Beyond a doubt André Maurois is daily performing his duty as a French citizen, but so are others who have made the break with no more thought of interest than he.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Dictionnaire Philosophique

A NEW DICTIONARY OF QUOTATIONS ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES FROM ANCIENT AND MODERN SOURCES. Selected and Edited by H. L. Mencken. Alfred A. Knopf. $7.50.

IF IT was astonishing to hear last winter that H. L. Mencken had been spending twenty-five years compiling a "Dictionary of Quotations," it is now equally surprising that this long-nursed compilation of the ages' wit and wisdom—a testimonial of mankind's undiscouraged search for the clues to its being and the laws of its existence—should never have seemed an inevitable feature of the shelf that holds the six volumes of "Prejudices," "The American Language," "Americana," "Notes on Democracy," and the bales of uncollected journalism that may some day yield the most exhaustive encyclopedia of American and human lore yet written by a single hand.

The book lacks an index! No reviewer has omitted to snatch his opportunity of revenge against Mencken for committing the classic crime he has laid against hundreds of authors in his own reviewing career. But if the practical usefulness of his "Dictionary" is curtailed by this lapse from virtue, it may be that it is precisely by this lack that the nature and motive of Mencken's performance may best be seized. The 1,347 double-columned pages of his book already give it a body larger by 200 pages than those of its standard rivals: Bartlett's, whose body runs to 1,131 pages; Hoyt's, 927; and the new Oxford, 577. To have included author indexes and key-word concordances on the scale these boast—Bartlett's with 447 pages, Hoyt's with 416, the Oxford with 302—would perhaps, as Mencken argues, have meant swelling its volume to the point of making it both schematically baffling and physically unmanageable; and as for surpassing or supplanting these competitors, the answer is that there can never be such a thing as a best book of this kind. There exists no definition of what a quotation is, or what makes it worth perpetuating. Anyone can make his list of Mencken's omissions and—a more serious matter—his inaccuracies by comparing his entries with those of Bartlett, Hoyt, Apperson, Smith, and the Oxford editors, and add a list of his own treasures found in none of these compilations. I have, in three months' delving, made my own list of over 200 items; they can't be crowded into a review; but in any case the labor would be in a sense irrelevant. Moreover, we are all asked to send "corrections, suggestions, and remonstrances" to 1524 Hollins Street, Baltimore, where they "will be received in a properly humble and grateful spirit"; and it is prudent to recall an admonition of Landor's which is to be found neither in the body of the "Dictionary" nor, more inexplicably, on its flyleaf: "In our censures we are less apt to consider the benefits we may confer than the ingenuity we display." No reference shelf will henceforth be complete without this book, but it does not supplant Bartlett, Hoyt, or the Oxford. In fact, it is a totally different affair, and its lack of an index was probably designed to enforce the discovery of that fact upon its readers.

Mencken has arranged his material not chronologically or alphabetically by authors' names, as in Bartlett and the Oxford—an arrangement which somehow robs such a book of all dramatic interest and human novelty—and not under a system of standard key words, as in Hoyt, but under his own elaborate, freely subdivided and discriminated system of rubrics, these being suggested mostly by the characteristic word in a passage. We find headings for both Freedom and Liberty, Doctor and Physician, Death and Dying, Philosopher and Thinker, while Love may be consulted under eighteen subdivisions and seventy-two cross-references. But another principle soon declares itself. Mencken says he has omitted "as much as possible all mere platitudes" and confined himself "to authors who really had something to say, and said it to some effect. The immemorial tags and scraps of wisdom, real and false, have been included, and most of the purple passages that everyone knows, but I have tried to leaven them with better and less hackneyed stuff." The key word here is "leaven." Without it Mencken would be describing his plan and scope but not his intention or final achievement. For it could hardly fall within the scheme and instincts of a man who spent forty years chronicling and indexing the data, facts, follies, words, folkways, and driving forces of modern humanity to turn out a book fit only for a reference shelf. What he has produced may be ascertained by turning to some of the salient rubrics of his "Dictionary"—for instance, Love, Fame, Poetry, Critic, Criticism, Philosophy, Prayer, Democracy, Saint, Revolution, Revenge, Applause, Freedom, Authority, Mankind, Wife, Marriage, Woman, Old Age, Politeness, Politics, Revolution, Reason, and Sense, Common. Several points spring out. Human beings have tended to be wittiest and most memorable when

by the Committee on Work in Industry of the National Research Council

America fighting is an America filled with well-meaning men . . . both labor leaders and business executives . . . who are striving to build production to its highest levels. Yet, many of these men, otherwise well-informed, have failed to reach their goals because of a lack of understanding of the physiological and psychological factors involved where the human element is concerned.

"The Fatigue of Workers" is a clear, unbiased, objective discussion of the direct causes of fatigue, the psychological origin of strikes and slowdowns. The underlying causes for friction between labor and management are disclosed, and the ways in which it can be overcome are clearly indicated.

Numerous actual studies are used to illustrate both physical and psychological aspects of fatigue. Among examples in the former case, high altitude tests undergone by pilots are discussed; in the latter, the famous Western Electric experiment is described in detail.

The New Republic says: "That the economic motive is not the strongest motive governing industrial workers is shown even more clearly in these studies . . ."

giving vent to doubt, skepticism, rage, or scurrility; Mencken's emphasis, despite the latitude of his selections and inclusions, falls unmistakably where one might expect it to; and since the quintessence of human sense and experience has usually been arrived at not by men of letters or sages but by common folk, he has, by arranging his entries in chronological sequence (this is what his title means by "historical") except for the closing items under each rubric, which are made up of folk proverbs and the imperishable coinages of mass anonymity, seldom failed to let the accent fall precisely where it is intended.

The entries under Imagination begin with a line from Genesis: "The Imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth," and end with Wilde's "Imagination is the result of heredity. It is simply concentrated race-experience." Herodotus begins Riches by saying that their advantage lies in "that they enable a man to indulge his passions, and help him to bear up against whatever harm befalls him," while Danish and Scottish folklore end it by telling us that wealth is "often abused, never refused" and that "a fu' purse never lacks friends." Love: Its Course opens with Richard Whitford's "Hot love is soon cold" (1537) and ends with the Spanish proverb, "Love is like war; you begin when you like and leave off when you can," and the Welsh "Perfect love sometimes does not come till the first grandchild." Love: Its Effects opens with Confucius's "Can there be a love which does not make demands on its object?" and ends with the Welsh "No one acts more foolishly than a wise man in love." Love: Its Nature begins with Plautus's "Love is perfidious" and ends with the Old English catch, "Calf love,/ Half love;/ Old love,/ Cold love." The famous utterers of so many of these gems are themselves similarly snared. On Ruskin we have Carlyle's "A bottle of beautiful soda-water"; on Shelley, Birrell's "He would have died a Tory had he lived to be fifty—and president of the Bible Society"; on Spinoza, Novalis's "A God-drunk man"; on Shakespeare, Greene's "An upstart crow, beautified with our feathers" in 1592 and Tolstoy's "Nothing whatever in common with art and poetry" in 1906; on Napoleon, Hugo's "God was bored with him."

The impression soon becomes inescapable that what Mencken has produced as a "Dictionary of Quotations" is really a transcendent "Prejudices: Seventh Series," a "Notes on Humanity," or more expressly "Mencken's Philosophical Dictionary, Written by Others"—the first notable successor to a parent classic in its field which appeared in 1764, by an ancestor of whom David Hume (cf. p. 1,257) said, May 1, 1760: "I know this author cannot be depended on with regard to facts; but his general views are sometimes sound and always entertaining." Which is also to say that while Mencken may have produced no infallible vade mecum for journalists and banquet speakers or God's gift to librarians, he has achieved a time-killer and wits' treasury to delight men, gods, and librarians alike, a work of literary and popular ethnology that is a worthy successor to "The American Language," a survey of human wit, prejudice, wisdom, and scurrility whose contempt for the human species is equaled only by the love and zest for it that inform every page, and a volume that immediately wins a classic rank by being the first and only readable book of its kind. ## Vargas of Brazil

BRAZIL UNDER VARGAS. By Karl Loewenstein. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

HERE is the first book to tell anything of importance about the government of Getulio Vargas. And Vargas and his Brazil are of such immediate and critical interest as to give the volume a chief place in current reading.

Mr. Loewenstein brings to his task solid study of the sources, substantial experience in Brazil, and a mind thorough, fair, and wise. Brazilian politics, he says, must be described against the realities of Brazil: its "fundamentally liberal climate of social and political life," its lingering feudalism, its immensity and obstinate regionalisms, its Latin American proneness to fall into caudillismo checked by Brazil's traditional reverence for rule by law.

The author handles his subject as a good scientist does his white rabbits. He neither storms nor rhapsodizes. Vargas started out in 1930 "with much energy, good-will, circumspection, and moderation"; even since the launching of his Estado Novo in 1937 his energy and moderation have not failed. He is a dictator, but a gentle one compared with the Hispanic American Francia, Rosas, and Gomez. He puts people in jail one day, lets them out the next. Of the 200 who bombarded him in the palace in May, 1938, not one was sentenced to death, not one remains in jail. Getulio is no villain, but neither is he a democrat.

The Estado Novo is one of the more curious political institutions of our times. Its character is "a ghost constitution . . . it was born, yet it never has lived." It promises elections not yet scheduled—"the jest has a sardonic tinge. It is the Brazilian's way of talking through his hat." Getulio rules; "all the rest of the 186 articles are legal camouflage." Vargas is the constitution; he names "interventors" who rule the several states; the interventors name the prefects who rule the municipalities. Vargas also names judges and all chief officials. Mr. Loewenstein credits Vargas with naming men of capacity; they are not puppets. Vargas allows debate in the inner circles, although he reserves the right to demote the debater—witness Francisco Campos.

Is Brazil a fascist state? Official spokesmen describe it as a "disciplined democracy," which Loewenstein dismisses as a play on words. The government is a dictatorship but is not totalitarian. There is plenty of elbow room left to Brazilians. The formal pattern on paper is fascist; the actual working permits large freedom. To be sure, admits the author, the ground plan is all laid for a thoroughgoing totalitarian state, but it is not such today. Brazil under Vargas needs no imported labels for description; it is simply personalist rule.

The debit side is heavy. Constitutional security, a firm Brazilian heritage, falters. Respect for the judiciary has been undermined by arbitrary and retroactive use of executive power. "Due process" has often been denied. Arbitrariness has too often prevailed against legality. Even on this score Brazil cannot be compared with the fascist states of Europe.

The credit side is impressive. The nation has flourished under Vargas, cities have been built, industry has been strengthened, economic life has been bettered. Social legislation has brought limited relief to driven industrial and agricultural workers. There are bold social services "well

A NEW CONSTITUTION NOW

By
HENRY HAZLITT

The inadequacy of our present system of government in meeting the crisis of total war is examined closely in this provocative book. It suggests changes to make government more responsible to the people and urges immediate revision of the Constitution. Mr. Hazlitt's first brief outline of his proposals in the New York Times attracted nation-wide attention. The author, editor and member of the editorial board of the New York Times, here presents his entire program in challenging detail.

handled by capable and socially inclined officials." A brave beginning has been made in improving agriculture.

Will this Brazil of Vargas play fair with the United Nations? Mr. Loewenstein does not pretend to answer. He furnishes clues which give solid ground for hope. In the meantime Brazil has declared war. Vargas has placed his bet on the United Nations. He is a smart man, this Vargas, not given to wrong guesses.

HUBERT HERRING

Who Seeks Shall Find

HAVE COME, AM HERE. By José Garcia Villa. The Viking Press. $2.

DEPTH is not the fashion, and even the well-disposed reader may startle at certain paradoxical avowals in these bravely deep poems by José Garcia Villa. A new poet, "a young native of the Philippines," this author; and his work is for the most part new to print, but final wisdom encountered in poem after poem merely serves to emphasize the disparity between tumult and stature.

Mr. Villa thinks of a poem as musical, slender, secret, wise, humble, and rapt; with Deity housing that "hidden voltage" in it which only fire may safely touch. In some of the poems a new rhyming—"a principle of reversed consonance never used in English poetry before, nor in any poetry"—substitutes for the crudeness of rhyme a more gently weighted, more richly textured effect:

It's a mastery of death	(a)
And that's Love. It's the bequeathed	(a)
Mind of Christ. It's I, it's Love,	(b)
What the great deaths reveal.	(b)

Here, d-followed-by-th in the word "death" rhymes with th-followed-by-d in the word "bequeathed," and the l-followed-by-v of "Love," is rhymed with the v-followed-by-l of "reveal." The delicacy with force of such writing reminds one of the colors of black ink from a hogs'-hair brush in the hand of a Chinese master. "The antique ant" is a drawing; the watermelon, yellow strawberry, giraffe, and leopard poems are, in effect, paintings; nor could reticence be more eloquent than in the poems beginning "And if the heart cannot love" and "She has gone."

"It is easy to become obscure if one says too little of too personal an experience," Charles Mauron says in another connection; and surely tenderness devoid of mawkishness is a thing which personality makes difficult. But only the purblind would dissect a rose to determine its fragrance, or a poem to discover its secret; for a poem deprived of its mystery would no longer be a poem. And mystery is different from obscurity. So Mr. Villa is with great effect, at times, "deliberately aiming just beside the mark"; as when he says, "Sir, there's a tower of fire in me/Binding me with terrible strength," or:

The wind shines
The sun blows:

. . . . .

The birds bloom,
The flowers fly:

The bees sing,
The birds sting!

. . . . .

Some of Mr. Villa's marvels suggest similar ones.

Dared my groveling bloodscape,
It to a dazzling diamond made and various reiterated sighs and mortal groans are not unconscious of G. M. Hopkins. E. E. Cummings, who would consider it blasphemy to interfere with another's poem, has none the less provided subsequent palmers and templars with a certain antecedent courage in the matter of odd diction. Mr. Villa's uncapitalized "am so very am/and speak so very speak," his "Angelity" and "instancy" and "desistance" have a kind of two-twilled authority; nor should Mr. Cummings deprecate Poem 13 on the ground that it has no title, or for other reasons.

There is a one that createth me,
He that of me is my sun my sum
My father and my only child:—
Behold—we do wander, wonder
Which of us is the uplifted candle,
Which of us will read, will rede
The image of our living shadow;
O there's a Third of us will live,
There's a Third of us will dive
Out of the Light, out of the Wooed,
Into eternity dazzling dark;
O but here shall turn, shall spring
The word young, young, blue-eyed yet,
Slender as an infant fawn and Whole without death's antlers yet.

The lyric beginning "Always did I want more God" is beautifully made: the wording is so natural one does not at first perceive the fugue-like recurrence of God, rood, blood, yield, field, distilled. Nor has Mr. Villa been indifferent to those illumined wayfarers, Dante, Spenser, and Blake, who adjure us to "speak with moderation; but think with great fierceness."

Amid the mysteries of the poems about divinity, the principle of reversed consonance has been extended to content, with a result that is indeed strange, and deadly to self-esteem. Though severe responsibility is imposed by the statement

The shadow of a great man
Is always Christ,

it is not conventional to say "Christ progresses from me," or "Greatly imagine me, my God." But is it not true that "God is messageless" unless one listens? Is it not true that God has been cast out unless we "permit him to be of our Own Blood"? John Bunyan could have understood José Villa's statement, "I saw myself reflected/In the great eye of the grave," and could have accepted the confession that with "the Nativity of Everness" "My human eyes" become "God's lens/Through which I see—all of Love."

Since Mr. Villa does not disguise exaltation, one must not feign to be unimplicated. And would not Everyman—however camouflaged from himself—be glad to believe that God is present and is accessible to personality?

How shines my dark-world
Upon the sun! and gives it Light . . .

is humility's paradox. It truly constrains us to admit that transfiguration is not incompatible with intimacy and that what one seeks one shall find.

Consumers Union Protests

Dear Sirs: Richard Rovere, in his piece on J. B. Matthews in your Dies Committee Supplement dated October 3, seems to feel that the strike at Consumers Research back in 1935 was tied up with an effort of Communists to get control of or to wreck that organization. And since Consumers Union was formed by former Consumers Research subscribers as an outgrowth of that strike (Mr. Rovere says the strikers started it; they didn't), there is an inference that CU is tied up with the "plot."

These charges have been repeated many times. We hardly expected to see them bobbing up again in the pages of The Nation.

Many persons and many publications answered them when they were first made, and there is hardly need for us to add to the answer now. Here is what The Nation, for example, had to say in its December 4, 1935, issue. Then the editors passed judgment on the report of a committee, headed by Professor Reinhold Niebuhr of the Union Theological Seminary, which had investigated the strike at Consumers Research. The Nation stated then that the committee had "made a careful survey of the strike situation which can hardly be considered other than an impartial and just report. . . . On the question of responsibility for the strike, the committee finds that the setup of Consumers Research . . . lends itself to arbitrary and capricious management. The strike occurred after the dismissal of three employees who had been active in union organization. . . . The committee found no basis in the charges by the management that the strike was a plot to seize control of the organization, that it was financed by big business interests . . . or, conversely, that it was a plot to further the interests of the Communist Party. The dispute seemed to the committee a bona fide struggle over the question of working conditions between management and a duly organized trade union. . . . The committee found that every offer of mediation or arbitration made since the strike started had been refused by the management."

When the case came before the National Labor Relations Board, this body reached the following conclusion, after hearing every scrap of evidence that Matthews and his colleagues brought forth to prove that the strike was part of a plot to seize control of Consumers Research: "We conclude from the entire record that there was no attempt by the union to seize control of the organization. . . ." ("Decisions and Orders of the National Labor Relations Board," Vol. 2, July 1, 1936-July 1, 1937, page 75.)

As to whether or not Consumers Union works wholly and exclusively for consumers, I believe that the record of its publications and activities, as well as its position of leadership in the consumer movement, speaks for itself.

COLSTON WARNE, President
New York, October 6

Flaubert and Our Times

Dear Sirs: May I add a note to Louise Bogan's interesting piece on Flaubert in your recent issue? When the new English translation of "L'Education sentimentale" first appeared in Britain last year, there appeared an important critical article on it in John Lehmann's anthology "New Writing," which might perhaps be of interest to those who are anxious about the character of the culture of the "new decade." Discussing Flaubert and the Novelist Today, Walter Allen proceeded to argue that "the period of political faith is over," that, borrowing Auden's lines, "art is not life, and cannot be a midwife to society." He called for a return to Flaubert's "methodical relentlessness" and "absolute doubt," and to his counsel, "A thinker should have neither religion nor fatherland, nor even any social conviction."

This seemed to be a new and authentic literary voice from Great Britain at war. And it may seem like an ominous portent that at a time when the recognition of human values needs so much to be treasured, there comes a call to return to a great artist whose tragedy was precisely that he cut himself off from human values in a morbid and cynical escape from the world. From Allen's article—and Miss Bogan's in this respect does not help much—one never gets a sense of the paralyzing misanthropy in Flaubert, his terrible isolation, his depressing contempt for all his creatures and characters, his pitifully absurd ambition finally "to write a Book about Nothing." It would seem that so very far from being a guidepost for our times, Flaubert—in his brilliant way—spells out for us only "detour."

The Shape of Things

THE FRENCH WORKERS ARE ON THE EDGE OF revolt in protest against Vichy's efforts to force them into the Nazi war factories. As a result, Laval's position is becoming doubly precarious. If he persists in carrying out the promises he has made Berlin, he faces a real explosion in unoccupied France, while if he fails to deliver, Hitler is likely to instal some other Gauleiter at Vichy. He received a warning a few weeks ago from the obvious Nazi connivance in the Benoist-Mechin plot to oust him. Now he is believed to have been given an absolute deadline: the 150,000 skilled workers he undertook to send to Germany in June are to be recruited and dispatched by November 30 or else. It seems most improbable that he will be able to meet the Nazi terms even with the aid of the 500 Gestapo agents to whom he has shamefully given citizenship rights so that they may the better perform their duties as slavers. For the French workers are determined not to submit. Strikes have broken out in many factories from which "volunteers" were "designated" to present themselves at the recruiting stations. Violent incidents are becoming as commonplace in unoccupied as in occupied France, and there has been rioting between the population and fascist groups such as Laval's Service d'Ordre Legionnaire. Moreover, it appears that arms and ammunition are being delivered by parachute in unoccupied France, forcing Vichy to issue a threat that their retention will be treated as a capital offense. We believe that the French will be more impressed by the news that arms are reaching them than by the warning. The distribution of arms and the stepping up of offensive operations such as the devastating British raid on the Creusot works are the best possible means of stiffening French resistance to Vichy and Berlin.

WE FEAR THAT DAKAR'S REAPPEARANCE IN the news is due less to the real imminence of an Anglo-American attack than to Nazi propaganda designed to obtain German control of Vichy's colonial defense. The furor began when Berlin tried to manufacture an incident out of the shooting down of a Captain Daillière in an air battle supposedly over French territory. Later it was brazenly admitted by the Nazi radio that this officer was killed during the course of a reconnaissance flight over the British colony of Sierra Leone. The arrival of American troops in this colony and in Liberia does of course strengthen the United Nations' forces within striking distance of Dakar and does make an attack on that city at least more feasible. But the indications are that the number of American soldiers stationed in West Africa is not large and that their main duty is the guarding of the increasingly important trans-African supply route. Nevertheless, there are sound arguments in favor of the early establishment of a new front in West Africa in conjunction with a renewed British offensive against Rommel. The French colonies cannot be entirely isolated from the anti-Nazi fever which is sweeping the homeland, and with Vichy's prestige approaching its nadir it is by no means certain that a determined attack on Dakar would not swing a major part of the North and West African garrisons to our side. It would then become urgently necessary for the Axis to rush troops to Morocco and Algiers either through France or Spain or both. This would involve an immense extension of lines of communication and would certainly ease German pressure in other theaters of war.

THE SCALE OF THE JAPANESE EFFORT TO drive our forces out of Guadalcanal is a measure of the vital strategic importance of that island. Our High Command made no mistake in August when it undertook the hazardous task of landing an expedition in the southern Solomons and seizing the almost completed airfield on Guadalcanal. Had that field and the anchorage at Tulagi remained in Japanese hands, the enemy would have been favorably placed for a new push against our supply routes to Australia. Contrariwise, if we can beat back the present counter-attack and consolidate our hold on the southern Solomons, Japan's grip on the string of islands north to New Britain and its bases on the eastern shore of New Guinea will be seriously threatened. That is why a major battle around Guadalcanal appears inevitable. During the past week the Japanese succeeded in landing important reinforcements and attempted to knock out Henderson Field by attacks from sea, land, and air. They came dangerously near success, but our planes have been able to continue operations and are daily adding to their bag of enemy bombers and fighters. As we go to press, both forces seem to be sparring for an opening. There have been several reports of a heavy Japanese naval concentration not far to the north, but its operations seem to be confined to hit-and-run night raids—an indication, perhaps, of unwillingness to expose big ships to daylight attack by American fliers. But as Secretary Knox has warned, it is probable that the maximum Japanese force has not yet been brought to bear. A very stiff fight is still in prospect.

THE CONTROVERSY IN CHILE ARISING OUT of Sumner Welles's statement on Nazi activities in Latin America deepened over the week-end to the point of suggesting a government crisis. The center of the attack continues to be Dr. Barros Jarpa, the Foreign Minister, in whom democratic Chileans see the main obstacle to Chile's joining the United Nations. Dr. Barros, although the most reactionary man in the Rios Cabinet, cannot be called pro-Axis. He is not, for example, to be placed on the same level as his Argentine colleague, Ruiz Guinázú, whom The Nation has denounced since the very beginning as the evil spirit in the diplomacy of Latin America. But the trouble with Dr. Barros is that he gives too much credit to the reports of his Minister in Berlin, his own cousin, who has fallen entirely under the spell of Goebbels and has become convinced that nobody can defeat Hitler. We shall have all kinds of equivocal maneuvers so long as there remains in Latin America a single starting-point for Nazi attack from within. It will go on until a real unification of Latin American foreign policy is achieved. For this reason we welcome the unanimity with which the distinguished Latin Americans who have just created in New York the Latin American Council of the Free World Association advocated the breaking of relations between Argentina and Chile and the Axis.

AS WE WRITE, THE HOUSE AND SENATE ARE about to adopt the conference report on the tax bill—more than nine and a half months after the President first urged a sharp increase in taxes to meet the war emergency. The bill is thoroughly unsatisfactory. The total yield is estimated at $6,881,000,000 as compared with the $8,700,000,000 originally requested by the Treasury—a request that was later advanced to approximately $13,000,000,000. Although it has been revealed in a recent study that nearly all of the $48,000,000,000 of excess spending power existing in the country is in the hands of individuals and families with incomes of more than $1,750 a year, a large part—probably at least a third—of the revenue to be raised by the new bill will be derived from incomes of $1,750 and under. The yield from corporation taxes will fall far short of the sum asked by the Treasury. No step was taken to remedy the shocking injustice of tax-exempt securities. The so-called victory tax, adopted as an alternative to a graduated spending tax which would have fallen largely on the higher income groups, is essentially a poor man's tax and will cut seriously into subsistence needs of families with incomes of less than $1,500 a year. Since the tax bill does not strike heavily at the principal accumulations of excess spending power, it cannot be regarded as an effective anti-inflation measure. The task of restricting spending—the chief responsibility before Congress today —has been shamelessly dodged. We hope that voters will bear this in mind when they go to the polls on November 3.

A JURISDICTIONAL DISPUTE BETWEEN TWO government agencies, both headed by business men, is hindering the collection of industrial scrap. For many months the Special Projects Section of the War Production Board's Conservation Division has been charged with uncovering large sources of scrap—abandoned railroads, derelict factories, and so on—the salvaging of which would normally be uneconomic. But having no funds it could only do the preparatory work, and in cases where the demolition and other costs exceeded the ceiling price for the scrap which could be obtained it had to find some other government agency to finance the job. To meet this difficulty the ubiquitous Jesse Jones two months ago organized War Materials, Inc., and supplied it with RFC funds so that it could act as agent for the Metal Reserve Company in buying and collecting scrap material. Headed by J. M. Hopwood, a Pittsburgh business man, it prepared to take over the whole job, only to find itself treading on the toes of the Special Projects Section. This agency took the view that it should continue to function as before and that War Materials should confine itself to financing the schemes it prepared. Its stand was supported by Donald Nelson, and Mr. Hopwood resigned, together with his chief aides. The resulting deadlock has still to be resolved. Common sense suggests that the two agencies ought to be merged in order to prevent overlapping, but to make this solution effective it will probably be necessary to bring in new blood at the top. We are inclined to sympathize with the unofficial WPB belief that Mr. Jones's passion for guaranteed titles is likely to prove a fatal obstacle to many of these special projects. On the other hand, Lessing Rosenwald, head of the WPB Conservation Division, is hardly the man to "bull" them through. For while the current scrap campaign has been a success, its inauguration was delayed until the situation became critical.

STORIES ABOUT THE RACE PROBLEM ARE being censored, and British correspondents in this country have even been prevented from cabling a speech by Wendell Willkie on the subject. Yet while we thus attempt to conceal the worst skeleton in our democratic cupboard, a minority of American soldiers are attempting to introduce color discrimination into Britain. A handful of unreconstructed British imperialists—the kind that we are given to lecturing—share the Southern American attitude toward the Negro, but the vast majority of our allies regard Jim Crow practices as hateful and undemocratic. The British have welcomed black American soldiers as warmly as they have white. They are impressed by their smartness and discipline, by their good manners and their cheerfulness, and they see no reason why they should not welcome them into their homes, drink with them in their pubs, and carry on normal social relations with them. When, therefore, a Southern white soldier, seeing a Negro dancing or walking with an English girl, feels called upon to "protect" her by socking his fellow-citizen, the British are outraged. There have, unfortunately, been numerous incidents of this nature, leading on occasion to free fights, with British soldiers and civilians siding with the Negroes. We are aware that Southern prejudice is a deep-rooted and stubborn weed, but if considerations of courtesy are insufficient to prevent such attempts to force unwanted customs on our British hosts, then the problem should be dealt with as a matter of military discipline. An army which allows race feuds to develop within its ranks is little better than a rabble. If he has not already taken action, General Eisenhower ought to issue stringent orders forbidding any interference with fraternization between colored troops and the British and should be prepared to break any subordinate officer who fails to see that they are carried out.

THE BOLD AND PERTINENT SPEECHES OF the American Labor Party's candidate for governor of New York have increased his stature to the point where a vote for Alfange need not be merely a vote against Dewey or Bennett; it can be a vote for Alfange. He has produced a ten-point creed for a war-time governor, and its unequivocal principles contrast sharply with the vapory approach of his opponents. Such a governor, he says, "must preserve labor's Magna Charta and the New Deal's social gains and hold them before the people as an example of the goals for which we are fighting; he must plan, now, a complete program of public works and improvements to be set in motion immediately after the war to keep our people fully employed at a high standard of living; he must crack down without mercy upon those racial and religious bigots who constitute a menace to our national unity; . . . he must place the most capable citizens available in every important post, be they Republicans, Democrats, Laborites, or independents." There are other provisions equally vigorous, among them the pledge that he will "insist that every city, town, and village, every man, woman, and child, shall fight a total war on every front." Against this strong stuff we must set Dewey's plea for election on the ground that reactionaries have captured the Democratic Party in the state and that a "progressive" like himself is needed to aid the war effort. Mr. Bennett so far has said hardly more than that the President has indorsed him and he is therefore sure to win. We doubt that Mr. Farley will allow him to go much farther than that. There are excellent reasons for voting for Dean Alfange, which will be more fully discussed in our next issue, but not least of these is the grasp of political realities which he has demonstrated in his campaign.

WE HAD HOPED THAT OUR GOVERNMENT would cheat the Nazis of some of their victims by rescuing, with or without benefit of visas and other rubber stamps, the thousands of anti-fascists in France, Jews and non-Jews of all nationalities who have managed to escape the Nazi net. Instead these people have been deported to the east and elsewhere to become slaves for Hitler. About 8,000 children were left behind when their parents were deported from France. Many lack identification papers and are crowded into orphanages and camps. In a rather belated gesture the State Department has now offered to let 5,000 of these children come to the United States to be cared for by private agencies. Laval has accepted the offer for reasons that are easy to guess. Some of the children, according to one account, are "physically unable to stand the strain of a long voyage and may undergo special treatment before leaving." One dispatch from Vichy estimated that 50,000 Jewish children are "isolated throughout Europe." We are glad that at least 5,000 of them are to be saved.

How to Ration Our Man-Power

THE hearings in the House and Senate on the bill for drafting youths of eighteen and nineteen have produced a wealth of information on man-power but have done little to ease the minds of those who fear that this crucial problem is being badly bungled. Secretary Stimson revealed for the first time that plans are being laid for an army of 7,500,000 men by the end of 1943. This is a considerably smaller figure than had been suggested by various spokesmen, official and unofficial, in recent weeks. But with Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard personnel included, the total for all services will be approximately 9,500,000 by the end of next year. While no recent figures have been issued showing the number of men now under arms, it is believed to be in the neighborhood of 5,000,000. Thus, the total at the end of 1943 would be nearly twice the present number.

Our military and naval authorities are doubtless correct in insisting that they will need this many men to carry on offensive campaigns in Europe and Asia and to give protection to our outposts in all sections of the world. Undoubtedly they would prefer to have more. But the public would have a great deal more confidence in the army's program if there were grounds for believing that the decision had been reached after full consideration of the political and economic factors which must enter into any decision of high strategy. Presumably the army is convinced that its greatly increased supply needs can be met despite the withdrawal of another 4,500,000 men from industry, agriculture, and the professions. But have our lend-lease obligations been taken fully into account? Is it likely that there will be enough ships in 1943 to move six or seven million men overseas, keep them supplied, and at the same time meet the increased shipping requirements of Russia, Britain, and China? Were the military leaders of these countries consulted in a decision that obviously concerns them as vitally as it does this country? Were our own industrial, shipping, and agricultural leaders consulted, and the chiefs of the WPB, and did they agree that the supply needs of the United Nations could be maintained in the face of this prospective drain of man-power? Doubts arise because the army has given the impression that it considers any interference an impertinence. With the supply of man-power at our disposal definitely limited, basic decisions regarding its distribution should be made only after full consultation with both civilian and military authorities.

Evidence that such consultation has not occurred may be found in the increasingly grave shortage of workers in agriculture and in certain industrial areas. The army's zeal in providing for even remote contingencies in its man-power demands contrasts with the apparent negligence of the WPB and the War Manpower Commission in laying plans to meet the production crisis. Recent surveys in Baltimore and other war-industry centers indicate that the "volunteer" system has broken down completely. Only a small fraction of the workers qualified for skilled jobs in war work but now employed in non-essential work are being shifted to war jobs by existing placement machinery. Little is being done to train women or to develop day care for children so that married women can seek jobs. The President declared in his address of October 13 that we must "learn to ration man-power," but he failed to suggest specific action.

It is not enough simply to say that we must draft men for the civilian front in exactly the same way that we do for the military front; we must take immediate steps to set up a comprehensive program capable of meeting man-power needs in order of their urgency. This is not a matter that can be settled by rushing a bill through Congress. Many months will be required before men and women can be trained and shifted into essential work in appreciable numbers. Yet General Hershey has announced that over a million more men will be taken out of civilian life before the New Year. Does not this impose a much greater urgency than Washington's actions indicate? Since it is a problem involving major political, economic, and military decisions, the responsibility clearly rests with the President.

Jeffers Packs the Jury

MANY ingredients besides rubber go into the making of a tire. One of the most important is cotton. Experiments in recent years indicate that rayon may make a better fabric for tires. This seems especially true of heavy-duty tires and tires made of synthetic rubber. Both types heat up much more than regular tires, and rayon fabric seems to be able to resist temperatures under which cotton gives way.

Mr. Jeffers, the new rubber administrator, wants to expand facilities for making rayon. The Senate Agriculture Committee, which is largely dominated by cotton planters, fears that new rayon plants would pay off their capital investment on their war business and emerge into the post-war period debt-free and able to sell rayon so cheaply that it would compete with cotton. "As I see it," Jeffers told the committee, "our job is to win this war and stop worrying about what may happen afterward." With this, which should be one of the basic slogans of the war effort, we are in complete agreement. Unfortunately Jeffers, like most WPB officials, shows little readiness to apply the principle to industry as well as agriculture.

Jeffers is not the first WPB official to adopt this slogan in speeches and statements. The test of Jeffers will come in the way he applies it. "Cotton Ed" Smith, senior Senator from South Carolina, asked Jeffers about the charge that seven of the nine WPB officials who had a hand in the decision to expand rayon facilities "have financial interests either in rayon companies or big tire companies." Apparently this is true; Jeffers did not deny it. He took refuge in rhetoric. He said that while he understood that "former officials" of rayon companies participated in the decision, he assumed that "during a war . . . America can trust Americans." If by this he means that Americans of all classes want to do what they think necessary to win the war, no one will dispute it. Lamont du Pont wants us to win the war; so does Senator Smith. But obviously they disagree on what is necessary. A du Pont dollar-a-year man is apt to have a different opinion from a cotton planter on the need for rayon in winning the war.

We are inclined to believe that in this case the du Pont dollar-a-year man is right, the cotton planter wrong. But the cotton planter will have more confidence in Jeffers, and Jeffers himself is more likely to make the right decisions, if he does not depend on one-sided councils. There are distinguished farm chemists concerned with methods of improving and widening the use of cotton, as there are farm chemists concerned with finding new ways to turn surpluses of grain into new fuels, plastics, and synthetics. One suspects that in the case of fabric for tires, as in that of raw materials for synthetic rubber, WPB consultants drawn only from industry and Eastern scientific schools dependent on big business are not too interested in finding new war uses for farm products. This does not mean that they are dishonest; it does mean that they are human.

The democratic way and the sensible way to meet this problem is to make sure that all sides get a fair hearing, and that decision-making bodies are representative. By this standard, the staff of six technical assistants chosen by Jeffers is disappointing. The only academic scientist of the six is from M. I. T. There are two men from machinery companies. The other three men are from three of the Big Four rubber-tire companies—Firestone, United States Rubber, and Goodyear. Goodrich, the most advanced of the Big Four in making synthetic-rubber tires, is not included; it is "in the doghouse" for its temerity in developing a Buna rubber tire of its own over the veto of Standard Oil and I. G. Farben. None of the smaller rubber companies are represented, although some of them, like Acushnet Process, have shown more enterprise and ingenuity in handling synthetic rubber than the Big Four. There is no man among the six from the Middle Western college and government laboratories, which have done more work on synthetic rubber and learned more about it than the big Eastern scientific schools. The lopsided technical staff chosen by Jeffers follows the customary and discredited WPB pattern rather than the democratic one. Jeffers, like most WPB executives, has provided himself with a packed jury.

Hapsburg Hopes

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

AMERICAN diplomacy is a mixture of traditionalism, caution, and pragmatism. The third element occasionally conflicts with the other two, but more often it fits well enough, and together they serve as a complete bar to the development of a flexible political strategy based on a consistent political policy.

Our continued relations with Vichy provide a perfect illustration of this compound in action. Ever since the fall of France we have acted upon the fiction that we were dealing with a sovereign power capable of conducting an independent foreign policy. The pragmatic basis of this bit of theater was our hope that we could actually prevent the full political surrender of Vichy to Hitler. The hope was an illusion. But perhaps that is beside the point. Even if our policy had served as a deterrent on Vichy, it would still have ignored more important strategic considerations—chief among them the absolute need of building up the spirit of resistance in France against both the German occupation and the Vichy regime and of increasing the military and political strength of the Fighting French. The half-hearted attempts of the State Department to support Vichy and De Gaulle at one and the same time have proved ineffective; as a consequence neither the ends of tradition and caution nor of pragmatism have been served.

At any moment now the policy will be abandoned. Vichy's successive capitulations to Hitler have dynamited the façade of French independence and robbed the State Department of its last area of diplomatic maneuver. Today the only limits on Laval's servility are those established by the French people themselves. Not in Washington's appeasement but in the refusal of the workers of France to be sold into slavery by the government we have appeased lies the one obstacle to the full surrender of Vichy to Hitler. By giving Vichy our encouragement and material support we inevitably strengthened the hand of Laval; it will take many dead French patriots to wipe out the effects of that policy.

But Vichy is only the most obvious and striking example of our diplomatic insulation against the revolutionary challenge of Hitler's war. The traditionalists of the American State Department, by habit and persuasion, shun the reality of revolution. They hope to win the war without using—or loosing—the forces of democratic resistance; they hope to defeat fascism with near-fascism, or at least with the vestigial remnants of pre-war conservatism. Hence their obvious partiality for the Pétains, their anxious wooing of the Francos, their long appeasement of Castillo, their endless back-stairs whisperings with the representatives of clerical reaction. Nor are these efforts confined to Europe and Latin America. Here at home the patient, futile maneuvers go on before our eyes. Under a studied pretense of indifference and impartiality, the State Department has encouraged the most conservative elements among the exile groups.

The one partial exception is the case of the Italians. Attorney General Biddle's decision to exempt Italian nationals in this country from "enemy-alien" status was a shrewd move. It not only recognizes the loyalty to America of the great majority of Italians living here. It also tends to deepen the feeling that Italy is in fact occupied territory rather than a full Axis partner and so to increase the growing unrest in Italy and widen the breach between that country and Germany. The danger lurking in this move is that it might lead toward a softening of American animosity toward Mussolini and the fascist regime. Appeasement of the Italian dictator went on right up to the hour of the "stab in the back," and it would not be hard to revive the attitude of tolerance which prevailed in many official circles. Or, since Mussolini is now a somewhat deflated hero, that sentiment might be shifted to the Italian royal house, which, in this country, has never been held in the contempt it deserves. It is important to make sure that Mr. Biddle's generous gesture to the Italians in America will be used to strengthen their resistance to fascism as well as their loyalty to the United States.

The best hope that this may happen lies in the rather puzzling approval bestowed by the State Department on Count Sforza and the Free Italy movement which he leads. Whether his noble antecedents or his aristocratic charm are responsible for this attitude or whether he appears the least dangerous leader the Free Italians could choose is hard to say. The happy fact remains, however, that Sforza is a democrat and a statesman, and as long as his leadership is, however informally, acknowledged by the State Department, no revival of appeasement is likely.

But for one Sforza there are a dozen favored "free" leaders whose credentials are of a dubious color. Take, as an example, Otto of Austria. Without any doubt Otto heads a mixed field of candidates for the leadership of the anti-Nazi Austrians in exile. His stock in Washington has been going up fast, and some informed persons believe that a Free Austrian legion headed by Otto will soon receive some sort of "unofficial" approval in official Washington.

Why not? By State Department standards Otto is the almost perfect candidate. His ancestry inspires official confidence; his charm is admitted by his enemies; he is a good Catholic; he dislikes Hitler; he advocates a "democratic" Central European federation. He has described this future federation in a recent issue of Voice of Austria; and the fact that its outlines and structure bear a curious resemblance to the Austro-Hungarian Empire lately ruled by his great-grand-uncle is not likely to disconcert those responsible for our present diplomacy. On the contrary. Otto fits into the conservative, clerical, restored "old order" envisaged by these officials as smoothly as if he had been designed by Adolf Berle.

From the pragmatic point of view, however, the idea has flaws. We may ignore the effect it would have on democratic elements here and abroad. We may dismiss the bitterness it would arouse among Austrian democrats, who would consider it a new proof of the State Department's cynical determination to insure the future against a real application of the Four Freedoms or any other democratic nonsense. But the emotions of ordinary people are beyond the concern of diplomats. What might give them pause is the effect Otto's elevation would surely have on several of the governments-in-exile—especially the Czecho-Slovak and Yugoslav and Polish governments. Whereas the State Department's unhappy flirtation with Tibor Eckhardt, the Hungarian reactionary and ex-terrorist, was an affront to the democratic sensibilities of our Eastern European friends, its support of the Austrian archduke would have weightier consequences. No amount of charm will induce states that once suffered the Hapsburg yoke to look with favor on Otto's claims to leadership. And his plans for a federated Central Europe are equally suspect. Any indorsement of Otto—open or sub rosa—would be taken as an unfriendly act and would seriously injure our relations with our allies-in-exile. This may seem intolerant and unreasonable to Otto's sponsors, but it is a simple fact. And it is a fact that should be considered by the pragmatists of the State Department before they decide on the resurrection of the Hapsburg dynasty.

Willkie and F. D. R.

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, October 18

WENDELL WILLKIE'S trip abroad has not increased his popularity at the White House, where there is an uneasy feeling that he may have launched the 1944 Presidential campaign from Moscow and Chungking. Permission to make the trip was given reluctantly by the President, after much coaxing by Willkie. Willkie's remarks in Moscow and Chungking were not only unauthorized but resented. Mr. Roosevelt seems to regard the Moscow statement on the second front as an attempt by Willkie to prod the hand that sent him abroad in an army bomber.

The White House, while properly grateful for Willkie's services in demonstrating national unity at home and abroad, senses that he is anxious to keep himself in the public eye. The fourth term is still undecided. Those around the President are not too anxious to see strong, popular alternatives develop, whether outside the Democratic Party or within it. At the moment the only possibilities for progressives are Willkie and Wallace. While Wallace stays loyally and dutifully in vice-presidential obscurity, Willkie is engaged in unorthodox maneuvers. The Administration does not have to move much farther right or Willkie much farther left to reverse their relative position in 1940. Big business could not have a firmer grip on the war economy under Willkie than it has under Roosevelt.

Willkie is playing a daring game. He believes that he long ago made himself unacceptable to Old Guard Republican leaders and that his only hope is to strike out boldly for a popularity that will force them to support his candidacy in 1944. He has cut loose from party moorings, turned his back on the country-club set, and invaded Roosevelt territory. His hunch is that by 1944 there will be much dissatisfaction among workers, farmers, and small business men which can be capitalized by a newer and younger figure prepared to outbid a moribund New Deal for their favor. The Commonwealth and Southern executive who once thought the SEC a nest of commissars has gone a long way in the opposite direction. It is a good thing that Roosevelt was elected in 1940, and, in another sense, it is a good thing that Willkie was defeated. The latter has learned much in defeat that would not have occurred to him in victory, and progressives who have spoken with him in recent months report many changes in his patterns of thought. At the very least, Willkie's course should increase the bargaining power of labor and the left in dealing with Roosevelt. For some time the President has felt that he had labor and the left so securely in his political pocket that he could concentrate on wooing the right, a process in which the New Deal has been so slicked up as to become almost unrecognizable.

Within the Administration the dwindling hopes of the New Dealers rest on Leon Henderson. No one else shows either the courage or the capacity to provide them with leadership in their fight against the coalition of Wall Streeters, dollar-a-year men in uniform, and political-minded generals who have taken over war production. Recent shifts have left Donald M. Nelson a ludicrous figure; the armed services and their banker allies are in control of the WPB. A principal figure is Lieutenant General Brehon B. Somervell, commanding general of the War Department's Services of Supply.

General Somervell is shrewd, ambitious, and subtly arrogant. He is good at internal Administration politics, knows how to play up to the press, and is not unaware of the uses of social demagoguery. He is a kind of American von Schleicher, though unlike his German analogue he is reaching out for alliances on the right rather than the left. At a recent meeting of the War Production Board, where General Somervell has been cock-of-the-walk, Henderson very plainly told the General that the war-production program was supposed to be run by the War Production Board, not General Somervell, and that he, Henderson, was getting tired of having the board bossed around by the General. General Somervell, so the story goes, said he was pretty tired himself of hearing Henderson "pop off," and Henderson suggested that if the General was tired he could leave.

Henderson, with some of the load of price control now lifted from him, has about decided to turn his attention again to production matters, a sphere from which the Knudsen crowd began to ease him in the summer of 1941 when he tried to hasten curtailment and conversion of the automobile and other civilian industries. He will have to go to the mat with General Somervell, and if he does he will have the Senate Small Business Committee rooting for him. General Somervell made an unpleasant impression on the committee during the past week by his contemptuous attitude on the witness stand, his juggling of figures, and his disingenuous answers.

The committee might have spent its time questioning the directors of the new Smaller War Plants Corporation, which promises to be as big a failure as its predecessor organizations in giving little business a part in the war program. The SWPC, like its forerunners, is dependent on army-navy procurement officers, who still do the actual letting of the contracts. The committee therefore declined to have its attention distracted from essentials and decided instead to call General Somervell and the supply-service procurement officials subordinate to him. It took New York City as a specimen case and found that from 70 to 85 per cent of the war orders sent by Washington to the district ordnance office in New York for placement were secretly earmarked for manufacturers already making those items. Senator Murray asked Colonel Robert Wood Johnson (of Johnson and Johnson, the manufacturers of pharmaceuticals) whether any investigation was made "as to whether or not there would be other concerns that would be capable of taking those extended orders . . . rather than pile them up in the same concern?" "I should say usually not," was the unwilling answer.

General Somervell appeared before the committee next day and sought to repair the damage done by Colonel Johnson's admissions. He presented a series of elaborate but deceptively incomplete charts designed to show that more contracts were going to small concerns. When Senator Murray brushed these charts aside and declared "the substantial part of the [war] production is being carried on by a limited number of large concerns," Somervell confessed, "That is right." The General annoyed the committee by saying that little business did not want war orders and by denying that the army had difficulty in getting big businesses like the large automobile companies to go into war production. Later General Somervell explained that he only meant "we had no difficulty in getting the automobile industry to take their part of the orders for automobiles." This patriotic readiness to sell automobiles to the army as well as civilians failed to impress the committee.

The Services Have Learned

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THERE are at least two main standpoints from which to gauge the degree of our success in the war to date. From the perspective of the past we are doing a fine piece of work. In no previous conflict have we moved so rapidly and efficiently. But if we consider the task we face, our accomplishments seem less impressive. We became the ally of nations already losing and the foe of some of the ablest military peoples and leaders known to history. Our initial blunders in the Pacific still further weakened our prospects. Finally, our administrative bungling in the field of vital materials, the constant effort of many and diverse interests to use the war emergency to gain their selfish aims, the persistence of race discrimination, the bickering between army and navy and among the various members of the United Nations must all be seen in the light of a desperate struggle for existence.

Fortunately, in the United States the services have shown far more ability to profit by their own blunders than has been the case with the British Army. Air force, army, and navy have all come a long way since December 7.

Maintained as it was in at least theoretical readiness for war at any time, the navy's problem was easier than that of the army. While it has doubled in man-power and greatly expanded its patrol activities in the Atlantic and its support of bases in the Pacific, its striking power has not been greatly increased, since most of the new ships in service are anti-submarine craft of various types. The greatest accretion to its strength derives from the unannounced but very probable completion of four new 35,000-ton battleships, sister ships of the North Carolina. Eight new light cruisers have compensated for the loss of four heavy ones. New destroyers and submarines have far exceeded sinkings. Like Japan, we suffer from a shortage of plane carriers, which are as necessary as they are highly vulnerable. The first carriers of a gigantic new program are still months short of completion.

In the fighting of the past year the navy suffered disgrace at Pearl Harbor, was roughly handled at the beginning of the Aleutian campaign and in the Java Sea, and was soundly beaten in a night battle in the Solomons. To its credit are a little better than a drawn battle in the Coral Sea, the brilliantly managed though lucky victory at Midway, and a far more successful war of attrition by airplanes and submarines than the Japanese have been able to conduct. No longer is the opponent so outrageously underestimated as in the days before the war, and the navy has thoroughly learned the lesson of air power.

From other angles the picture is not so bright. For a hundred years the navy has managed to exist under a bureaucratic organization which has been a continued and deserved target for critics. Some improvements have been made since the beginning of this war, but the thorough reorganization needed was abandoned a few months ago in favor of piecemeal change. It has not been reassuring to see several officers of proved incompetence promoted rather than purged. The slowness with which losses have been acknowledged even when they are perfectly well known to the enemy, as in the fighting around Java, and the paucity of information given out are also mistakes. The details of plane losses and ship damage at Pearl Harbor are certainly known to the Japanese at this late date and are no longer of great importance. As long as the American people are needlessly denied information of this type the suspicion is certain to be present that the Navy Department is suppressing news to conceal blunders. Over-confidence of people in our war effort can also be a danger.

The army started the war much less ready for action but with the great psychological advantage over the navy of knowing its own weaknesses and the necessity for improvement. As a result it has gone through a process of expansion and reform which has been nothing short of revolutionary. The way for this was paved by a reorganization of the War Department over a year ago which appears to have cut through a good deal of red tape and eliminated much duplication and waste motion. The strongest, best cared-for, best educated personnel of any army on earth has been toughened up to the point where it outmatches the formerly amazing endurance achievements of the German troops. Lack of equipment is no longer a problem. The lesson of air-land coordination appears to have been learned, and the United States has made at least as much progress as other nations in the development of special-purpose troops. Fourteen armored divisions are now in existence. A large influx of new blood in the commissioned ranks has had a wholesome effect. The army still has serious faults and is not yet a completed product, but in its essential modernity and fighting spirit it is enormously stronger than it was a year ago.

Our record in the air has been steadily improving. In the Philippine Islands even more than at Pearl Harbor the surprise and destruction of the army planes on the ground was a national scandal. But these mistakes have not been repeated, and the worst that can be said of the Air Corps' recent record in Europe is that our fliers have not yet undergone the acid tests passed by the R. A. F. Meanwhile, the box score of planes destroyed in both the Pacific and the European theater of war has favored the United States by so wide a margin as seriously to embarrass the air extremists, who have had to account for marked successes attained under a system of air-force administration which they deplore. This group has also been responsible for a popular but incorrect impression that Midway was a victory of land-based over carrier-based air power, an interpretation which any close study of the available facts will refute.

The rivalry between the army and navy over credit for Midway illustrates a persistent weakness which has not yet been solved—inter-service jealousy and non-cooperation. Pearl Harbor turned a floodlight on this defect but did not eliminate it. The system of giving either an admiral or a general command over all forces in an area, according to whether naval or military interests are predominant, has worked some improvement. Nevertheless, the red tape incident to securing army aid for the navy resulted in unnecessary ship sinkings along the Atlantic coast, and the reluctance of the navy to have an army air base nearby accounted for the early heavy losses at Dutch Harbor, where the navy had nothing better than Catalina patrol planes to match Japanese fighters and dive bombers.

Nor has joint command been achieved in the international military sphere. Even announced agreements between the British and ourselves, where machinery for cooperative action has been in existence for several months, have not been carried out. The failure of the Anglo-American group to reach an understanding with the Russians is notorious. Finally, Mr. Roosevelt's attack on the demand of civilians and newspapers for a second front leaves room for a crushing reply. Civilian critics can always be accused of incomplete knowledge; a major fault of the present Administration has been its sugarcoating of news, its refusal to let the American people know the full facts. But even without all the facts, civilians have been right in their disputes with professional military men an amazingly large number of times.

In the First World War Winston Churchill, a civilian, brought about the introduction of tanks; had it been well used on a sufficient scale, the new weapon would have ended the war. He also promoted the adoption of convoys, a device which cheated the U-boat of victory. In both cases he faced the determined opposition of the generals and admirals of his day. In the present war he has silenced critics and remained almost completely in the camp of the professionals—and has been consistently defeated. It took Hitler, a rank amateur, to reveal the full incapacity and lack of imagination of the French generals commanding "the best army in the world." The recent development of torpedo planes is largely due to the efforts of ex-Secretary of the Navy Edison, and was achieved over the opposition of Admiral Leahy, who usually had the support of the President. Congress in 1938 urged that large numbers of experimental patrol vessels be built for anti-submarine work. Had this line of development been followed with any enthusiasm by the navy, the tremendous merchant-ship sinkings in the western Atlantic—sinkings which may yet cost us the war—would certainly have been checked much sooner. No sane person would disdain the technical advice of admirals and generals, but in the words of Clemenceau, "War is too important to be left solely to the generals."

Mexico's Home Front

BY HARRY BLOCK

Mexico City, October 10

MEXICO'S readjustment to the inexorable fact of war is beginning to make progress, though there is still more rhetoric than reality in the national mobilization. On Independence Day three weeks ago six ex-Presidents stood up with President Avila Camacho in an unprecedented ceremony of national unity. The vast crowd massed in the capital's central square had eyes, however, for only two of them—General Plutarco Elías Calles, former "Supreme Chief of the Mexican Revolution," and General Lázaro Cárdenas, who in 1936 exiled him from the country. It was a dramatic moment. No other figures so perfectly typify the dual tendencies and aims that have made the revolutionary development a social seesaw. Their first public appearance together in nearly eight years was presented as a visible symbol that past political differences were buried and that the nation was determined to exhibit an unbroken front to the world.

National unity has been the goal of the Camacho government since it came to power nearly two years ago, but the fact that it was thought necessary to put on so elaborate a spectacle suggests that unity is still not fully achieved. This impression is confirmed by the reception accorded the newsreels of the event in the movie houses, where the alternating applause and hisses for the six ex-Presidents indicated that Mexico's internal struggles have not yet been suspended for the duration. Nevertheless, no one can compare the general temper of the Mexican people today with the prevailing sentiment only six months ago without recognizing a marked change. The country is beginning to take the war seriously. Organization for defense and for war is moving ahead. A practice blackout in the capital was a remarkable demonstration of civil discipline. The new arms acquired from the United States made a brave display in the Independence Day parade, even if the army had to borrow some chauffeurs from the labor organizations to help drive the still unfamiliar motorized equipment. Compulsory military service has been enacted in Mexico, though the law is not yet in operation. Meanwhile, throughout the country, hundreds of thousands of men of all ages are voluntarily drilling; the significant feature of this movement is that it began in the provinces and only recently reached Mexico City, an encouraging reversal of the usual process.

In spite of these healthy signs, however, it cannot be said that the battle of the home front has been won. Mexico during the preceding regime was largely engaged in refighting the Mexican Revolution, and it is utopian to suppose that its deep-seated antagonisms can be forgotten overnight or banished any farther than just below the surface. For the sake of unity, in order to appease business and industry, the labor movement has adopted what is virtually a no-strike policy. To appease landholders and the so-called "small proprietors" (corresponding to the commercial farmers who support the American farm lobby), the agrarian reform has been slowed and watered down. To appease the church, the educational system has been again revamped to purge it of its "socialist" character and its immoral practice of letting little boys and girls attend primary school together. Apparently unity has required the surrender to the conservatives of the chief positions captured during the preceding six years of renewed revolutionary upsurge. The lion and the lamb are indeed lying down together, but as usual the lamb is inside the lion.

Defense of democracy against totalitarianism, if it implies no more than a defense of the status quo, is an inadequate slogan even in the United States and Great Britain. To hold it up as an inspiration to the Mexican masses, who have never known genuine democracy, is of the nature of a cruel jest. One cannot ask people to "unite" without reference to the forces that have hitherto held them apart. What has been lacking here, clearly, is a progressive program that by giving concrete meaning to the concept of unity would arouse the national will in support of the war. It is no secret that Mexico's entry into the war found the majority of the population apathetic about its outcome and a small minority actively pro-Axis. The country's present political struggle centers on the question of what goals unity is expected to achieve and who will write the program—the progressives, who sincerely seek to make Mexico's weight felt in the anti-fascist struggle and to combat the internal trends toward fascism, or the conservatives, who, finding themselves involved in a war they never wanted, would now like to have it fought for their exclusive benefit.

The first important sign of government recognition that the base of support for the war effort would have to be broadened came with the appointment of Cárdenas, shortly after Pearl Harbor, to command the Pacific defense zone. Ever since his retirement from the Presidency in 1940 Cárdenas has been a kind of symbol. Whether or not the man himself corresponded with the idea of him that took hold of the popular imagination is beside the point. For the man in the street, for the workers and peasants throughout the country, Cárdenas represented the hope of freedom, progress, and well-being; with the spread of disillusionment that accompanied the hard times ushered in by the war—long before Mexico was involved—the symbol of Cárdenas began to acquire almost magical power.

Cárdenas himself has remained correctly aloof, careful to dissociate himself from this growing sentiment and to give it no encouragement. When he stepped down from the Presidency he announced his intention of retiring to private life, and while this statement is made by all outgoing Mexican Presidents—and in the past has almost never been honored—there is reason to believe that Cárdenas meant it. Not only did he fail to assume leadership of the "opposition"—there was none, properly speaking, only an amorphous mass of puzzled discontent—but he publicly declared his unreserved support of the President.

This should have been enough to dampen the spirits of his more ardent followers. But it must again be insisted that it was less Cárdenas the man they were following than the idea associated with his name—the whole complex of policies, programs, acts, and objectives that his regime stood for. His appointment to the Pacific post was obviously a concession to this popular feeling, an effort on the part of the administration to capitalize his prestige. The political, rather than military, nature of the appointment was emphasized when General Abelardo Rodríguez, another ex-President, who represents almost the antithesis of Cárdenas, was named to the corresponding post on the Gulf Coast.

Early last month Cárdenas was appointed to a re-organized and enlarged Defense Ministry which is to assume supreme command over the army, the navy, and the air force. The left groups—labor organizations, the peasants, and the radical wing of the official Party of the Mexican Revolution—were jubilant, more so perhaps than the facts warrant, since Cárdenas, even if he were so disposed, which is doubtful, could not assume leadership of the progressive movement unless he were provided with a clear and workable program of action, and this the left has so far failed to produce. The conservatives made little effort to conceal their distaste for the appointment, but tempered their criticism with the comment that Cárdenas would not be too disastrous a choice if he would refrain from "politics." As the shake-up was purely political in character, this attitude is almost comical. Whatever Cárdenas may or may not do, it had proved impossible to make real progress toward national unity without concession to the forces represented by the Cárdenas "idea."

Why did Cárdenas accept? If his enemies are right and he really harbors secret political ambitions, his position was obviously stronger outside the government than as a member of it. It is therefore being suggested here that very heavy pressure was brought to bear to induce him to accept; that the President came to the conclusion that the Cárdenas idea was potentially too explosive to leave floating about uncontrolled and that the way to diminish the importance of the symbol was to bring the man into Mexico City, where he would no longer be the subject of irresponsible speculation that was feeding unrest. If this theory is correct, it was a smart move. As a member of the government Cárdenas will share responsibility for its policies; and even if he finds himself in disagreement with them he can hardly withdraw. One can imagine the row the press would raise were the hated Cárdenas to "abandon his post in time of war" because of political differences with the regime. There is, on the other hand, no reason for supposing that Cárdenas did not accept the post because he felt he could thus best serve his country in the emergency. Some further Cabinet changes may be made as a result of his return to the government. There are indications that Véjar Vázquez, the intrepid hero of the war against coeducational elementary schools, may be on the way out. But no major shift in internal government policies appears imminent.

Among the chief obstacles to national unity are the rapid deterioration of the living standards of the Mexican masses in the past three years and the glaring fact that the country's privileged classes are making no comparable sacrifices for the war effort. In 1941 it already cost twice as much to eat as it did in 1933; today's prices have risen nearly 20 per cent over those of last year. Wages and salaries in the meantime have been stationary. If Mexico's rural population were dependent on the market rather than on their tiny subsistence patches—if Mexico, that is, were a developed capitalist country instead of a nation barely emerging from semi-feudalism—economic disaster would already have overtaken the nation; economic backwardness has certain negative virtues of its own. But if the peasants' state of permanent depression has not been seriously affected by the situation, the city dwellers, especially the industrial workers and the minor employees of government and private business, have been taking a severe beating. What would Mr. Henderson do with a rise in food prices—which make up three-quarters of the living expenses of the average Mexican family—of more than 100 per cent?

An additional point that cannot be too strongly emphasized is that Mexico is now almost 100 per cent dependent on the United States. Practically nothing enters the country except from the United States; nothing leaves it except to the United States. Such dependence is pernicious economically; it is even worse politically. For the century that Mexicans have been struggling to win national independence they have been taught to fear and suspect the big neighbor to the north. Their present dependence on Washington for their very bread is for that reason all the more galling.

We are paying now for past sins just as surely as the British are paying for their past sins in India. India is a case in point. The present Indian crisis, because it provides the first great test of the validity of the Atlantic Charter's high-sounding principles, is being closely watched throughout Latin America. As countries with only the shadow, seldom the substance, of national independence, the American republics are vitally interested in the charter; only unequivocal action to implement its promises will change their somewhat cynical view of the brave new world it is supposed to usher in. In the meantime they observe the realities of British rule in India—and wonder. What prospect does an Allied victory hold out to them?

Will Mexico, for example, be less dependent on the United States after the war? Many Mexicans honestly fear being doomed to a permanent economic subservience that will effectively short-circuit all the nation's hopes of true independence. They see the future as a blind alley of frustrated nationalism in which it will be impossible to turn back—the Mexican Revolution has at least accomplished that much—and equally impossible to forge ahead. This is what those Mexicans are thinking about who observe pessimistically that in the long run their country may have almost as much to fear from the United States as from Germany.

Now this is a highly dangerous attitude. It is no longer possible to draw nice subjective distinctions between "innocent" anti-Americanism and actual pro-Hitlerism. Only too often patriotic nationalist opinions, however honestly held, provide a convenient opening for Axis propaganda, whose ends are adequately gained if it can succeed in inflaming the latent anti-gringo sentiment. But the way to combat this tendency is by removing the grievances that lend it apparent justification. Some months ago Vice-President Wallace declared that American imperialism was dead. Sumner Welles has several times reinforced the statement. Theirs were excellent words. But unfortunately, as the war continues, the internal economy of Mexico becomes ever more adversely affected by the economic necessities of the United States; though the death of imperialism has been proclaimed, the imperialist character of the economic relations between the United States and Latin America has actually been strengthened. Probably very little can be done under war conditions materially to correct this situation, but a program for the future conceived in terms more precise than those of the Atlantic Charter would go far toward allaying existing fears. The time to draft such a program is now. If we expect to defeat Axis imperialism, we must persuade people that we are not hoping to maintain an imperialist preserve in our own backyard.

Mexico's reactionaries have their own solution ready. It is a solution that leaves 90 per cent of the Mexican people out of the picture, but it has the virtue of solving the problem quite satisfactorily for the other 10 per cent. Let Mexico continue to be dependent on American industry. Let foreign capital come in on its own terms to exploit native resources. Offer "guaranties"—protection against taxation, against labor and agrarian demands. And let Mexico continue to be an exporter of raw materials produced by the 90 per cent and an importer of finished goods to be consumed by the 10 per cent. With enough funds allocated from the surplus of this system to police the country, it can even be made to work—for a time, for their time, anyway.

Is there another solution? The answer to that is another question: Is this an anti-fascist war? Are we not fighting to render impossible the reactionary solution of the social problem of our time? The common people of all countries have the same goal in the conflict—the destruction not only of fascism in Germany and Italy and Japan but of its seeds and tendencies within their own borders. If unity ceases to be an abstract slogan and becomes the purposeful unity of all anti-fascist forces, if the hidden civil war that underlies the international war is courageously recognized and loyally fought, then there is real hope for the future. The democratic peoples of America will find a way to an inter-American economy that will satisfy the needs and the aspirations of all.

Lewis and the A. F. of L.

BY JAMES A. WECHSLER

Toronto, October 15

NOTHING that happened at the American Federation of Labor's sixty-second convention created as much animated discussion among the A. F. of L. delegates as the latest antics of the man who wasn't there—John L. Lewis. A. F. of L. officials read dispatches from the Cincinnati convention of the Mine Workers more avidly than stories about their own deliberations. They speculated on the possibility that Lewis might appear in Toronto before the A. F. of L. sessions ended. At least four delegates solemnly announced they had seen Philip Murray scurrying through the hotel lobby, racing to get in ahead of his ex-boss.

Lewis's formal withdrawal from the C. I. O. evoked a mixed response from A. F. of L. leaders. Nearly all of them, of course, derive great pleasure from the troubles of what Federation orators still call the "rebel, rival dual movement." Moreover, they feel that the break between Lewis and the C. I. O. enormously enhances A. F. of L. bargaining power in the coming unity negotiations. They are convinced that the C. I. O. leadership will hasten to make peace before Lewis can get back into the A. F. of L. on his own. They enjoy the prospect of Lewis and Murray competing for A. F. of L. favor. William Green took pains to point out that the "door is open" to the United Mine Workers and that a separate peace with Lewis is not out of the question.

While all this is regarded as fitting punishment for "those who left the house of labor," there is a substantial A. F. of L. bloc that would genuinely prefer to deal with the C. I. O.; it recognizes that Lewis's return to the A. F. of L. would virtually doom unity negotiations and does not relish the thought of "Big John" again bossing Federation affairs. Green privately subscribes to this view. But the proceedings of the Toronto convention did nothing to dispel the impression that William L. Hutcheson, czar of the building trades and John L.'s Republican playmate, exerts more influence in the A. F. of L.'s back room than Green or those who think like Green. It is generally believed that Hutcheson will continue to do private business with Lewis. He is a member of the A. F. of L. three-man committee that will soon meet with the C. I. O. Lewis will not be uninformed of what goes on.

It is possible that Franklin D. Roosevelt may have to step in once again to prevent a deal that would put the C. I. O.'s leaders on the spot and restore Lewis's power. Lewis's Cincinnati rhetoric was an admission, it is felt, that he has to reckon with the President; his complaint that the C. I. O. chiefs were trying to "undermine" him at the White House was an acknowledgment that he respects Roosevelt's influence in labor affairs. There were even some who detected a note of deference. But it is considered doubtful that Mr. Roosevelt will be moved. One high A. F. of L. official with no special animus against Lewis said to me here, "We all know John still hopes to take the labor movement back to the Republican Party." (He didn't mean the Willkie wing.) Until Lewis abandons that hope, he will have to fight Roosevelt as well as Philip Murray to recapture control of United States labor. Hutcheson's influence is not to be minimized, but few A. F. of L. chiefs seem ready to quarrel with the White House.

Apart from the extra-curricular diversion created by Lewis, the A. F. of L.'s ten-day conference shattered no traditions. Perhaps the most significant trend revealed by the meetings was the widening gap between British labor and A. F. of L. leaders over relations with the Russian trade unionists. The two fraternal delegates from the British Trades Union Congress—Jack Tanner and Bryn Roberts—pleaded politely but vigorously for reversal of the Federation's refusal to sit on a joint committee with the Russian trade unionists—without result. Tanner was received in frigid silence, largely because he tried to sell a party-line analysis of the Soviet state as well as the war need for an international labor front. Roberts, who stuck to the latter point, got a better reaction, but it was less than enthusiastic. After a brief debate in which Matthew Woll laid down the A. F. of L.'s line, the convention voted overwhelmingly to reaffirm the Federation's past position—aid to the Soviet armies but no direct dealings with Soviet labor. The left-wing forces at this convention could have held their caucus in the proverbial telephone booth.

The most dramatic incident was again precipitated by A. Philip Randolph, president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and one of the two Negro delegates on the scene. Randolph made his annual plea for appointment of a committee to combat discrimination in A. F. of L. unions. He also urged the convention to speak out in behalf of independence for India. No white delegate in the crowd of 600 rose to support him on either count. Dan Tobin of the Teamsters assailed Randolph for "lighting the torch of dissension." The convention voted to deplore race discrimination and to refer the fate of India to the Anglo-American labor committee. It is generally acknowledged that Green would have liked to do something about the Negro issue, but his longing for harmony overcame his better instincts.

The A. F. of L.'s attitude toward the Russian trade unions and toward union discrimination will plague the negotiators when the meetings with the C. I. O. begin. Yet more important than these ideological conflicts is the survival of deep and bitter resentment; this convention gave no new sign that reconciliation is in the air. The Federation formally proposed an immediate armistice on "raiding," but no machinery to enforce the truce was suggested. Speakers who inveighed against the C. I. O.'s past got the biggest ovations. The present members of the Labor Relations Board were denounced as fiercely as their predecessors for allegedly favoring the C. I. O.

The boys also whooped things up over the behavior of Thurman Arnold; there was a minor degree of pandemonium when news was received that Arnold's move for a temporary injunction against James C. Petrillo had been thrown out of court. Perhaps the most intense discussion of the convention, however, concerned a jurisdictional dispute between the Carpenters and Machinists, a struggle which goes back to 1914. A similar dispute between the Machinists and the Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railway Employees was also gone over at length. These ancient matters filled several long hours of convention time. The Machinists lost twice, if anybody cares.

Poll Tax and Filibuster

BY J. LACEY REYNOLDS

BY A thumping three-to-one majority the House has passed the Geyer bill prohibiting poll taxes in Congressional and other federal elections. Never before have there been such bright prospects for emancipating the federal electorate in the eight Southern poll-tax states. But there are formidable obstacles to be overcome in the Senate, despite the fact that a majority would speedily pass the Geyer bill's Senate counterpart, the Pepper bill, if given the chance. The Senate Judiciary Committee, which has dawdled with the Pepper bill for nineteen months, will probably have taken action by the time this article appears, but even assuming the discharge, the bill faces the serious threat of a filibuster by a stubborn band of reactionary Southerners. This small minority need hold out only to the end of the present session in January, when all bills die.

The Senate greased the constitutional ways for passage of the Geyer-Pepper bill when it voted thirty-three to twenty, last August, to abolish the poll tax for soldiers. At that time the question whether Congress has constitutional authority to legislate on poll taxes was thoroughly debated. In the matter of legality the Geyer-

Pepper bill does not differ from the soldier-vote act, and therefore the Senate cannot very well adduce constitutional objections. To do so would convict it of having made a purely political play for soldier support.

The Senate Judiciary Committee's handling of the Pepper bill is worth recounting. A five-man subcommittee headed by Senator Joseph C. O'Mahoney, Wyoming Democrat, has held intermittent hearings on it for fifteen months. On October 2 this group brought in an unfavorable report, with only Senator George Norris, the Nebraska liberal, voting affirmatively. O'Mahoney wrote the majority report, which criticized the bill with a savagery that warmed the heart of his colleague on the subcommittee, Senator Tom Connally of poll-taxed Texas. Congress, O'Mahoney said, has no authority to abolish the poll tax by simple statute, a constitutional amendment is necessary; the Constitution gives the states sole authority to fix qualifications for federal voters, and besides, this is not the time to pass such legislation. As an interpretation of the Constitution according to Connally, the job could not have been better done by the Texan himself. O'Mahoney has introduced a constitutional amendment, but nobody takes it seriously. Only the Southerners rose to commend it for the obvious purpose of diverting strength from the Geyer-Pepper bill.

The full committee postponed action on the subcommittee report, presumably to see how the House voted on the Geyer bill. The 252-to-84 House verdict ought to prove sufficient to force out a report, but even if it does not, all hope is not lost. Senator Norris has promised to submit the motion to discharge the committee, if necessary. The quicker the issue is brought to debate the easier it will be to ride out a filibuster.

The Pepper-Geyer bill is in essence a war measure. It will remove the mote from our own eyes and demonstrate to the world that we believe in the democracy which we recommend to others. It will deprive the Axis of the powerful propaganda argument that we do not practice what we preach. It will give the low-income Southerner the opportunity to help choose officials of the government which has sent his sons to battle and demanded many other sacrifices of him.

The arguments of the bill's opponents are depressingly traditional. On the final day of the hearings of the O'Mahoney subcommittee, Governor Frank Dixon of Alabama and Richard M. Jeffries of South Carolina offered the same objections to poll-tax repeal that were formerly raised against the Wage-Hour Act and other federal regulatory laws. Listening to these gentlemen expound states' rights, one had the impression that on their record of their country's history the needle had stuck at the Webster-Hayne debate. Outside the committee-room window an American soldier paced back and forth, a symbol of democracy on guard, while within they debated whether democracy was worth extending.

Gandhi to Chiang Kai-shek

[Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek is the best authority in the world on who is pro-Japanese and who is anti-Japanese. Chiang believes that Mahatma Gandhi is anti-Japanese. Chiang is certain that British concessions now to the Indian Nationalist movement would help China and help win this war. The Chinese government has made vigorous representations to Great Britain with a view to a settlement of the Indian question. Chiang is pro-Gandhi because he knows Gandhi is pro-Chinese. While in India this summer I obtained from a Chinese source the following hitherto unpublished letter to Chiang written by Gandhi before he launched the present civil-disobedience movement.—LOUIS FISCHER.]

I CAN never forget the five hours' close contact I had with you and your noble wife in Calcutta. I always felt drawn toward you in your fight for freedom, and that contact and our conversation brought China and her problems still nearer to me. Long ago, between 1905 and 1913, when I was in South Africa, I was in constant touch with the small Chinese colony in Johannesburg. I knew them first as clients and then as comrades in the Indian passive-resistance struggle in South Africa. I came into touch with them in Mauritius also. I learned then to admire their thrift, industry, resourcefulness, and internal unity. Later in India I had a very fine Chinese friend living with me for a few years, and we all learned to like him. I have thus felt greatly attracted toward your great country, and, in common with my countrymen, my sympathy has gone out to you in your terrible struggle. Our mutual friend, Jawaharlal Nehru, whose love of China is only excelled, if at all, by his love of his own country, has kept us in intimate touch with the developments of the Chinese struggle.

Because of this feeling I have toward China and my earnest desire that our two great countries should come closer to each other and cooperate to their mutual advantage, I am anxious to explain to you that my appeal to the British power to withdraw from India is not meant in any shape or form to weaken India's defense against the Japanese or embarrass you in your struggle. India must not submit to any aggressor or invader and must resist him. I would not be guilty of purchasing the freedom of my country at the cost of your country's freedom. That problem does not arise before me, since I am clear that India cannot gain her freedom in this way, and a Japanese domination of either India or China would be equally injurious to the other country and to world peace. That domination must therefore be prevented, and I should like India to play her natural and rightful part in this. I feel India cannot do so while she is in bondage. India has been a helpless witness of the withdrawals from Malaya, Singapore, and Burma. We must learn the lesson from these tragic events and prevent by all means at our disposal a repetition of what befell these unfortunate countries. But unless we are free we can do nothing to prevent it, and the same process might well occur again, crippling India and China disastrously. I do not want a repetition of this tragic tale of woe.

Our proffered help has repeatedly been rejected by the British government, and the recent failure of the Cripps mission has left a deep wound, which is still running. Out of that anguish has come the cry for immediate withdrawal of British power so that India can look after herself and help China to the best of her ability. I have told you of my faith in non-violence and of my belief in the effectiveness of this method if the whole nation could turn to it. The faith in it is as firm as ever. But I realize that India today as a whole has not that faith and belief, and the government in Free India would be formed from the various elements composing the nation.

Today the whole of India is impotent and feels frustrated. The Indian army consists largely of people who have joined up because of economic pressure. They have no feeling of a cause to fight for, and in no sense are they a national army. Those of us who would fight for a cause, for India and China, with armed forces or with non-violence, cannot under the foreign heel function as we want to. And yet our people know for certain that India free can play even a decisive part, not only in her own behalf, but also in behalf of China and world peace. Many, like me, feel that it is not proper or manly to remain in this helpless state and allow events to overwhelm us when a way to effective action can be opened to us. They feel, therefore, that every possible effort should be made to insure independence and that freedom of action which is so urgently needed. This is the origin of my appeal to the British power to end immediately the unnatural connection between Britain and India.

Unless we make that effort there is grave danger of public feeling in India going into wrong and harmful channels. There is every likelihood of subterranean sympathy for Japan growing, simply in order to weaken and oust British authority in India. This feeling may take the place of robust confidence in our ability never to

Time

Time means quite a different thing to a man who is trying to hold the Nazis on the Volga than it does to an Allied officer preparing material for the next meeting of the General Staff. Time is counted differently in a French concentration camp where an anti-fascist fighter awaits the reply to his last desperate appeal for a visa than in the foreign office where bored officials consider whether the applicant is or is not likely to dynamite the foundations of the state. Time may be only one hour—between six and seven, neither too bright nor too dark—for the young Parisian who waits for the Nazi sergeant to shoot him down. It may be six months or a year for those charged with the creation of a Supreme Allied Council to direct political war.

"Time is on our side" sounded all right when the smashing successes of the Nazi armies held the nations in fearful suspense and it was necessary to present time as an ally. Today those words suggest anything but a will to win. To the soldiers in the trenches they are an exasperation; to the peoples of the occupied countries, a cruel agony. To the appeasers they offer the hope that the invasion of Europe may be delayed until time has once more moved to the "other side," and a negotiated peace has become possible.

look to outsiders for help in winning our freedom. We have to learn self-reliance and develop the strength to work out our own salvation. This is only possible if we make a determined effort to free ourselves from bondage. That freedom has become a present necessity to enable us to take our due place among the free nations of the world.

To make it perfectly clear that we want to prevent in every way Japanese aggression, I would personally agree, and I am sure the government of Free India would agree, that the Allied powers might, under treaty with us, keep their armed forces in India and use the country as a base for operations against the threatened Japanese attack.

I need hardly give you my assurance that, as the author of the new move in India, I shall take no hasty action. And whatever action I may recommend will be governed by the consideration that it should not injure China or encourage Japanese aggression in India or China. I am trying to enlist world opinion in favor of a proposition which to me appears self-proved and which must lead to the strengthening of India's and China's defense. I am also educating public opinion in India and conferring with my colleagues. Needless to say, any movement against the British government with which I may be connected will be essentially non-violent. I am straining every nerve to avoid a conflict with British authority. But if in the winning of freedom, which has become an immediate desideratum, this becomes inevitable, I shall not hesitate to run any risk however great.

Very soon you will have completed five years of war against Japanese aggression and invasion and all the sorrow and misery that these have brought to China. My heart goes out to the people of China in deep sympathy and admiration for their heroic struggle and endless sacrifices against tremendous odds. I am convinced that this heroism and sacrifice cannot be in vain; they must bear fruit. To you, to Madame, and to the great people of China I send my earnest and sincere wishes for your success. I look forward to the day when a free India and a free China will cooperate together in friendship and brotherhood for their own good and for the good of Asia and the world.

MOHANDAS K. GANDHI

EDITOR'S NOTE

Surely it is the desire of every lover of freedom to see the Indian question settled in accordance with the principles that should inspire a great struggle for democracy, and in a way that will strengthen, rather than weaken, the war effort of the United Nations. The one important point to keep in mind is this: neither Great Britain nor the Indian Congress is the enemy. The enemy is Hitler, it is fascism; and the primary aim is still to win the war. The Indian Congress leaders could not even be approached had their antagonism to the British led them into the mad delusion that India could expect freedom from Nazi Germany or Fascist Japan. If, on the other hand, a basis of agreement on the Indian question can be found in Bertrand Russell's very practical suggestion of a joint commission of the United States, Great Britain, Russia, and China, the first step in that direction would be to clear the air of any misunderstanding in regard to Gandhi's attitude toward Japan. To this end we consider the foregoing document of great importance.

Pressure on Scandinavia

BY GUNNAR LEISTIKOW

THE recent happenings in Scandinavia may or may not be Germany's first move toward annexation—the union of Germanic nations advertised by Goebbels—but undoubtedly the northern countries are in for a harsh change of status. The intensification of the terror in Norway is an ominous sign. The breaking off of diplomatic relations with Denmark on October 6 appears to be a curtain-raiser to a performance not yet announced. Sweden, ever more openly defying German overlordship, feels the pressure that would force it into the pattern of the "New Europe."

Of Danish liberty not much is left. The German promise of April 9, 1940, to refrain from interference in Danish internal affairs was broken after a few months. The Danes were forced from the start to accept Nazi censorship of the press and of all communications. In October, 1940, the Germans interfered for the first time with the Danish administration, banning former Minister of Trade Christmas Moller from the Foreign Relations Committee. At that time they used the two main threats they have held over the Danes ever since—suspension of coal imports, on which the whole country is dependent, and establishment of a Gestapo regime. On November 17, 1940, they staged a mass demonstration in Copenhagen, and their Quisling, Frits Clausen, boasted that the time had come to take power. However, the German military command, watching from the balconies of Dagmarhus, saw the Danish masses turn this Nazi celebration into an imposing demonstration against Nazism. The Danish authorities have had to answer the increasing sabotage with heavier and heavier punishments, and prisons are so crowded that convicted persons have to wait months to serve their terms.

Meanwhile the Germans are ruining the country with a technique of their own. They buy Danish agricultural products at ever higher prices, but they pay—in coal or other materials—only a small part of the prices they set. For the rest they compel the Danes to give them credit, to be paid "after the victory." In July of this year their indebtedness was more than two billion kroner, as much as the entire working capital of the country. That Denmark's whole economy is going to pieces does not worry the Germans. The crisis in Danish industry and agriculture produces hundreds of thousands of unemployed—potential workers if not soldiers for Germany—and man-power is what the Germans most need. However, the Danish unemployed have not been eager to work for the enemy; of the 77,000 Danes who have at different times worked in Germany, only 42,000 were left in May of this year. Although they could expect neither work nor dole on their return, the rest struggled back from the Nazi paradise. Unquestionably, the obstacles encountered in recruiting Danish man-power were a main cause of the surprising suspension of diplomatic relations between Nazi Germany and one of its satellites.

The German demands may also have included a declaration of war against Russia or adherence to a Germanic union under Hitler's leadership—tantamount of course to surrender of Danish sovereignty. As early as the summer of 1940 the Germans invited the Danes to enter a Wirtschaftsgemeinschaft with the Third Reich, that is, a customs and currency union, and even, practically, common citizenship. The Nazis dropped the plan when the Danes said no thank you, but they may now dig it up again.

A Germanic union, however, would be a joke without Sweden, and proclamation of such a union would make the Swedes more obstinate than ever. That is why such a league, even if it is now considered, will probably be pigeonholed. But it is also the reason why the Swedes feel so jittery over Goebbels's campaign.

As far back as 1934 Hitler told Rauschnig that in the next war he would have to occupy Sweden; he could not leave it to either British or Russian influence. He even said that he would form a northern union of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, not as an alliance of equals, but as an "alliance of vassal states with no army, no separate policy, and no separate economy." In April, 1940, he realized a part of this program. If at that time he confined his operations to Denmark and Norway, one of his main reasons was undoubtedly that the Swedes no longer were "nowhere prepared to put up a sufficiently strong defense," as it had looked to him eight years before, but on the contrary were able to make an undertaking against Sweden a costly affair. This is true

THE NORDIC RACE

Drawing by Bendix

now even more than in 1940, for the Swedes have forged their armed forces into a first-class fighting unit, and the utterances of their leaders leave no doubt that they will use it if a showdown is forced on them.

The feverish preparations of the Germans in Norway and their persecution of the inhabitants show their nervousness about a possible second front there. For Norway with its limited communications cannot be defended against a strong invader without the use of the Swedish roads. So the Germans have today an added interest in carrying out Hitler's original plans.

Signs are increasing that the Swedes are in for serious trouble. Recently a high German police officer was arrested while photographing the naval base in Stockholm from his hotel window. The reported subdivision of the Nordic race into Herrenvolk and Untergermanen indicates strongly a projected reorganization of the whole northern Raum. And, last but not least, the German radio has intensified its anti-Swedish campaign to a definitely menacing extent. It proclaimed some days ago that "the Bolshevik agents in Sweden" were only waiting for "the favorable moment to assume power by an armed uprising" and that the Swedish army presumably would "fall into Communist hands like ripe fruit." Usually Goebbels takes this tone only when the Nazis just are about to "liberate" a nation.

FROM Göring's speech of October 4 little more was published than the avowal that Europe's food supplies would be used to satisfy the needs of "Germany first" and those of other peoples afterward. It was something new to hear this principle announced so openly, but the principle itself was not new. In fact, Göring made several much more surprising statements.

Up to now we have known almost nothing about the amount of food available for the German people. We knew the normal "food balance" of the Reich and the conquered regions, but we had no idea of the extent to which the war had decreased agricultural production. Nor, on the other hand, had we any idea how well the Nazi machine had been able to exploit the occupied countries. On these matters Göring's speech threw considerable light. It revealed that farm production within Germany and also the loot taken from the conquered territories have shown a marked downward trend. In the spring of 1942 this downward trend became so steep that the government for the first time feared that "we should not make connections with the next harvest." "The situation was extremely serious," Göring insisted that from now on things would be better, but he offered no convincing reasons for expecting this change.

The 1940 harvest was "in no way fortunate." It was a "poor harvest." Then in 1940-41 France, Holland, and Denmark—all important agricultural countries—were conquered. In them the Germans found large stocks and standing crops. To these supplies was added the harvest in Poland, where the Germans had been organizing production for a year. One might think that so many new sources would provide enough to cover Germany's own deficit. No, said Göring, it was not enough. In addition, part of the German war reserves had to be used. Only by drawing on these stores could the German people be properly nourished.

The harvest of 1941 was again a "poor" one. But in 1941-42 there were more conquests, Yugoslavia was overrun, and the hold on Bulgaria and Rumania was tightened. In Russia a vast grain-producing region stretching from the Baltic to the Ukraine fell before German might—and let no one think that everything there was destroyed. But in spite of these conquests, it was again necessary to throw Germany's war reserves into the breach—its last reserves. Now, Göring said plainly, the reserves were used up. They had been enough to carry the country through to the harvest, but only with the help of a drastic reduction of food rations in April.

We can draw but one conclusion: however wide the areas that have been opened to exploitation, each year of the war has reduced the amount of foodstuffs in German barns and silos. Göring tried to lay the blame for this development on the caprices of the weather. He spoke of the "three iron winters that we have suffered." But to claim bad luck three times running is a little too much. As a matter of fact, the continuous downward trend indicates a continuous force behind it. And it is hard to be impressed by Göring's prediction of an upward turn in the near future when he bases it entirely on the latest conquests in Russia. Granted that "fields miles wide" have been acquired along the Don, the essence of his own demonstration is that all the land won by Germany has only decreased the supply of food.

Spain Says No

ALTOGETHER they numbered about 26,000, the Spanish in the four concentration camps in southern France lately visited by a German delegation. The Nazi spokesman was all flattery and promises. "They might have been called reds, they might be reds, but as fighters they were first class—the Wehrmacht recognized that during the Spanish war." Now Germany invited them to come to work. They would be well fed (in the concentration camps many Spanish refugees have died of hunger); they would receive excellent wages, a good part of which they might send to their families in Spain or in Mexico; and if at any time they wanted to go back to Spain, the German government would see that they were not persecuted and were reestablished in their civil rights.

And how many of the 26,000 consented to work in the German industries? Exactly 73.

VIII. REPRESENTATIVE HAMILTON FISH

BY WILLIAM JORDY AND WILL CHASAN

NEW YORK'S Twenty-sixth Congressional District will be a political testing ground this November. Should it return Hamilton Fish to Congress, it will have demonstrated that a man may associate openly with fascists, with all that this implies, and still retain the allegiance of his constituents.

Fish, it is true, is doing his diligent best to divert attention from his discrediting associations and activities as a leader of the extreme isolationist bloc. A shrewd politician, he is not attempting to meet the criticism of his record. Instead he is attacking the critics. They are "malicious" people, he says, who are resurrecting old quarrels and creating disunity. They represent an "unholy alliance of left-wing New Dealers, Communists, and rabid millionaire interventionists" which is more concerned with winning elections than with winning the war. Against his Democratic opponent, Judge Ferdinand Hoyt, Fish has brought the weighty accusation that he employs a ghost writer. It is trivial and irrelevant, but conveniently distracting.

However, with all this Fish has not succeeded in eliminating his record as the campaign's paramount issue. "His record is so bad," one local Democratic politician observed, "you can't forget it even by closing your eyes. The smell is too strong."

Hamilton Fish launched his career as an isolationist leader in February, 1938, when he condemned the $800,000,000 naval-expansion bill as "unnecessary to defense." Subsequently he voted for several military appropriation bills, not "all," as he now is telling his constituents, but opposed the fortification of Guam, repeal of the arms embargo, lend-lease, the draft extension, and the abandonment of belligerent zones. He christened the Lend-Lease Act the "war, dictatorship, and bankruptcy bill," and denounced other measures as attempts by the "Moscow-Roosevelt-Bullitt axis" to involve us in a "Presidential war." His policy, he informed Congress, was to wait until war came here. He conceded that if Canada were attacked we should aid it, "but not if only a few bombs are dropped."

Fish's real offense, however, was not that he favored non-intervention, disastrously shortsighted though that policy has proved to be, but that he was blatantly pro-German. To a far greater degree than Chamberlain and the other apostles of appeasement, he indorsed the Nazi claim to Lebensraum.

This was made quite clear in the summer of 1939 when as minority leader of the House Foreign Affairs Committee he visited Europe to attend meetings of the Interparliamentary Union at Oslo. The trip was regarded in Congress as a harmless vacation junket at public expense. But Fish landed in France early in August and almost immediately went to see Nazi Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop. His conferences with von Ribbentrop, or perhaps it was some prior influence, convinced him that the German claims to Danzig were "just" and that Danzig was "97 per cent Nazi." Two days later he went in von Ribbentrop's plane to Oslo, where he proposed a solution to the Danzig problem which would have been satisfactory to the Nazis. When other delegates attacked his proposal as smacking too much of Munich, Fish waved them aside. "I don't care about Munich," he said generously, "or if one group or another of the powers gains some small benefits from such an arrangement." The claim that we couldn't do business with Hitler he dismissed as "preposterous."

The march into Poland brought Fish home. Immediately he began to show the direction of his sympathies. Shortly after the Germans took Warsaw, they claimed to have discovered in the American embassy correspondence from Ambassador Bullitt which revealed a plot by the Administration to involve the United States in war. The correspondence was denounced here as fictitious, but Fish's response was to declare that he "could not conceive of the Germans forging documents," and to ask for Bullitt's recall and the President's impeachment. All his activities began to reflect this warm regard for Nazi Germany. He spoke at a Madison Square Garden rally at which the Horst Wessel song, the Nazi anthem, was sung and a huge Nazi flag displayed on the platform. He wrote an article for Today's Challenge, a magazine edited by Nazi propagandist Frederick Auhagen. He addressed a meeting of the Steuben Society inaugurating a drive for $150,000 to combat British propaganda. In Congress he denounced "German-phobia" and insisted that it was "none of our business what form of government any nation has." He also came to the support of Germany's Axis partner, Japan. On Japan Day at the World's Fair he said, "The Japanese have proclaimed a Monroe Doctrine for the Far East. . . . We have adhered closely to our own Monroe Doctrine for 120 years, and feeling as strongly as we do about the Western Hemisphere, we cannot object to Japan holding the same views." Some of his fellow-Congressmen began to regret audibly that he had come home from Europe.

Most of Fish's isolationist activities were channeled through the National Committee to Keep America Out of War, of which he was the national chairman. Nazi agent George Sylvester Viereck, with whom Fish was friendly, is reported to have inspired its formation. The committee recently was denounced by the Department of Justice as a transmission belt for Nazi propaganda. George Hill, Fish's secretary, was indicted for sedition because he used the committee's mailing list for the dissemination of fascist propaganda. Fish was placed on the witness stand during the Hill trial. He disclaimed any knowledge of the purposes for which the committee had been used. "I wouldn't know Nazi propaganda if I saw it," was his implausible explanation to the court. "I don't know anything about it."

The motive for Fish's activities, which fall so unmistakably into a pro-German pattern, is quite clear. He never has made any effort to conceal his conviction, one which the Nazis have assiduously cultivated, that Germany is a bulwark against communism. He has always wanted Germany to march on Russia, and could not see "why Great Britain should oppose German expansion eastward." Two days before Pearl Harbor he said in the House, "I repeat, if we enter the war and finally destroy the German army, we can do only one thing, and that is to bring communism to Germany, Italy, Poland, France—all of Europe." In brief, in Fish's view, the Nazi armies have become the defenders of Western civilization.

In addition to publicizing Fish's unsavory pro-German and obstructionist activities, his opponents in the Twenty-sixth Congressional District are wisely stressing the story of his dubious relations with General Rafael Trujillo. This story, which came to light last August, demonstrates almost as much as Fish's Nazi associations his unfitness for office. In 1937 Trujillo, dictator of the Dominican Republic, unleashed his horrifying "Haitian massacre." Fish termed the massacre a "most outrageous atrocity" and urged withdrawing recognition from the Dominican Republic. On January 24, 1938, he inserted in the Congressional Record Quentin Reynolds's account of the massacre, which had appeared in Collier's. A year went by. Then a series of strange incidents occurred. In February, 1939, Trujillo hired George Jamhar Djamgaroff, a shady international character now under investigation, to do promotion work for the Dominican Republic. Investigation has revealed that Fish wrote a letter of recommendation for Djamgaroff, though Fish denies this. Then, on March 20, 1939, Hamilton Fish visited the Dominican Republic as a guest of Trujillo to rededicate the Christopher Columbus monument. In 1939 Trujillo visited the United States, and on July 12 was guest of honor at a dinner sponsored by the Pan-American Society. Fish was among the principal speakers. Five days later $25,000 was transferred from Trujillo's account to Fish's in a New York bank. Of this sum Fish invested $8,000 in the Nepaug Oil Company at Houston, Texas. When Nepaug's wells ran dry, he returned $12,000 to the Trujillo account. Did Fish get a fee for this? He says it was simply a mutual interest in hot oil and that he offered his services as a friend without compensation. The Treasury Department is still investigating his 1939 income tax. But consider—regardless of the investigation's result—the spectacle of the ranking minority member of the Foreign Affairs Committee mixed up in the hot-oil dealings of a Central American dictator!

His fascist entanglements and the Trujillo revelation definitely have Fish on the run. Although he won the Republican nomination over the opposition of Wendell Willkie and Tom Dewey, he has been disowned by important Republican elements. Augustus Bennett, his opponent in the Republican primary, is supporting Judge Hoyt. The Poughkeepsie Eagle News, which supported him for twenty-two years, now is opposing him. Fish, realizing that he is in a precarious position, is campaigning desperately. For the first time in his political career he has opened headquarters, at Newburgh, one of the district's few large communities. He has replaced his well-tailored blue serges for the old greenish suit which has seen him through eleven previous campaigns, and he is busier than ever making the rounds of the clambake circuit.

Like his friend Dies, Fish has assumed the role of a martyr hounded by New Deal radicals. His campaign is strictly anti-New Deal, and in a district which sometimes seems less proud of the fact that President Roosevelt makes his home there than that he "can't even carry his own town of Hyde Park," this is a powerful line of attack.

But Fish is not relying on anti-New Deal prejudices alone. His principal asset is the personal following he has built up during twenty-two years as a Congressman. The Fish family is one of the oldest in the district, and its present representative, more than his Hyde Park constituent, is the district's political "country squire." He has replied to every communication addressed to him by his constituents, performed thousands of personal favors for them, and made them feel that he was their personal agent at Washington. It is this immense store of good-will, carefully accumulated over more than two decades, on which Fish now is counting.

At the present moment the outcome of the campaign is still in doubt. Two years ago a comparatively unknown candidate, Hardy Steeholm, running a small last-minute campaign, whittled Fish's usual 30,000 plurality down to 8,000. Steeholm could have come within 4,000 votes of Fish had he also won the 4,000 votes of the American Labor Party. This year Judge Hoyt, a popular "home-town boy" and a former editor of the Beacon News, has the nomination of both the Democratic and the American Labor Party. In addition, he will receive support, the extent of which is unpredictable, from anti-Fish Republicans, to whom he is shrewdly appealing by adopting a friendly but critical attitude toward the Administration. He is being backed actively by the Poughkeepsie Central Labor Union, the garment workers in Newburgh and Beacon, the railroad workers at Port Jervis, and other labor groups. Perhaps he will also have in his camp the parents of boys in the armed forces; the percentage of drafted boys, high for the district as a whole, is among the highest in the country in the section around Beacon and Wappinger Falls. Hoyt's campaign platform begins, "There is only one issue—to win the war and win the peace," and his speakers are concentrating on the line that "defeating Ham Fish is a war issue."

It is a campaign where feelings woven out of twenty-two years of habit, of patronage, of small favors, of political allegiance, are pitted against what can only be called fundamental democratic convictions. Fish's reelection would not, of course, prove that his constituents look with favor on fascism or fascists. But it would prove that a typical American community is prepared, in return for certain petty advantages, to tolerate an associate of fascists, if not something considerably worse, in much the same way that other communities for similar reasons have tolerated the associates of grafters and racketeers. It would be an unpleasant augury for American democracy.

IN THE SECTION in which it lists foreign diplomats in Washington, the "Congressional Directory" employs three footnote symbols to refer readers to additional information: "The asterisk," it says, "designates those whose wives accompany them; the dagger designates those whose unmarried daughters in society accompany them; the parallel lines designate those having other ladies with them."

MEMBERS OF A BRIDGE CLUB in Gallatin, Tennessee, recently voted to cancel their subscriptions to a local newspaper because in its column of Negro social news it prefixed names with Mr. or Mrs.

COMMONWEALTH, a pro-fascist magazine published in Florida, contains in its current issue an enthusiastic description of Hitler's Strength Through Joy movement. "In short," the article concludes, "the aim [of Strength Through Joy] would be to insure a happy and harmonious home life for each family and social security for every member of National Socialistic Germany."

ACCORDING TO persistent rumors in Washington, A. A. Berle, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State, is receiving religious instruction preparatory to entering the Roman Catholic church.

FROM THE NATION for September 19: "He is outspoken and has the courage to say, for example, that for this country, and in general, civilian defense is a more or less useless luxury and bad for morale" (Ralph Bates reviewing James Reston's "Prelude to Victory"); "A reader of this book can discover not only what is necessary to civilian defense but why it is necessary, and be enthusiastic in undertaking the program" (Donald W. Mitchell reviewing Colonel R. Ernest Dupuy's and Lieutenant Hodding Carter's "Civilian Defense of the United States").

BEFORE THE WAR Negroes accounted for 12 per cent of the workers on WPA. Now, because white workers have left to take war jobs and Negroes remain, the ratio has risen to over 20 per cent.

CORRECTION: On September 19 this column reported that two major-party candidates in the California primaries had lost the nomination of their own party but won the nomination of the party they opposed. The story went on to say that each would run for office under the standards of the party he was fighting. Several California readers have informed The Nation that election laws prevent this. The candidates can run only as independents in a write-in campaign.

CONSTANCE ROURKE IN THE CRITICS' DEN

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

THE heading of this article may seem unkind in view of the fact that the comments on Miss Rourke's posthumous book of essays, "The Roots of American Culture" (Harcourt, Brace, $3), have been "favorable" with one exception; that even in that case her dismissal by the reviewer was reserved for the last two paragraphs and obviously, as the old saying goes, hurt him more than it did Miss Rourke. But I have in mind not only the critical lions who have appreciated her work but those who have never, publicly at least, deigned to taste her wares; and the further circumstance that the critical lions of the second part have, I suspect, been confirmed in their original prejudice by the very identity of the critical lions of the first part. The fact that Miss Rourke's admirers have a tendency to diminish her stature by seizing upon those elements which nourish their own particular interests does not help matters.

Miss Rourke, in other words, has become enmeshed in a critical quarrel which is today particularly sharp. It turns upon various issues; the one which has pertinence here is the concern or lack of concern with American materials. The pro-Americans tend to aggrandize the home town, whether it be the genteel New England of Van Wyck Brooks or the "wholesome" anti-intellectual hinterland. On the other side is what for lack of a better term I shall call the avant-garde. In principle these critics espouse the international point of view, which is sound; in practice their internationalism takes the form of an extreme preoccupation with Europe and an exaggerated fear of being associated with what they call the chauvinistic school, or of showing any undue interest in American folk or folks as such. The paradox is that they are often far to the left in politics and are therefore committed to a belief in "the people." But "the people" tend to become an abstraction, especially since in America they have persistently failed to fit into the required specifications.

The roots of this dispute are entangled in an old division which we inherited from Europe, the separation of our artistic-intellectual life from common "popular" life. It is a genuinely tragic estrangement—particularly in a country aspiring to be a democracy—which weakens the fiber of both elements and which the artist-intellectual, since he is that, should at least attempt to bridge over. Instead, from long buffeting, he has tended to accept the separation not only as inevitable but as a matter for pride touched with self-pity.

Mr. Brooks's attacks on "coterie writers" have been motivated in part by a consciousness of this estrangement. The trouble is that instead of filling the high role of a critical mediator between "the poet and the people" he has defended the people at the expense of the poet. His attacks on writers between the two wars for being unconstructive and pessimistic, his petulant jibes at expatriates, verge on philistinism, in spite of the intellectual reservations with which he sprinkles his emotional judgments. The implied assumption that writers of integrity are deliberately pessimistic shows, among other things, an astounding lack of understanding of the creative process; it also confirms the people, who make a fetish of optimism and the happy ending, in their scorn for the artistic breed.

Van Wyck Brooks assumed the task of preparing the beginnings and fragments of Miss Rourke's work-in-progress for publication in the present book, and he has done a conscientious job. Four of the five reviews I have seen were written by Lewis Mumford, John Chamberlain, Lewis Gannett, and R. L. Duffus. None of these four can be set down, in any strict sense, as disciples of Brooks; but all of them, by sentiment or conviction or both, tend in his direction, and all of them are more or less out of favor with the avant-garde of American criticism.

Inevitably the editing presence of Mr. Brooks tends to identify Miss Rourke's views with his own; it also accounts for the sudden discovery, in some quarters, that Miss Rourke was important—which arouses conflicting feelings in one who knew it all along. Mr. Mumford's article about Miss Rourke in the Saturday Review of Literature was an excellent appraisal in itself. Yet to my mind he showed bad taste and worse strategy—since the whole admirable burden of his review was the demand for a wider recognition of her work—when, to prove that there was no hint of "isolationism" or chauvinism in her point of view, he said that she had been "almost alone among our American intellectuals" to accept the challenge to action of his book "Men Must Act"—thus injecting into the consideration of the work of Constance Rourke the strong partisanship for and against the views of Lewis Mumford.

John Chamberlain's review in the daily New York Times was intelligent; he ground no personal axes. Yet in the purlieus of my "critics' den" his praise was probably convincing only to those who were already convinced. Lewis Gannett, in the Herald Tribune, put her projected three-volume "essay" in the same category as Parrington's "Main Currents in American Thought" and then concentrated on the more picturesque findings of her long research, which make good copy. R. L. Duffus, in the Times Sunday Book Review, wallowed, as Miss Rourke forever scorned to do, in a sweet nostalgia for early America.

The avant-garde has, up to now, pretty consistently ignored Miss Rourke's exploration of the American past. I may be doing certain individuals an injustice—it is for that reason that I do not mention names—but it is my impression that many of the critics whom I respect on other grounds have dismissed Constance Rourke, sight unseen, as a scholarly female folklorist whose "antiquarian" discoveries were at best charming but irrelevant to the high purposes of criticism and at worst chauvinistic in effect if not in intention. Their "sophistication," in other words, has kept them from even being aware that the arch of her scholarly, historical, in a sense archaeological, reconstruction of American culture was a critical synthesis which took account of as much relevant data, both foreign and domestic, as she was able to gather in thirty years; and that it was on the merits of that synthesis that she herself persistently demanded to be judged.

I am making the same demand for what seem to me important reasons. The issues with which Miss Rourke was passionately concerned for thirty years are major issues, highly relevant to the present as well as the future of American culture; the synthesis she arrived at takes account, on a high plane, of the valid elements—as opposed to the by now personal and vested interests—on both sides of the wasteful controversy I have sketched.

One of Miss Rourke's underlying critical purposes might be said to have been the reconciliation between the artist and society. Her own orientation was clear and unswerving: it stemmed from her concern—which was central—with the problem of the creative worker. In America, she felt, it was primarily a cultural problem. As I said in reviewing Maxwell Geismar's "Writers in Crisis," Americans in general not only lack knowledge, except of the most superficial sort, of backgrounds and traditions, they often display an almost defiant non-interest, a kind of snobbism in reverse, which denies their importance and their relevance to the present. One of the dismal results, on the literary side, is the endless repetition of self-education-in-a-vacuum so wearily set forth in the autobiographical pre-novels that are endemic in this country. Miss Rourke believed that to exercise his talents freely and effectively the writer must know, as Eliot has said, "the mind of his own country—a mind which he learns in time to be much more important than his own private mind." . . . Many artists have worked supremely well with little encouragement; few have worked without a rich traditional store from which consciously or unconsciously, they have drawn. The difficult task of discovering and diffusing the materials of the American tradition—many of them still buried—belongs for the most part to criticism; the artist will steep himself in the gathered light. In the end he may use native sources as a point of radical departure; he may seldom be intent upon early materials; but he will discover a relationship with the many streams of native character and feeling. The single writer—the single production—will no longer stand solitary or aggressive but within a natural sequence.

II

Constance Rourke's working life was spent charting the mind and especially the imagination of her own country. In undertaking her exploration of the forms it has assumed she laid down two principles: (1) that the American mind and imagination are necessarily distinctive from any other, though we have obviously inherited the general forms of culture developed by Western civilization; (2) that a culture cannot be equated to the fine arts, a range of the "peaks of achievement" suspended in blue air, but comprises "the whole configuration in the particular period . . . with its special tenacities, currents of thought, contagions of feeling, its dominant arts, whether these are polite or impolite, practical or impractical, whether they slip over surfaces in transitory popular forms or become rooted as patterns of the folk imagination or, more broadly, of the social imagination."

These principles seem self-evident, yet they challenge assumptions, largely unconscious and for that reason all the more deeply imbedded, that have dominated the American attitude toward culture since America began: that our culture, if we ever achieved one, would be merely an extension of European culture to be transferred by means of "carriers," and that culture somehow equates the fine arts. This latter view, which "took shape here through the establishment of the classic ideal at precisely the time when our first consciousness of the fine arts emerged," tended to deny or minimize any organic connection between folk or popular expression and the fine arts, which were associated with a wealth and leisure we could patently not hope to possess for decades to come. Miss Rourke believed, on the contrary, that popular expression, embodying as it does native experience, traditions, craftsmanship, is part of the rich soil out of which the fine arts ultimately spring; that while in this country there was and could be no such thing as the folk in the European sense of a single homogeneous, long-settled, closely knit community, its function in furnishing the "tillage" for the fine arts was performed by the people, common and uncommon, whose skills and whose bents of feeling and thinking were European but whose expression was modified and changed by the distinctive social, political, and geographical elements in their new environment. American houses soon became adaptations rather than copies; American drama and acting were influenced by the new and overwhelming experience of the Indian as well as by Shakespeare; Jefferson was a product of both Europe and America; the mythology of Europe took on an American dimension in the tall tales of the ever-moving frontier. Some of Miss Rourke's most fruitful work was done in this last field, for in the myths of a people is to be found the record of its imagination in the making—its early literature, as Edith Hamilton points out in her fresh interpretation, "Mythology," recently published.

Through all this Miss Rourke was not concerned with proving that American culture was superior; quite the contrary. She did assert that "art has always taken on a special native fiber before it assumes the larger growth" and that this larger growth in America, though it was bound to be slow in any case, has been further hindered by the wide acceptance of an inorganic conception of culture, of which imitation is the core.

The essays in the present book are in various stages of completion. The title essay is a beautiful and finished statement of the argument of the whole work. Some of the others, I feel sure, would have been incorporated, expanded, or reduced, though every one of them is studded with insights and enough provocative ideas to keep half a dozen writers busy for years: the idea, for instance, that Puritanism and materialism have borne too heavy a share of blame for artistic failure in this country; the suggestion that the novel may not be natural to us, that ours, indeed, may not be a literary culture, as we have tended, under the weight of English influence, to think it must be; that motion, as well as equilibrium, may nourish the creative impulse; and many others.

To obtain any adequate view of the final significance of her work-in-progress, it is necessary to go back to "American Humor," a basic book which has been scandalously neglected. In that volume, which is subtitled A Study of the National Character, Miss Rourke traced the patternings of the American grain; in the second half of the book she brought all her scholarship and thought and feeling to bear in placing our major writers in relation to the "many sequences of the American tradition on the popular side as well as on purely literary levels." The result is a perspective in which such apparently disparate figures as the Yankee peddler and Henry James, the "comic poets" of the frontier and Emily Dickinson, fall into place as representative and related manifestations of the American imagination. "The Roots of American Culture," finished, would have placed all the arts similarly in focus.

In "American Humor" I found for the first time a critical perspective of American expression which allowed room and significance not only to Emerson's essay on Self-Reliance, which I read in school, but to the tall tales that were part of my non-school experience in a small Western city. More than anyone else I have ever encountered, she saw America whole.

I have found this perspective continuously relevant and useful. And as I reread "American Humor" it seems to me that only a person who had not taken it in could say, as Alfred Kazin did in the New Republic, that "Constance Rourke failed us by not drawing the wealth of patterns and skills she had uncovered into our 'natural sequence' now, our contemporary predicament and need. . . . Commemoration, somehow, is never enough." Miss Rourke would have omitted that quibbling "somehow." She not only proclaimed her critical objective, over and over again, to be a synthesis that would be relevant to our "contemporary predicament." She actually accomplished it, on the limited scale of a single volume, in "American Humor." She "failed us" by dying before she could complete her task.

The first-rate critic is rare, for he must join manifold abilities seldom found in combination. He must have a capacity for large general ideas and a sure taste in the minute particulars of form and expression; he must be able to distinguish between the genuine and the false. He must be an order maker; and his order will be meaningless unless he has a sense of proportion that mediates continuously between the general and the particular. Miss Rourke was forever aware of these responsibilities, and she met them, in my opinion, to an extraordinary degree. Compare, for instance, her estimates of writers in "American Humor" with the sorry mistaken judgments in the final anti-climactic sections of Parrington; compare her understanding and her celebration of Henry James with Van Wyck Brooks's violent emotional rejection. Consider in the present book the hard-headed, anti-antiquarian Note on Folklore; observe her unerring detection of the fake "folk" in the paintings of Grant Wood. In addition she was a writer whose prose is so translucent that only its final impact reminds the reader of the massive scholarship assimilated within it.

Profile of "The War Years"

STORM OVER THE LAND: A PROFILE OF THE CIVIL WAR. By Carl Sandburg. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

CARL SANDBURG inhabits the Civil War scene with more awareness and robust vigor than men of slower pulses bring to the crises of their own times. His two works on Abraham Lincoln, "The Prairie Years" and "The War Years," have attained great popularity because he has the art of communicating his own gusto to his readers, for while gusto may not be a requisite of good historical writing, it is indispensable to attracting a large audience to a history book.

"Storm Over the Land" is nothing less and very little more than a condensation of the four volumes of "The War Years." It has been, in Sandburg's phrase, "carved mainly from the pages" of the earlier work. The operation was skilfully performed by Elisabeth Bevier Hamilton, with whom the idea originated. It has resulted in a swift and straightforward story which, while it lacks the magnificence of the original volumes, has dispensed with their formidable length and occasional turgidness.

The avoidance of repetitious or cumbersome detail is one of the conspicuous merits of this shortened version. To take a single example, the subject of office-seekers, which occupied about seventy pages of "The War Years," has been reduced to eight lines, plus a joke by Petroleum V. Nasby. Sandburg's tremendous sentence of forty-six semicolons on "the intricate tale of the shaping of a national fate" has been slashed to twenty-one semicolons. For the most part, his sentences ring as smartly as men marching in quickstep.

The ebullient masses of facts and the torrents of quotations have necessarily been sacrificed. The violet-tinted passages are reduced, but the reader will still find enough of spindrift, seed-time, and crimson mist, sufficient birthing hours and slants of silver moons to assure him that here is authentic Sandburg. The elements of his highly individual style—save only the toppling superabundance of detail—are all retained: the vein of mystical poetry, the generalization lighted by the flash of example, the corn-belt humor, the touches of highfalutin rhetoric, the salty smack of anecdote. Idiosyncrasy is not lacking. Sandburg's passion for reporting the number of bullets found in trees after a battle is almost startling in a book which has small space for irrelevancies. There is little irony. It appears that the man is too simple and wholehearted for irony; but his simplicity is delusive, because it is wise. He can speak with penetration, as in his comment on Lincoln's address at Gettysburg: "His outwardly smooth sentences were inside of them gnarled and tough with the enigmas of the American experiment." He can speak with deep comprehension of "the capacity of so many men, women, and children for hating and fearing what they do not understand while believing they do understand completely and perfectly what no one understands except tentatively and hazardingly." And he can summon in a phrase the agony of ravaged Georgia—"the desolation and fallen pride and hunger and deathly quiet lacking majesty because of the smoldering foul smoke and the clean air pungent with the rot and stink of conquest." It is writing of such noble eloquence that makes it necessary to forgive Sandburg for fustian like "The gambler's factor grew, and the dice of destiny shook in the hands of Humpty Dumpty"; or the bathos of referring to Booth and Lincoln as the Outsider and the Human Target.

The book is profusely illustrated with photographs and drawings, happily selected to enhance the interest of the text. They include an enlarged sketch of the soldier's familiar companion, pediculus vestimenti.

"The War Years" ended with the splendid description of Lincoln's funeral pageant and his interment at Springfield. For the conclusion of "Storm Over the Land," Sandburg has chosen a post-war anecdote which was included, inconspicuously in the longer work.

To General Robert E. Lee in northern Virginia one day came a young mother. She wanted his blessing for her baby. He took the little one in his arms, looked at it, looked at her. Then came the slow words: "Teach him he must deny himself."

Without questioning either the value of discipline or the distinguished character of General Lee, one may wonder why Sandburg elected to end his vigorous book on a note of negation and defeat.

The Nazis and the German Army

THE GUILT OF THE GERMAN ARMY. By Hans Ernest Fried. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

THERE has been a tendency to regard the German army leaders as dupes of the Nazis in the sense that the agrarian reactionaries of the type of Rauschning were dupes. In some quarters false hopes of an officer-class revolt have been based on this absurd error. That it is an error Mr. Fried shows in this rigorous and well-documented book, which sets out to prove that the German militarists of the Second Reich were the senior and originating partners in a deliberate combination. One may believe that a little too much stress has been placed on the role of the army without in the least diminishing the importance of this book. It is no hobby horse Mr. Fried rides, but a very lively animal of a recognizable color. And I think the author makes his point, that even to this day there is approximate equality of power between the army and the party, with extremely little possibility that the partnership will break up. "The army and the party are tools, each of the other, but neither is master. Together they rule the people," Mr. Fried says.

The strategic detour by which the militarists achieved their aim is something that our political strategists ought to understand as well as they know the way through the corridors of the OWI. To secure direct control of Germany was useless for the purposes of militarization. The essence of the post-war period was that it was an epoch of pacifism. Direct army control would have been too naked and unideological a rule. An efficient militarism cannot be imposed by force. All that can be produced that way is an Italian army. The task of the German militarists was to remake Germany in their image, and for this a party with an emotional and pseudo-intellectual appeal was necessary.

Mr. Fried oversimplifies a little, I believe, in making this fundamental point. It was not any objection to collective bargaining that made the militarists desire the suppression of the trade unions, he says, but the fact that the unions were anti-militarist. Collective bargaining is always regarded as subversive by militarists. Only the other day an American admiral told the A. F. of L. convention that Germany, Italy, and Japan were doing very well without unions and so could America. Professional militarists, of course, never think very highly of industrialists, bankers, and newspaper proprietors, and so do not use their language in attacking the unions; but the German militarists had enough political understanding to grasp the fact that they needed not merely a nationalist ideology but a dictatorial one, based upon a deceptive appropriation of the things nearest to the popular mind—socialism, security, and peace.

Even the special apologetic doctrines of Nazism were invented long before Nazism—the “stab in the back” theory, for instance. The claim that the army was stabbed in the back by the German revolution of November, 1918, was the intellectual device adopted by the officer caste to rid themselves of the shame of defeat. History shows, however, that it was the German General Staff which first acknowledged defeat and demanded an armistice, not the Reichstag, and much less any truly popular organ of opinion. As early as August the General Staff had told Wilhelm II that victory was impossible, while President Wilson received the first German demand for an armistice on October 3.

The November days did no more than put an end to useless slaughter. They did not even weaken the German negotiators very much, for the accumulation of American force would have swept away all resistance before long. Yet despite documented testimony to the contrary, the myth of the “stab in the back” was in circulation early in 1919, when Hitler was a mere anti-bolshevist “education officer” in a reactionary regiment. The myth reflected the atmosphere of the frightened and venomous ruling class, but it was no more than a tool in the hands of the quite unfrightened militarists.

There never has been any important anti-war faction in the German officer caste, Mr. Fried insists. Reactionaries have often urged us to believe the contrary in the hope of getting us to accept a new form of appeasement. Certain German exiles, more anxious to save a Junker Germany than to rid Europe of a nightmare, have engaged in what they would have us regard as well-intentioned conspiracy in the interests of peace. Rauschnig, for instance; in the summer of 1939 could serve as an intermediary between what he asserted to be an anti-war group of German staff officers and Daladier’s pet general. Nothing came of it of course, and nothing will come of hopes placed in the military caste in general. The army will only turn against the party, says Mr. Fried, in order to save the army in defeat (as Ludendorff pleaded for an armistice in September, 1918, in order to protect his army from destruction). Only this, or a self-contradictory betrayal of the values of militarism by the Nazis, could divide the two forces.

On this point Mr. Fried and Howard K. Smith, author of “Last Train from Berlin” are not in absolute agreement. One of the most important pieces of information that Mr. Smith had to give us was that the S. A. had been virtually abolished while the S. S. had been largely incorporated into the army. The Waffen S. S., enjoying higher pay and better conditions, recruits its rank and file from among the most fanatical and efficient soldiers of the army, to the disgust of the old Prussian officers. The Waffen S. S., like the Falange troops in Spain, have chiefly repressive work to do. When the miserable Balkan accomplices and the German army had battered themselves into exhaustion in taking Sevastopol, it was the Waffen S. S. that marched in behind the front-line fighters to take over the city. Thus Hitler gathers a special army around him, while the generals’ army grows relatively weaker, Mr. Smith says. The information is of the greatest value, but having read Mr. Fried I cannot agree with Mr. Smith’s lightly touched suggestion that these S. S. divisions might be used against the generals. As Mr. Smith admits, their major purpose is clear. They are to be used if—. If what?

Hitler began his career, Mr. Fried reminds us, as the “political commissar” of counter-revolutionary regiments. It was he who after the Hamburg revolt served as nationalist propagandist in the volunteer regiments that had been used against the Hamburg working class. Back at his starting-point, Hitler is organizing his new private army, to be pitted against the people on their day of wrath.

On Language

THE GIFT OF TONGUES. By Margaret Schlauch. Modern Age Books. $3.50.

THE NATURE OF LITERATURE: ITS RELATION TO SCIENCE, LANGUAGE AND HUMAN EXPERIENCE. By Thomas Clark Pollock. Princeton University Press. $3.

THE GIFT OF TONGUES” is a rare phenomenon. It is a popularly written book which can be read for pleasure but is in no sense a popularization. It covers the whole subject of the science of language, it is sound philology, and it rides no hobbies.

In two of its chapters, on Semantics and on Language and Poetic Creation, it discusses with stimulating concreteness the questions developed in a more rarefied manner in “The Nature of Literature.” The purpose of this book, in Professor Pollock’s own words, “is to lay a theoretical basis for the investigation of literature as a social phenomenon in terms which are consonant both with our contemporary knowledge of language and with the development of modern science.” It is a lesson for the dry-as-dust scholars who are sometimes inclined to forget that the important thing is the literary work itself rather than the circumstances surrounding its production and the theorists who forget that the ultimate test of a work of literature must be its relation to the fundamental frame of value in which it is judged.

The main criticism to be made of the book is that its answer to the question implied in the title emerges from a discussion which would have benefited by more concreteness, directness, and compression. It is evident that by literature Professor Pollock really means literature as the common reader understands it, as may be inferred from his succinct summary of the uses of language:

In phatic communion one person uses words to come into relation with another. In referential symbolism one person uses words to direct the attention of another to certain referents: if this is his controlling purpose, the use is pure referential: if his purpose is also to arouse attitudes or actions in connection with the referents, the use is pragmatic-referential. In evocative symbolism one person uses words to evoke a controlled experience (E) in another: if he does this in order to express an experience of his own, the use is literature (L): if his concern, however, is only to evoke an experience (E) in the other, the use is pseudo-literature.

This is sound theory and sound common sense (by "phatic communion" he has previously explained that he means "chit-chat"), and when boiled down says nothing which the common reader does not instinctively recognize as true. And (E) and (L) should reassure the professors.

William Sowden Sims

ADMIRAL SIMS AND THE MODERN AMERICAN NAVY. By Elting E. Morison. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

IN THE dedication to his splendid book Mr. Morison pays homage to "the Insurgent Spirit and to Those Officers Who Have Maintained It Within the United States Navy in Time of Peace." The problem of mediocrity and lack of progressive thinking in high places in our army and navy has never been more urgent than during the past several years. And in no other major country is there so little understanding of basic military and naval principles as in the United States. The army and navy, alternately petted and neglected, receive neither the constructive criticism nor the support which their importance demands. Since only war affords an opportunity to put new theories to a test, the higher officers are inevitably conservative. The only real force compelling progress, therefore, is that handful of men who have the vision to perceive existing evils and the probable needs of the future.

In selecting William Sowden Sims as the subject for a four-year research in naval insurgency Mr. Morison could not possibly have made a wiser choice. Though extremely indiscreet, Sims possessed far better balance and much greater wisdom than his less fortunate acquaintance General William Mitchell. While he spent his entire adult life attacking abuses, generally as a junior officer, he stopped just short of saying or doing the unforgivable thing which would have put an end to his reforms.

It is to the credit of the author that he understands both the details and the spirit of this extremely useful life. Sims was a muckraker and reformer, a naval counterpart of Upton Sinclair and Lincoln Steffens. Few men in all military history can have attempted to improve so many things or, without dictatorial powers, scored so many successes. Poor gunnery, promotion by seniority, department organization, ship design, destroyer tactics, the Annapolis system of education, neglect of the Naval War College, the significance of air power in sea war, all received his attention. In gunnery, where he had the support of President Theodore Roosevelt and a genuinely free hand, the range, rapidity, and accuracy of American shooting were multiplied several hundred per cent in one decade. In some fields his contributions passed unnoticed because they eliminated chances of disaster, but in those where his efforts were unrewarded, as in the organization of the Navy Department and methods of promotion, recent events have underlined only too painfully the correctness of his views. His declaration twenty years ago that "the plane carrier is the battleship of the future" caused wincing throughout his entire profession, but had the United States acted on that belief its position in the western Pacific might be much better than it is today.

Because the naval activities of the United States in World War I were unspectacular, most persons have regarded them as unimportant. Yet nothing could be farther from the truth. It was the introduction of the convoy which defeated the U-boat and finally prevented German victory; and it was the persistent urging of Sims, more than any other factor, that broke the mental paralysis with which the Admiralty was seized in 1917 and earned the convoy a trial. Too much credit can scarcely be given him for the satisfactory relations that prevailed between the American and British navies.

It is to Mr. Morison's credit that Sims the individual is not lost sight of in his consideration of Sims the historical personage. Born with a happy, buoyant personality, boundless energy, a critical eye, and a constructive mind, he attempted to improve virtually everything with which he came in contact. More than any professional pacifist he distrusted the "military mind." A splendid leader beloved by most of the men he commanded, he was decidedly less satisfactory as a subordinate. A disregard of public opinion combined with a strong social conscience explained his lectures urging that war be outlawed and his dismay when sanctions were not invoked against Japan and Italy, his denunciation of the Treasury raids by war veterans, and his reference to Irish Americans who insisted on transporting their prejudices to the United States as the "jackass vote." One reporter commented that his natural element was hot water.

Like most reformers he had faults. Far too apt to interpret opposition to his suggestions as due either to laziness or stupidity, he was also sufficiently conceited to feel that obstacles in his path were placed there for personal reasons. In some instances, as in his opposition to the North Sea mine barrage, he was completely wrong. Often his proposed remedies for complex evils were over-simple, and if they had been adopted would have led to worse troubles than those they were designed to correct.

In his Preface Mr. Morison apologizes for the imperfections attendant upon a military biography written by a civilian. Such apologies are quite needless in a piece of work which shows exhaustive research and which has been carefully checked by both naval officers and historians. A few errors can be found, but these are minor flaws in a volume that is certainly the best military biography to appear in many years.

"The Eve of St. Mark"

TO SAY that Maxwell Anderson's new play is the best of the season so far is not to say very much. To add that it is also the finest work of its author in many a year is still not enough. In my opinion at least, "The Eve of St. Mark" (Cort Theater) is also the most effective and the most satisfactory play about the war yet to reach our stage. Some prospective spectators may be discouraged, as I myself was, by a title that is unfortunate and misleading. Its only justification is far-fetched at best, and it suggests that penchant for rather hackneyed poetic implications which has certainly been one of Mr. Anderson's besetting sins. But titles are not, after all, so very important, and the play itself may well be the "What Price Glory" of 1942—not because, despite certain scenes of very robust comedy, it resembles the latter in tone or theme, but because, like "What Price Glory," it seems so astonishingly successful in giving expression to the emotional attitudes of its moment. Audiences as well as critics take to it with enthusiasm and delight.

The main scheme of the piece is so direct and so simple that its general outline must have occurred to—and been rejected by—nearly every one of the thousands who have considered the possibility of writing an American war play. Mr. Anderson merely chronicles in many scenes the adventures of a representative young man who is taken from the farm, is introduced into the life of an army camp, gets himself engaged to a home girl on his leave, and then is torn away to meet danger and probable death on a tiny island in the Pacific. But what might have been banal or plodding is so freshly seen and felt and written that instead of being commonplace it is novel and exciting as well as completely satisfying and right. In so far as the play has a thesis it is the thesis of "Key Largo," the chief difference being that it is here stated in the positive rather than the negative: men who might continue to live do, nevertheless, sometimes choose to die simply because they know that they should, and know it even though they cannot put into words the nature of the obligation; even though, indeed, every argument they can muster seems to prove to them that the final sacrifice is one which no man need require of himself. Yet this thesis is certainly not the thing one is most aware of during the course of a play which remains always more a chronicle than an argument and maintains a tone as often tender and gay as it is tragic or even somber. To state the thesis is certainly to leave one still wondering just why the whole is as engrossing as it proves to be.

One answer is, of course, merely that Mr. Anderson has never before more convincingly demonstrated the fact that he has the born playwright's gift of carrying conviction and of making one feel that the familiar has never really been seen or felt before. Take, for instance, one of the most inevitable of many inevitable scenes—that in which the hero and one of his companions meet two young semi-professional tarts in a juke-box cafe. Few playwrights could escape the long-familiar clichés, but Mr. Anderson escapes them so completely that the scene is one of the best of the play—funny, touching, terribly real, and a necessary part of a vast drama which manages to involve everybody in one way or another. Much the same could be said of most of the other scenes, whether they are concerned with the domestic life of a man suddenly called upon to become a soldier, with that soldier when he is practicing his terrible new profession, or with the grotesque life of the training camp, where a man has been freed from the obligations of ordinary life without having yet really assumed those of his new career. But the technical excellence of the scenes is still not enough to account for the total effect of the play, and I am thrown back upon something alluded to at the beginning of this analysis—upon the fact that "The Eve of St. Mark" is so astonishingly successful in its attempt to express the emotional attitudes of a particular moment.

No previous play of the present war seems to me to have done that. Those sent us from England have been either feebly conceived or ineffectually written, but even had they been technically and artistically better, they would still have been, in some respects, inappropriate here. They were written by, for, and about a people whose experience with the present conflict is so much longer and so much more violent than ours that their attitudes are very different, and the plays which express those attitudes inevitably seem strange and remote to us, however interesting they may be. Nor were "Watch on the Rhine" and "There Shall Be No Light" much closer. They told us what we ought to feel rather than what we actually did feel or were even ready to feel. And for that reason they also did not come home to our hearts and bosoms. But in "The Eve of St. Mark" we see ourselves at this moment. Its subject is the experiences we have actually had; its emotional level as well as its emotional tone is ours; and the play is therefore capable, as no other war play has been, of performing one of the important functions of art. It gives clarity and coherence and logic to our emotional reaction to certain great events; it provides an occasion upon which a group may feel in an orderly and clear fashion what the individual members of that group have been feeling fragmentarily and in confusion. "What Price Glory" channeled the disillusion which followed the last war; "The Eve of St. Mark" channels those emotions which we feel as we enter a greater conflict. In it the author is not primarily either an advocate or a prophet. He has somehow succeeded in making himself a spokesman, and artistically the effect is very fine indeed. Too many people have told us what we ought to feel and scolded us for not feeling it. Mr. Anderson puts our reply into words and scenes. This is what we are doing and thinking. And it is not so inadequate after all.

Two other recent productions demand brief notice. "Let Freedom Sing" (Belasco Theater) is another of those miniature reviews put on by very young performers. I found it gay, refreshing, and funny. "Strip for Action" (National Theater) is an elaborate, sprawling, and obstreperous farce about a burlesque troupe in an army camp. Many seem to find it stupendously funny, but to me its combination of sentiment, bawdy; and patriotism was merely embarrassing. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

THREE instrumental sections of Berlioz's Symphony "Romeo and Juliet" have been played by Toscanini before: (1) Romeo Alone—Sadness—Concert and Ball—Great Festivities in Capulet's Palace; (2) Love Scene (with the introductory Capulet's Garden omitted); (3) Queen Mab. They include some of the most beautiful music of the work; and in performing the symphony in its entirety at the opening concerts of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society Toscanini provided a first hearing of two other astounding pieces of music, Juliet's Funeral Procession and Romeo in the Family Vault of the Capulets, as well as the impressive instrumental Introduction, the vocal Prologue, with its completely different and exquisite Queen Mab, and the Finale, which descends to mere operatic grandiloquence.

The best parts of this symphony are enough to make it one of the great works of the musical literature of all times—which brings up the question why this should have been the first complete performance in the twenty-five years of my experience as a concert-goer. One reason is that the work requires a chorus, which an orchestral society can engage only once or twice a season, and which it will engage then for Beethoven's Ninth Symphony unless a conductor presses, like Toscanini, for the Missa Solemnis, or Verdi's Requiem, or now Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet." There is the question why it took Toscanini so long to insist on "Romeo and Juliet"; but other conductors undoubtedly are influenced by the fact that they will have a success with the Ninth Symphony that they will not have with Berlioz's work, which is more difficult to play well and does not impress the public.

"The general public has no imagination; accordingly pieces which appeal solely to the imagination have no public," said Berlioz when he recommended the omission of Romeo in the Family Vault of the Capulets; and there were other sections which did not seem to be making much of an impression on some of the people at the recent performances. For one thing Berlioz's thought and language and style are completely individual, completely unrelated to anything else the public hears, and above all to the German music it hears most of the time. What they require to become better understood is the familiarity born of frequent hearings; but because the music is not understood it is infrequently played. What they require also is that the listener be receptive; but even when he hears the music he listens with ears and mind prejudiced against it by what is written about it.

In an article on critics in the American Scholar a few years ago Dr. Paul Henry Lang wrote: "What have they done to help the growing millions of music lovers on their way to the appreciation of great music? They have not only failed to guide them but worse than that have frequently misguided them. Wherever we turn our eyes, to daily reports, articles in the music section of the Sunday papers, or program notes, we are confronted with a thick tangle of prejudices, inherited formulas and catchwords, a prodigious lack of information, and an unbelievable ignorance of musical literature." In continental Europe "newspapers have opened their columns to musical scholars"; and that, it was indicated, was what they would have to do here. Now I would not dispute Dr. Long's evaluation of the writings of our musical journalists; but I have not yet encountered in the writings of our scholars anything that leads me to believe the public will get the guidance it needs from them. The public, if it is wise, will listen to Berlioz without the help of Mr. Downes; but also without the help of Dr. Einstein, whose statements about "Romeo and Juliet" and "The Damnation of Faust," as I pointed out a while ago, were a restatement of "inherited formulas and catchwords" that betrayed "an unbelievable ignorance" of the music. And also without the help of Dr. Lang himself.

In the article I have mentioned he discussed one of the errors which the critics encouraged instead of fighting—"the worship of the big, the long, the ponderous, and the loud," of which one manifestation was Stokowski's "gigantic orchestral paraphrases of [Bach's] spiritual songs, of . . . intimate chorale preludes . . . and of works for chamber orchestra and solo violin." And he wrote: "The trend toward grandiloquence was a product of the romantic era, and the musical taste of our public has its roots in the musical style of that period. The musicians of the last century, from Berlioz to Strauss . . ., expressed their thoughts by large gestures and used a complicated, at times even enormous, technical apparatus. It was therefore concluded that deep poetical feeling cannot be expressed without an intricate form of execution. . . . Today we wonder why musicians of judgment were captivated by orchestral scores which when dispossessed of their tremendous orchestral ornaments show an astonishingly meager invention and vague construction."

This did not dispose the mind of a reader of the American Scholar to appreciate the beauty, effectiveness, and honesty of some of the music of Berlioz that would be so strange to his ears, or its delicacy, finesse, subtlety, economy. It did not prepare him for the affecting loveliness of the sustained melodies—in Romeo Alone and the Love Scene—that move and turn in such unusual and such exquisite ways; for the enchantment of Capulet's silent, starlit garden produced by the strings pppp, the two flutes pp, the few notes of the distant horn; for the musical evocation of the scene of the two lovers, achieved with such poetic insight and such reticence; for the sheer orchestral magic of Queen Mab; for the poignancy of the single note reiterated pp at intervals by the chorus over the orchestra's fugal march, in Juliet's Funeral Procession. It did not prepare him for the brilliance of Great Festivities in Capulet's Palace, the shattering power of Romeo in the Vault of the Capulets, in which large means are used with no less originality and discretion and honesty. I stress this honesty because Dr. Lang impugned it. One encounters things in Berlioz's scores, Toscanini said, that one cannot understand or imagine—until one hears them from the orchestra, when their poetic purpose and their marvelous rightness for this purpose become clear. Dr. Lang did not help his reader to understand this—to understand that Berlioz's musical thought has an orchestral form of which one cannot "dispossess" it without doing it the violence that Stokowski's transcriptions do Bach. One can say the same thing of Strauss's "Don Quixote"; and if one does not merely count instruments but considers what is said with them, one finds "the big, the long, the ponderous, and the loud" in Brahms, whom Dr. Lang described as "the lonely retrospective musician who was trying to save the glory of classical art in a world engulfed in the dramatic frenzy of the Neo-German School."

The performance of "Romeo" I will discuss later.

Ireland—Friend or Enemy?

Dear Sirs: I think it is now time to begin counting noses and to declare that those who are not for us in this struggle for life are against us.

I agree most heartily with your position regarding Vichy France—that it ought to be regarded as either a friend or an enemy. It ought no longer be permitted a half-and-half stand. But I think you should take a similar unmistakable stand with respect to other countries of vital concern to us. I think our country will soon have to insist that Chile and the Argentine make a choice between us and the Axis. The time is past when they can continue aid to the Axis and still demand our friendship.

But the country most vitally important to us at the present time is Ireland—Southern Ireland. Why you should feel that you have to handle the Irish with kid gloves is a mystery. You have fought their quarrel with England over a period of years and have proved to be one of their most valuable friends. Now that our very life is at stake I think you have the right to demand their support of our cause. As it is, it would be far better for us if Ireland were an out-and-out enemy. Then we could take measures to safeguard our interests.

You keep demanding a second front, and I think you are right. But anyone with even a small amount of military knowledge knows that a second front is impossible with a country like Southern Ireland on our exposed flank. The dog-in-the-manger attitude that Southern Ireland has taken practically guarantees Hitler against a second front—at least for some time to come. If Southern Ireland does not change its attitude very shortly it ought to be declared in the ranks of the enemy and suffer the loss of all future help and sympathy from this country. And when this war is over and England moves to rectify this error of judgment of hers—from a military point of view—in not retaining control of Southern Ireland, all of us in this country will rejoice at such a move and feel that England is thoroughly justified. For the military control of Southern Ireland is just as much a protection for us as for England.

Second Front at Dakar

Dear Sirs: Without being a military expert in any sense, I believe that Dakar as a secondary offensive front offers such obviously good prospects for the United Nations that it is disturbing to find that this would conflict with the resolve of the State Department to keep Vichy a neutral. In this connection, the elevation of Admiral Leahy to a place of tactical authority is completely discouraging, since it makes it unlikely that the necessary action will be taken.

This is the time to reread "The War Years" by Carl Sandburg, especially since the view is being frequently expressed that Lincoln understood the advantage of delay. The truth is that he understood the need of impatience, and he condemned the generals who suffered from what he described as "the slows." Incidentally, Sandburg shows how much of the dissension and conflict between Northern factions was finally resolved once a firm policy of attack, with all its casualties, was undertaken.

Sympathy for Mr. Voorhis

Dear Sirs: Charles Van Devander, in his article on the Dies committee in the supplement to the October 3 issue of The Nation, says that Representative Voorhis's "family fortune has never impinged on his social conscience." What he means by this remark I do not know, but here are some pertinent facts.

After graduation from college Mr. Voorhis made a direct study of labor conditions and labor problems by becoming a manual laborer and working in labor camps and industrial communities. Subsequently he returned to university study, received an advanced degree, and served as a college instructor in the history of labor problems. He engaged with others in a brave but unsuccessful effort to obtain for laborers in the Imperial Valley their constitutional right of assembly.

One of his most notable performances was his establishment of a school for underprivileged boys at San Dimas, California. He conducted this school until his political duties led him to give it to the state of California as a part of its educational system.

Mr. Van Devander's main criticism is that Congressman Voorhis has not interfered with the outrageous actions of the reactionary majority of the Dies committee. He ignores Mr. Voorhis's published condemnation of some of these actions and his participation in a threat of a minority report, mentioned by Kenneth Crawford in the same issue of The Nation, which actually prevented the publication of the majority statement as a committee report. Anyone who has served as a minority member of a committee the majority of which was determined to do as it pleased will have sympathy with Mr. Voorhis, and may wonder what he could have done under the circumstances.

Reaction to Internment

Dear Sirs: I inclose a copy of a letter from a young student in the Home Economics Department at the University of California at Berkeley who is now a prisoner at the concentration camp for American citizens of Japanese ancestry at Poston, Arizona. Your readers will perhaps like to get this succinct picture of an intelligent girl's reactions to internment.

ELMER MICHELSON

Berkeley, Cal., October 5

[The letter follows.]

When I first came I thought this place was really going to be fun and exciting because everything was so new and we met so many new friends, all Japanese of course. Yet I know that others didn't take things as I did because they weren't used to the terrific heat and dust and discomfort. We used to go to the intake to watch the new groups come in, and they always looked so tired and discouraged. . . .

About the younger generation and their attitude toward camp life, it is a sad story. It is really disgusting to see maturing personalities disintegrating. The young people around seventeen or eighteen are getting lazy, ambitionless, satisfied, and stagnating. I suppose we should blame the seeming security of camp life. We don't have to worry about our shelter, food, or clothing here, and we can get along fine without working if we choose to. Security is something that we strive for and desire in any normal life, but in a place and situation like this, what awful consequences it brings! I just wonder what some of us will be like in personality and character in four or five years.

Yet camp life offers excellent opportunities to show our ingenuity and creative ability in practical ways. Since our income is so limited—by the way, after next month I'll be drawing professional wages, $19—and there are so few things it can buy because of our location and war priorities, we are forced to think up substitutes or to make our own products. To mention a few articles we make—furniture, sandals, beautiful paper flowers, parks out of desert foliage, vases out of rock and cement, and now there is a knitting and crocheting craze throughout camp. There is also a wonderful opportunity here to practice a democratic civil government, if we would all take it seriously and cooperate. We get into tough spots sometimes because of the clash of ideas between the older and younger generation, but so far the results have been very democratic and farsighted. We are tending toward the principles of the consumers' cooperative more than anything else. In this way all the community enterprises will be owned by the people who patronize them and the profits can be used directly for the benefit of the people. . . .

Daily I hear reports of different friends who have been fortunate enough to leave various camps to attend universities in the East and Middle West. Some have received scholarships and others not. I'm still clinging to the hope of getting out of here, too, but I guess money is just too important to ignore. . . .

Paying for Prejudice

Dear Sirs: The United States is waging war for democracy, but the state of Missouri is paying an unbelievably high price for segregation.

Lloyd Gaines, a Negro Missourian, sought admission to the University of Missouri Law School. He was rejected because of his race. The United States Supreme Court directed the Missouri officials to admit Gaines to the white state school or establish a separate law school for Negroes. Missouri established the Lincoln University Law School in St. Louis for Negroes. It has an enrolment of sixteen students and has twelve persons on its pay roll. It is likely that before the school year is over there will be more persons on the Lincoln University Law School pay roll than students in attendance.

If the federal government would put a moderate tax on racial prejudice, Mr. Morgenthau's worries would be over.

Jim Crow in Washington

Dear Sirs: I am sure you are familiar with the Jim Crow situation in Washington, which has been such a blot on the country in peace time and which has become more of a disgrace—as well as a positive danger—now that we are at war.

The capital is now suffering from a shortage of trained street-car and bus operators: accidents have increased, frantic appeals are made for operators, and men are being brought in from other cities, adding to the overcrowding. But only white men are allowed to become street-car and bus operators. There are in Washington many qualified Negroes, familiar with the city, but the Capital Transit Company flatly refuses to hire them.

To rectify this situation the Committee for Jobs for Negroes in Public Utilities has been established here. It plans to utilize agencies such as the Fair Employment Practices Commission to mobilize public opinion and to provide a channel through which qualified Negroes can be mobilized for these jobs when the time is ripe.

We feel this is an important fight, vital to the war effort and to the aims of the war. If any persons would like to give financial assistance, checks or money should be sent to the committee, care of the Y. M. C. A., Twelfth Street, N. W.

Hardships Under the Law

Dear Sirs: Last year a law was passed by the United States Congress stating that American citizens could not return to foreign countries where they were born and reside there continuously unless they worked for American companies or as employees of the American government. The law created so many difficulties for American citizens living in England and Latin American countries that the date of its action was postponed until October, 1943.

The Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs is trying to promote greater sympathy between the United States and Latin America, but United States citizens born in Latin America who by living in the country of their birth could be extremely useful to it as well as to their adopted country must return here because positions in which they could represent American companies or serve the American government are limited. Hundreds of American citizens living in Latin American countries have been forced to pull up stakes and return to the United States. Although it is understood that the law was aimed at naturalized American citizens living in Germany, it is unfortunately causing much hardship to innocent and honest Americans living in Latin America.

The Shape of Things

WENDELL WILLKIE'S ROLE AS LEADER OF the loyal opposition was played to perfection in his radio report to the American people. Mr. Willkie was sharply critical of the Administration and of the conduct of the war, but his strictures had none of the querulousness or patent insincerity we are accustomed to expect from Republican leaders endeavoring to make political capital out of the Administration's mistakes. In its breadth of view and bold concreteness the speech went far beyond the government's most advanced position. Mr. Willkie has reason to believe from his own observations that lend-lease aid to our Allies is largely "boasts and broken promises," and he demands a more offensive psychology in the conduct of the war. He calls again for a second front in Europe and for a speedy invasion of Burma. He recognizes that "India is our problem" and resents the "half-ignorant, half-patronizing way" in which we conduct diplomatic relations with nations in Eastern Europe and Asia. He opposes the Administration's moves toward censorship. Above all, he demands an end of colonialism, with dates set now for the liberation of all peoples and with suitable guaranties. All these proposals happen to coincide exactly with our own views. We fear, however, that the timing of his speech, coupled with the notable failure to say a single kind word for the Administration, may serve no good purpose next Tuesday. The speech may in fact help to elect Republicans who are diametrically opposed to everything in it and who are in large part responsible for the Administration's failure to advance the Willkie program.

THE LONG-EXPECTED BRITISH DRIVE TO "crush Rommel" has opened in a spirit of sober confidence. Headquarters in Cairo are maintaining a reserved attitude, but if there is less ballyhoo than attended previous desert offensives, there seems to be no less determination and much better preparation. Quick results are not to be expected, since the narrowness of the Alamein front and the depth of the fortified Axis positions have produced a tactical picture resembling that in France during the last war. Only after the artillery and infantry have opened gaps in the enemy lines will it be possible for armored forces to take up their leading role. A great part, however, is being played by the Allied aerial forces, which have established complete supremacy and have been able, in addition to giving strong support to the ground troops, to maintain a smashing offensive against Rommel's communications. The stress laid by Axis sources on the numbers and equipment of the Eighth Army and particularly its air strength is a hopeful augury, for it suggests the preparation of alibis. In this new campaign the primary British objective is, of course, to end the Axis threat to Egypt. But it has larger implications in relation to the battle for the Mediterranean which has been in progress ever since Italy entered the war. That is why the R.A.F. has been crossing the Alps once again to create havoc and panic in northern Italy and why a war of nerves is raging around Dakar.

ADMIRAL LAND, WHO HAS LONG DISPLAYED intolerance of trade unions, has managed to beat his own record for irresponsibility. In a speech to the Investment Bankers' Association last week he said, according to the New York Times, that shipbuilding and the war effort generally were being obstructed by "union organizers, profiteers, typewriter strategists, and needle boys. As far as the organizers are concerned, for the duration, in my opinion, they ought to be shot at sunrise." According to PM, Land spoke of organizers without a prefixed description, but when asked by reporters to whom he referred said he meant union organizers. In a so-called "clarification" of his remarks the Admiral said, "I meticulously refrained from any adjective qualifying the term 'organizers.' As everyone knows, there are all kinds of organizers for all kinds of projects. My only interest is in organized production." Possibly organized production might get on better if it were not in charge of organizers of the stripe of Admiral Land, whose speech was either deliberate mischief-making or, if his explanation is to be accepted, childish nonsense. In his defense, the New York Herald Tribune says he is doing an outstanding job as War Shipping Administrator and chairman of the Maritime Commission and ought, therefore, to be allowed "the indiscretion of exhibiting his prejudices." This plea, which incidentally makes a liar of the Admiral, disregards the fact that the success of the shipbuilding program is dependent on the cooperation of labor, which so far has been given ungrudgingly. But we have yet to learn that the ideal method of seeking cooperation is with a firing squad. Even the Nazis—the leading experimentalists along these lines—have not made an outstanding success of it.

of dry fanatics, he tried to tack on the draft bill an amendment to prohibit the sale of alcoholic beverages of any kind in communities adjacent to military or naval posts. And if anyone is wondering why our legislators are so often regarded as less than adequate to their high calling, let him note this report from Washington: "It is admitted on all sides that a roll-call vote will see the Lee amendment through. . . . If it were on a voice vote the amendment would be defeated hands down." The Senate managed to avoid the issue, at least until after the elections, by sending the amendment to the military committee for hearings, but we must be prepared for further devious attempts by the dries to eliminate the "evils of the liquor traffic" by substituting the tenfold evils of another bootleg era. The fifteen wild and weary years of the great experiment, when lawlessness became the rule from the lowest speakeasy to the most respectable family living-room, taught them exactly nothing. It has been asserted that a Nazi-subsidized organization in Geneva is filtering prohibition propaganda into this country as part of the drive to stir up discord. The prohibition camel may be the latest guise of the Trojan horse, and certainly we can think of nothing better calculated to disturb our domestic peace than a fight over the right to take a drink. But knowing the capacity of our dries for self-intoxication, we doubt their need for outside stimulants.

CABINET CHANGES IN CHILE HAVE NOT justified the hope that that country has finally cleared up its foreign policy. If the resigning Foreign Minister, Barros Jarpa, was known as a reactionary within his own Radical Party, his successor Fernandez y Fernandez, has an even more questionable record as a former follower of General Ibañez, the "strong man" of Chile. The hours that he spent in Buenos Aires on his way home from Montevideo, where he represented his country as ambassador, are not likely to have increased his doubtful eagerness to break with the Axis. All the correspondents agree that the Argentine Foreign Minister, Dr. Ruiz Guñazú, never left his Chilean colleague alone for a moment. He even seized the occasion of a ceremony to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of the Chilean national hero, General O'Higgins, to deliver a venomous commentary on "good neighborliness," addressed equally to Sumner Welles and the new Chilean Foreign Minister. The dissatisfaction of democratic Chile with the President's solution of the crisis is revealed in the vast program of meetings and demonstrations for a rupture with the Axis organized by the various political parties and unions, to start this week. But again the fascists were the first to strike. Encouraged by President Ríos's hesitations, they staged last Sunday a "spontaneous" demonstration in honor of Barros Jarpa as the symbol of resistance, not to Hitler, but to Washington. Developments in Chile again point the lesson that in spite of all that has happened in Europe no democratic government or movement wants to learn—the lesson that appeasement of the enemy, whether external or internal, leads only to democratic demoralization, growing weakness, and final defeat.

THE SENATE DISPLAYED A SHOCKING LACK of regard for military necessities when it attached two crippling riders to the bill authorizing the drafting of eighteen- and nineteen-year-old boys. Of these the most serious as well as the most inexplicable is the amendment requiring youths under twenty to have a full year of training in this country before being sent abroad for combat duty. There are obvious moral and educational reasons why the drafting of eighteen- and nineteen-year-old boys should be postponed as long as possible, but the chief effect of the amendment is to place an intolerable burden on the authorities responsible for training and distributing military personnel. Certain specialized types of combat duty require more than a year of training, but for many other types six or eight months of training are entirely adequate. In view of the uncertainties of the coming year, it is most unwise to tie the army's hands on such a vital matter as troop distribution. The amendment deferring farm workers is more understandable but no more defensible. The problem of farm labor is serious, but it can be solved only in relation to the whole question of the allocation of man-power.

THE FARM BLOC HAS CALLED BYRNES AND Henderson on the carpet because they have allegedly violated the "plain language" of the price law by placing a ceiling on flour that keeps wheat below its parity price. The bloc's quarrel with the price-stabilization authorities appears to be concerned with procedure rather than results. Admittedly the farmer is getting parity price for his wheat through the wheat loans and parity payments. But the farm bloc insists that the payment of a subsidy to farmers to persuade them to liquidate their wheat loans was not authorized by Congress. Granting that the Administration has not followed the specific program of the farm bloc in handling the knotty problem of stabilizing farm prices, we fail to see that it has violated either the letter or the spirit of the law. The Stabilization Act conferred sweeping powers on the President because it was obvious that the price-control technique would have to be kept flexible to deal with a complex situation. The success of Byrnes and Henderson in checking the upward spiral of farm prices after they had advanced some 78 per cent from the pre-war level testifies to the soundness of their policies.

Battle of November 3

ON THE night of November 3 they will start counting the ballots. The elections of 1942, which the Patterson-McCormick press and the hate-Roosevelt demagogues predicted would never come to pass, will be an accomplished fact; the democratic machinery which was scheduled to come to a fatal standstill with the declaration of war will have functioned as usual. And anyone who minimizes the implications of that functioning is dangerously innocent of what is going on about him. For by the morning of November 4 the pattern of American history for the years ahead will to a large degree be determined, whether or not its outlines are altogether clear.

A war-time election in its very nature constitutes what Carl Sandburg called "the shaping of a national fate." Who can doubt that this would have been a very different country had the Copperheads carried the day against Lincoln in November of 1862, or that the world itself might have presented a different face if Woodrow Wilson had not lost caste in November of 1918? Yet neither of those campaigns carried more dynamite than is packed into the election of 1942.

There is admittedly a widespread disposition to shrug this election off and fix one's gaze on 1944. But the world is moving at an incredible pace. When the present Congress was chosen, France had just fallen, Russia was still shipping war materials to Germany, England had had its first taste of the blitz, the United States was promising to keep its boys at home, and the cause of democracy looked black as pitch. The vast changes that have taken place in these two years will probably pale into invisibility beside the upheavals of the next two. By 1944 the war may be over, or in any event drawing to a close. The nature of the peace, the shape of things to come, may well lie with the men who are chosen next Tuesday. The Seventy-eighth Congress will be in a position to do to Roosevelt what the Sixty-sixth did to Wilson. It will do that and worse if it is not relieved of the small-minded men who in the Seventy-seventh have brought Congressional prestige to an all-time low. The men who would have stripped this country of power in the moment of its greatest need now ask that their pre-Pearl Harbor records be forgotten in the name of a "unity" which they work seven days a week to undermine. We can only hope that the American people will understand that the elimination of these men is a matter not of revenge but of necessity.

We have devoted a great deal of space in the pages of The Nation to analyzing the performance of our Congressmen and we present elsewhere in this issue a round-up of some of the Dunderheads who escaped full-length portraits in the "Keep Them Out" series. Other aspects of the campaign are worth touching on, however, even at this late date.

The Republican candidate for Senator in Massachusetts is Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., who sided with the isolationists on every issue except the Lend-Lease bill, for which he voted after having spoken against it. Since Pearl Harbor Senator Lodge has of course supported the war. But one group at least is not impressed by his change of front. That group is the Coughlinites. On September 26, 1942, the Gaelic American, of which Father Curran is a regular columnist, called upon all who share its opinion that "American isolationist" is synonymous with "American patriot" to rally their forces behind Senator Lodge, who, it maintained, will be opposed by "every anti-Irish bigot, every Irish renegade, every Communist" in Massachusetts. Now it happens that Senator Lodge is also opposed by Representative Joseph E. Casey, Democratic candidate for Lodge's Senate seat. Mr. Casey's name would scarcely suggest that he is the "slavish Anglophile" which the Gaelic American has been painting him. What disturbs this organ of the Coughlinites is that Casey voted for repealing the arms embargo, for extending the draft law, for the strategic-materials bill, and for repealing the Neutrality Act—all of which measures were opposed by Lodge. Massachusetts citizens who do not believe that isolationist and patriot are really synonymous will have an excellent chance to express their opinion next Tuesday by voting for Casey.

LeRoy D. Downs, Democratic candidate for reelection as Representative from Fairfield County, the Fourth Congressional District of Connecticut, is opposed by the resplendent Clare Luce, author, playwright, wife of Henry Luce, and free-lance commentator on world affairs. Mrs. Luce has ungraciously labeled her rival a faceless man and a rubber stamp. As a matter of fact his record, both on war measures and domestic issues, has been excellent. Organized labor is solidly behind him, and voters in general will do well to keep him in office. Mrs. Luce's views on foreign affairs and how to win the war are vigorous enough, but her recent remark that at one time "we all thought that Mussolini was doing a good job" is a pretty typical example of her precocious political confusion.

Our sympathies go out to New Jersey voters who face the Senatorial alternative of Albert G. Hawkes or the Democratic incumbent, William H. Smathers. Hawkes, a former president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, makes no bones about his plutocratic bias, and Senator Smathers is too much a Hague candidate for us to indorse him with pleasure. He has consistently supported the Administration, however, and is without doubt the better bet.

An overwhelmingly hostile press is hampering Governor Culbert L. Olson in his campaign for reelection against the "non-partisan" candidacy of Earl Warren. Olson has disappointed some of his more radical supporters, but his term as governor of California has been marked by major reforms, notably in farm-labor conditions. It would be a pity to have California revert to the Hoover-Merriam era, which is where Warren would take it despite his current pro-Roosevelt pretensions. In the same state Private Will Rogers, Jr., carries with him the blessing of progressives of all shades, not only for his own sake, though he is a gallant and promising liberal, but because his victory will remove the ineffable Leland Ford from Capitol Hill.

Jumping about the map, we should like to put in a good word for Senator Murray, up for reelection in Montana, and for the peerless George Norris, who despite the President's indorsement faces a stiff three-cornered fight in Nebraska. Senator Brown of Michigan has made a good record and deserves reelection. Most of the House delegation from that state is Republican, and it is one of the most viciously reactionary groups that ever sat in Congress. We hope especially for the defeat of Hoffman and Dondero, though the disappearance of the whole bloc would be a blessing to the country.

Elsewhere in this issue is a competent analysis of the intricate and highly strategic campaign in the state of New York. It took courage and farsightedness on the part of the American Labor Party to keep Dean Alfange in the field after the President's second indorsement of John J. Bennett for governor. The need of a second blessing is indicative of both the desperation of the Farley forces and the grudging nature of the first benediction. We hope New Yorkers will not be fooled by the hysterical last-minute contention that a vote against Bennett will be grist to the mill of Dr. Goebbels. It is better to let the Nazi propaganda machine make what it can of a spurious defeat for the President in 1942 than to present it with a genuine overthrow of Roosevelt in 1944. And make no mistake about it, that is exactly what a Bennett victory would mean.

What's Wrong in the Pacific?

THE struggle in the Solomons has become symbolic as well as strategic. Our toehold on Guadalcanal represents our pledge of aggressive action to carry the war northward and regain the wide spaces overrun by the enemy; the magnitude of the forces Japan has brought to bear in the area is a measure of its determination to hang on to every inch of territory won and to halt our counter-offensive at the base-line.

As we go to press, the first news has been received of a developing battle of all arms. A Japanese communiqué has hailed a major victory, but its claims that four Allied carriers and a warship have been sunk are dismissed by Secretary Knox as "a fishing expedition." Our Navy Department, however, has admitted some losses in addition to the sinking of the Wasp, including major damage to a carrier; and in view of our apparent numerical inferiority in surface craft in the Solomons area, the situation is not entirely reassuring. Our biggest asset remains the qualitative, if not quantitative, superiority of our air forces, but the value of this asset is likely to be diminished during the coming rainy season.

In these circumstances the new American commander in the Solomons, Rear Admiral William F. Halsey, has a tough assignment. Moreover, he has problems to solve within the American forces; past weaknesses to overcome and past mistakes to be rectified. The nature of these mistakes and weaknesses is set forth in an illuminating series of articles by Hanson W. Baldwin now appearing in the New York Times. Mr. Baldwin has recently returned from an extensive tour of the Pacific, including a visit to Guadalcanal. He is among the more sober of our military commentators, and his articles have presumably been subjected to censorship. The charges they make, therefore, of incompetence and divided control cannot be lightly dismissed.

The major problem to be solved in the Pacific, according to Mr. Baldwin, is that of leadership. Errors of judgment by some of our naval commanders—"errors that stem in large measure from over-caution and the defensive complex"—have, he declares, resulted in costly and unnecessary losses. The outstanding instance of such errors is, of course, the disaster that occurred off Savo Island on August 9 when the Australian cruiser Canberra and three of our heavy cruisers "were surprised like sitting ducks." According to Mr. Baldwin, the surprise was due to the fact that although warning of the approach of a Japanese cruiser squadron had been received, our ships had assumed defensive stations patrolling over a fixed course instead of going out to meet the enemy. Moreover, their dispositions were such that the Japanese vessels were able to approach almost within range before being detected. In addition, it appears that only a small part of the crews of our ships were at battle stations, and that the admiral in command of the cruiser screen had departed in his flagship leaving no one in actual tactical command. If this is a true picture of the engagement off Savo Island, it suggests an almost incredible degree of carelessness.

This blow helps to explain why the first brilliant success of the marines in the Solomons was not followed through aggressively and accounts also for the unusual and drastic step of a change of leadership in the middle of operations. Admiral Halsey, who succeeds Admiral Ghormley in this command, is reported to be an aggressive, two-fisted officer, and as chief of a combined force he has the advantage of training at the Army War College as well as the Naval War College. The public, however will not be satisfied by this chopping off of a head unless it speedily receives evidence that the fundamental weaknesses of our fighting organization are corrected.

It is shocking, for instance, to receive from Mr. Baldwin confirmation of sinister rumors of a continued rivalry between the services that has been definitely hurtful to morale. We cannot win a war in "the Franklin Field mentality," and it is high time pre-war football feuds were forgotten. Mr. Baldwin reports that on Guadalcanal the three services have been cooperating very well, but that at greater distances from the front there has been ridiculous bickering over credits, particularly between the navy and the army air forces.

We can hardly expect unity in the ranks, however, so long as we fail to solve the problem of unity at the top. In common with many other organs of public opinion The Nation has repeatedly inveighed against the divided rule under which our war machine operates. In every field—military, economic, political—the war effort is entangled in the stalemates and contradictions that arise from conflicting authority. Between the United Nations and within our own nation, this problem persists; and success waits upon its solution.

Defending the Empire?

DEAR FRED: I am quite startled by the last paragraph on page 365 of The Nation of October 17. You cannot mean—can you?—that we are fighting for the British Empire. We are fighting to keep the territories of the British Empire out of Axis hands. But where are our war aims (freedom) if we wish to keep the British Empire intact? I thought Sumner Welles said, "The period of imperialism is ended."

The task of keeping British Empire territory out of Axis hands would have been facilitated in Burma, for instance, if stupid imperialist policy had not prevailed. The defense of India would be easier for us if Churchillism were abandoned. I think we can spare the British Empire. It is obstructing victory. British imperialists are responsible for England's conservative conduct of the war.

LOUIS FISCHER

Canton, Ohio, October 22

DEAR LOUIS: After reading your letter I reread the offending paragraph in my editorial—and I must say I think you have a rather low startling-point.

Here's what I said:

And meanwhile the British people needn't worry. We'll keep on fighting along with them in spite of Life's ultimatum. And we'll fight for the empire, too, since the empire includes not only India but the great self-governing dominions, and the islands of the Caribbean, and Malta, and other sources of the power and will-to-win of the alliance against Hitler. We can't spare the British Empire; everybody knows that, really; even Mr. Luce.

Is that a startling statement? Isn't it almost crudely self-evident that, whatever may be done after the war to reorganize the relationships between nations, we are today fighting for the life of the British Empire as well as for our own life? To pretend otherwise is to fool ourselves. The British Empire is a fact—slightly frayed around the edges but still fairly substantial—and we can't sensibly write it out of existence at the same time that we fight on seven seas and half a dozen continents side by side with its armies and fleets.

And it isn't territory alone that is at stake. You know that. The most important asset the empire brings us is the bond of mutual responsibility that holds together the leading nations that make it up. It wasn't a pure passion for democracy in the abstract that drove Canada and Australia and New Zealand and South Africa to declare war in 1939. Even less was it fear of attack. The dominions were no more immediately threatened than the United States. But they went to war voluntarily more than two years before Pearl Harbor pitched us into the fight. They went to war because they were bound to Britain by ties—emotional, political, economic—strong enough to make them send their sons to die on battlefields halfway around the globe. The British Empire—would you feel happier if I called it Commonwealth?—was the only working system of collective security in the world when the war started.

Of course it wasn't perfect and not all of its parts worked. One of the free nations of the empire—the Irish Free State—remained neutral, and today is so completely out from under British control that it even refuses the use of its ports as bases for the defense of the British Isles, itself included. And the British government respects Ireland's reckless neutrality as it did that of Holland and Belgium. At the other end of the imperial arc, India was declared into the war without the assent of its people and has responded with a display of resistance that threatens the whole Allied position in the East.

The truth is, the British Empire is a set of contradictions, and anybody can draw from it almost any moral he chooses. Where it works well, it is a mighty web of useful voluntary relationships—a possible basis for broader federation after the war. Where it works badly, it is a coercive machine, almost useless from a military point of view and actively dangerous politically. But it is foolish to suppose that in the midst of a desperate, round-the-world war the contradictions can be undone and a smooth, consistent structure created. The best that can be hoped for is an interim patching of the fabric of empire where it has worn thin, so that the strength of the whole will not be fatally impaired. It's too late to do a temporary repair job on Malaya or Burma—unless they should be speedily reconquered. But India is still unconquered, and every effort should be made to establish there a sense of confidence and common destiny before India, too, disintegrates under the fire of political as well as military attack. I am convinced that a free India within the empire will be a far better ally than a sullen, half-colonial India divided emotionally by its hatred of Axis tyranny and its desire to see British power overthrown. I am convinced that if India is freed, democratic elements throughout the world will be strengthened—in England as well as elsewhere.

It is not because I am against the empire that I believe India should be given a convincing measure of self-government. It is because I want the empire to be strengthened in its weakest spots—which are its colonial territories—and because I believe that the general fight for freedom is compromised by fights for freedom within the anti-Axis coalition.

And that is why Life, when it lectured the British people about "your side" as opposed to "our side," was talking dangerous and almost treasonable nonsense. "Our side" includes the British Empire, just as it includes China and Russia and the guerrillas in Serbia and the Fighting French in Syria and Equatorial Africa. Our side—America included—is riddled with contradictions, sins against freedom, treason to the democratic spirit. Oppression, race prejudice, autocratic rule are no monopoly of the British Empire; it harbors less of these than many of the rest of us. We can't draw our skirts aside and wait till injustice is ended and empire reconstructed into brotherhood. We have a war to fight. And our side has to be united in all our faults and virtues or we shall face defeat together. So Americans can ill afford to mutter vague threats about refusing to fight if the British don't "move over to our side." They are already on our side, and they were there long before we were, if you'll forgive the paradox.

What we can do, and must do, since the empire and we are full partners with each other and all the rest of the United Nations, is to share also the responsibility of repairing any weak spots that diminish our fighting force. The Indian problem is at one remove an American problem, and a Russian and Chinese problem. The mechanics of bringing about a settlement through the good offices of all the interested powers is difficult. But the difficulty is similar to that involved in working out the other problems of political strategy that affect the war effort throughout the world. To overcome it will take both tact and toughness. I hope we have them.

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Washington's Forbidden Topic

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, October 25

I WANT to call attention to an extraordinary document that seems to have been completely overlooked by the daily press. I refer to the "Additional Comments" of Representative Bender which are appended to the report on man-power issued by the Tolan committee last Tuesday. Bender is a Republican Congressman-at-large from Ohio. He was first elected to Congress in 1938 and only recently became a member of the Tolan committee. Little is known of him, and that little gives no indication that he differs much from the average Middle Western Republican. All "Who's Who" reveals is: "Pres. George H. Bender Ins. Co.; editor and publisher the Ohio Republican and the National Republican since 1934; mem. Ohio State Senate, 1920-30; pres. Ohio Fedn. of Rep. Clubs; chmn. Rep. Central Com. of Cuyahoga County." This certainly smacks of Main Street, and it is as a Main Streeter that Bender chooses to speak in his "Additional Comments," which are really a separate and sharper minority report. "Since the winter of 1941," he declares, "it has been clear to every Main Street American that what is needed is a second front in Europe to split the Axis forces. Spring, summer, and fall have come and gone without a second front."

Representative Bender's advocacy of a second front is less important than his courage in being the first public figure here to speak out in plain language on the deeper issue behind the question of a second front. This is not whether we are to open an offensive in France next Tuesday or next month or next spring. The real question is whether we are to plan this as a war of the United Nations, with a Western offensive geared into the supply needs of the British, Russians, and Chinese, or whether we are to plan to fight the world alone. The truth is, as every important official here knows, that the President's dominant military-naval advisers are already operating on this latter assumption. The corollaries of this assumption are (1) the addition of several million men to our army, (2) the curtailment of lend-lease aid to our allies in order to outfit that army, and (3) postponement of the offensive until the enlarged army is ready. All three corollaries are already reflected in official action, and informed persons here say that the plan is to stage no real large-scale offensive in 1943.

The Bender report is a hard-hitting six-page summary of the basic man-power, military, and production problems facing us in this war. The full committee report is the ablest and most comprehensive analysis of war needs and war planning ever to appear here, and I hope to discuss it in some detail in my next article. The value of Mr. Bender's "Additional Comments" is that they bring some of the points in the full report into sharper focus. "Our military," Bender says, "have never decided when, where, and with what they are going to fight. For this reason they have not and cannot give to the War Production Board and to the War Manpower Commission, respectively, schedules of their requirements for military products and man-power. Without these schedules it has been impossible to plan production, to allocate materials and man-power. And because we have not planned the elements of production, we cannot manage or control the flow of armament. Without such scheduled flow of weapons the military cannot undertake to plan its strategy." The result of this vicious circle is that "we are always on the defensive." And now we are really preparing to dig in on the defensive on a gigantic scale.

Will the reader bear with me while I quote more fully from that passage in which Representative Bender touches upon the capital's most important Forbidden Topic? "At the present time," Bender writes, "the army is demanding a huge increase in man-power." A fantastically high proportion of present production now goes to supply ordinary civilian items for our present army. "When the army is asked," Bender continues, "if it expects to obtain trucks and other equipment in the same proportion to this larger army as it now obtains, no answer is forthcoming." Why do we need an army and navy of about 10,000,000 men? "The demand by the military for a huge army," Bender answers, "is based in part on the assumption that one or more of our allies will collapse in the coming year." Upon this assumption, it is then argued that we can rely only on ourselves." Since the Tolan report went to press, Secretary Stimson has cut his estimate to 7,500,000 men, but a continuation of the present defensive and defeatist strategic thinking will make necessary an army much larger than that, perhaps as large as 13,000,000.

"To equip such an army with training weapons alone," Bender goes on, "would require practically all of our present war production. Therefore, these advocates of a huge army move logically to the next point—the reduction or stoppage of lend-lease shipments to our allies." By assuming the defeat of our allies we are compelled vastly to enlarge the army. By mobilizing a vastly larger army we help to insure their defeat. "When it is pointed out to these advocates of a 13,000,000-man army," Bender says, "that our allies may collapse if we stop lend-lease shipments, they have no answer"—that is, no answer that could safely be made in public.

Behind these defeatist calculations are a complex of considerations and motives. Among them are not merely political dislike for the Soviet Union but considerable elements of anti-British feeling. As deep, if not deeper, than the more obvious anti-Soviet feeling, which wide sectors of our leadership and upper classes have overcome, is a kind of anti-British isolationist-imperialist attitude on the part of some of our foremost military men. An important man in this category is General Brehon B. Somervell, chief of the Services of Supply, the most powerful single figure in war production today and a man who has done his best to cut down lend-lease aid to Britain, the Soviet Union, and China. He feels that we have to "prepare to do the job ourselves."

This kind of thinking would make the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards our first lines of defense. It would cost many millions more in lives and many billions more in money. It means that we would have to defeat the Axis with our men and boys alone instead of with the aid of British, Russians, and Chinese. It would leave them to die in vain rather than as part of a world strategy for victory. "The international implications of army demands for man-power," Bender points out, "are seldom understood. But they are as important as the need to consider man-power requirements of industry and agriculture." It is these broader implications which the dominant military have failed to understand or chosen to ignore. Popular pressure is needed to support the efforts of powerful forces here, including I believe the President himself, to combat this dangerous trend. The moment is approaching when it will be decided whether these are indeed to be United Nations fighting a United Nations war, or each waging its own struggle in desperate and foolhardy isolation.

1942 and 1944

BY DAVID DUBINSKY

EVEN the least alert voter can hardly fail to realize that a victory for Thomas E. Dewey in this year's campaign for the governorship of New York will be an irresistible Dewey bid for the Republican Presidential nomination in 1944. And it must be equally clear to him that a Bennett victory will represent a smashing blow to the New Deal and a popular indorsement of Farley's anti-Roosevelt drive which will have a decisive effect on the Democratic choice for President two years hence. In view of these simple and inescapable conclusions, the drop in registration throughout the state this year cannot be explained by general political apathy or by a lack of important issues. Behind the candidates—Bennett, Dewey, and Alfange—there are in fact far-reaching issues.

During the past ten years, since President Roosevelt rose to the leadership of the Democratic Party, the progressives have controlled the party nationally and in many of the states. This leadership saved our economic system after the 1929 catastrophe, and by the adoption of a series of progressive measures, popularly known as the New Deal, it provided the underprivileged of our nation with a measure of economic security and gave the workers a new "bill of rights."

The New Deal leadership, of course, did not receive the support of the Tories in the Democratic Party, who on numerous occasions worked hand in hand with the Republicans to emasculate or defeat the humanitarian measures sponsored by the Roosevelt Administration.

The political victories and the patronage which President Roosevelt's popularity brought the party prevented a permanent rift between its progressive and reactionary wings. Nevertheless, the reactionary group did everything it could to discredit the New Deal and to regain control of the party.

The struggle came out into the open two years ago. Led by Postmaster General Farley, the reactionary Democrats tried to defeat President Roosevelt for the renomination. The pretext, of course, was that they were opposed to breaking the "sacred" third-term tradition. Actually, they were trying to scuttle the New Deal leadership. But in 1940 the Democrats lost the battle. Roosevelt was renominated and reelected, and the New Deal for the second time won national vindication.

But while reactionary politicians may die, they never surrender. Since 1940 Mr. Farley and his associates have been building the base for the restoration of Bourbon control of the Democratic Party at the 1944 national convention. New York, the largest state in the nation, is the first they have set out to capture. The outcome of the election here can materially influence the fight in other states, where Farley has already been at work.

That the major fight in New York State is between the New Deal forces, which supported Senator Mead for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination, and the anti-New Deal forces was made dramatically evident when the delegates to the Democratic State Convention repeatedly booed and hissed President Roosevelt, Governor Lehman, Senators Wagner and Mead, and every mention of the New Deal. Farley succeeded in defeating the New Dealers and in bringing about the nomination of John J. Bennett, an inconspicuous and docile officeholder. Bennett's sponsors rather openly assumed that liberal, labor, and independent voters, who during the past ten years have cooperated with the Democrats because the party was led by outstanding progressives, would continue to go along, and they therefore thought it safe to nominate the colorless Attorney General.

The ultimate purpose of Farley's group, however, is far more serious and ambitious than winning the governorship. Control of New York State would give them an opportunity to gain control of the next National Democratic Convention. If they succeed, the nation will again be confronted as so many times in the past, and in New York State this year, with a choice between two evils. Instead of two parties, one led by the reactionaries and the other by the progressives, we shall have two parties dominated by the same forces, both dedicated to the restoration of special privilege and the nullification of most of the advanced labor and social measures enacted during the past decade.

In the light of this analysis of the forces now at work within the Democratic Party, what are sincere and devoted liberals and trade unionists in New York State to do on November 3, when they must decide between Bennett, Alfange, and Dewey?

It is clear that the most important job before progressive voters is to prevent the reactionaries from having two political parties in 1944 while the progressives have none. The progressives cannot hope to influence the decision of the Republican convention in 1944. Nor should they expect to. The conservatives are entitled to have a political party of their own. The Republican Party has always been their political home. Conservative Democrats could consistently support it, as many of them do already, some openly, others quietly.

However, the progressives can help to maintain liberal control of the Democratic Party. This means that Farley and his group must be beaten, beaten decisively and beaten this year. Defeat will serve notice on him and his associates that the Democratic Party will not abandon its substantial record of liberalism in the national arena and in many of the states during the past ten years; that it will continue to follow the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt and not of Jim Farley.

There is more at stake this year than the continuation of the New Deal program. The war in which we are engaged will, we hope, have ended in victory for the United Nations in 1944 or a year later. Important problems must be solved in the post-war period—the terms of peace and reconstruction measures.

The appeasers, the defeatists, and the isolationists have been temporarily silenced by the necessities of war.

But they are far from dead. They will attempt to destroy the hopes of mankind again, just as they did in 1919 and 1920. Are we to be confronted with a Harding on the Republican ticket and a Farley-picked candidate on the Democratic ticket? If so, even though we may have won the war we shall have lost the peace.

That is why the issues of 1944 are directly involved in the election of a governor this year. By their choice this year the voters in New York will help determine what happens in 1944.

Two other things continue to perplex independent voters honestly groping for a solution of the problem they face on November 3. One of them is their anxiety lest in defeating Bennett they may elect Dewey, who may become the Republican Presidential candidate in 1944. Liberals are agreed that the Republicans will nominate a conservative in 1944. Whether it is Dewey, or Taft, or Vandenberg hardly matters. It is obvious that Wendell Willkie, for example, who has taken a liberal position on many domestic and foreign issues, has no chance of nomination by the Republicans. Whoever is nominated is certain, therefore, to be an enemy of the New Deal.

The other source of doubt is President Roosevelt's indorsement of Bennett. This indorsement, made in response to frantic appeals by the same state leaders who ignored the President's views prior to the nomination of Bennett, may prove confusing to some liberal voters. The situation, nevertheless, is quite simple. The President did what is normally expected of the titular head of a party—indorsed its candidates. But the fact remains that Roosevelt, Lehman, Wagner, and Mead, all forcefully opposed Bennett's nomination. And the President openly predicted that Bennett could not win.

The President's statement that he does not believe in "protest voting" is not likely to impress the large liberal following of the Labor Party. The rank and file of the party, like its leaders, see nothing wrong in "protest" voting. It was protest voting by the great independent mass of voters in this city which took New York out of the hands of Tammany for keeps in 1933, and "protest" voting also achieved some excellent results for the New Deal, nationally and in this state, in 1936, 1938, 1940—and let us hope it will in 1942 as well. What is even more important, a vote for Dean Alfange is not just a protest vote. It is a positive and constructive vote to preserve the tradition of liberalism in New York State and give labor a voice in the affairs of our state and nation.

It is important not only that Bennett be defeated but that the vote of the American Labor Party and its standard bearer, Dean Alfange, be tremendous. Alfange is a New Deal Democrat—an outspoken advocate of liberal and humanitarian causes and a fervent apostle of democracy. A huge vote for him and his fellow-candidates on the American Labor Party ticket will demonstrate beyond question that there is a strong liberal force in this state without which a Democratic candidate cannot win. If the American Labor Party, which four years ago carried the state for Lehman and two years ago carried it for Roosevelt, can continue to hold a determining balance of power on Election Day, its position in the state as the exponent of Roosevelt's policies and of the New Deal will continue to command respect.

Independent voters owe no allegiance to the Democratic Party as such. They do owe their support to the New Deal, which has so greatly benefited the country socially and economically. By joining with the American Labor Party in its efforts to strengthen the progressive wing of the Democratic Party, liberals and independent voters will be helping to bring about the much hoped-for political realignment in America.

All progressive voters, those in the Republican and Democratic parties as well as in the Labor Party, should unite behind Dean Alfange, the candidate of forward-looking men and women and the spokesman in New York State of those who seek a constructive solution to our social and economic problems and a democratic peace when victory has been won.

Keep Them Out!

IX. OUR WORST CONGRESSMEN

BY WILL CHASAN

THE demoralization of Congress, so disturbingly evident in recent months, is primarily the work of a small group of tory zealots, some of them near-fascists, whose demagoguery and cynicism have fostered a wilful disregard of national interest. These men, probably among the worst ever to sit in the national legislature, are divided by party labels but united by their bitterness toward the New Deal and an essentially undemocratic outlook. Their fierce prejudices and unrestrained malice have put Congress in a thoroughly unwholesome mood and made it an irritating burden rather than a help in the present emergency.

Obviously not every isolationist or anti-New Dealer belongs in this group. It includes only the extremists: the shabby minority which has indorsed Hitler's Lebensraum claims and worked with his agents and American counterparts; the conscious obstructionists, only slightly less objectionable, who charged the outbreak of war to British imperialism, disparaged the menace of fascism, and denounced every preparedness measure as an effort by Roosevelt to enlarge his powers; and finally those who supported New Deal foreign policy because it was politically expedient to do so but have used the national emergency as a pretext for broadsides against New Deal domestic policy. The records of eight notorious members of this group—Representatives Hamilton Fish, Clare E. Hoffman, Martin L. Sweeney, Stephen A. Day, and Martin Dies, and Senators C. Wayland Brooks and W. Lee O'Daniel—have already been examined in Nation articles, but many others who are up for reelection this November deserve special mention.

Harold Knutson, Minnesota Republican, was vice-chairman of Hamilton Fish's National Committee to Keep America Out of War, cited in recent federal sedition proceedings as a transmission belt for Nazi propaganda. His views have a distinctly fascist tinge. He has praised Hitler for his "forbearance," suggested that the Nazi form of government is superior to the British, and characterized the war as one merely for a raw-material market. "The have-not nations," he told Congress before Pearl Harbor, "must either have free and equal access to that market or they will perish." Knutson shares at least one Nazi race theory. As far back as 1924, in discussing an immigration bill, he said, "Of all the fallacies, I think the one which assumes that all races are equal is the most fallacious." Besides opposing the Administration's foreign policy, he has fought most of its domestic measures, voted for drastic restrictions on labor, and diligently harassed New Deal agencies. His franked envelopes have been available to at least one Coughlinites organization. His speeches have been quoted generously in Social Justice, the Geneva Herald, and other pro-fascist publications. Pearl Harbor left him impenitent. Last March he inquired, "Will Americans graciously bow down to all totalitarian decrees which will restrict their sugar, their motor cars, their oil . . . simply to satisfy the ambitions of those who understand victory to be the overthrow of their enemies?"

John E. Rankin, Mississippi Democrat, has supported New Deal foreign policy and fought for public power, but the Reichstag would provide a more suitable environment than Congress for his unvarnished intolerance. He is anti-Semitic and anti-Negro. Last year he told the House that "the international bankers, largely international Jews" were "crucifying civilization on a cross of gold." Several months before Pearl Harbor he said, "Wall Street and a little group of our international Jewish brethren are still attempting to harass the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States into plunging us into war unprepared." Rankin, probably the most violent anti-Negro Representative in Congress, protested against a measure to end discrimination against Negroes in public places in the District of Columbia on the ground that it would encourage assaults on white women. In opposing a recent bill to allow soldiers to vote without paying a poll tax, he warned that "representative government is trembling in the balance." He has voted against price-control legislation, for the inflationary farm-parity amendment, and for restrictive labor legislation. He is against the forty-hour week, and he opposed the original wage-hour law because, he said, it would "destroy individual liberty." Despite his stand on foreign policy and public power, he is an economic tory and a racial and religious bigot.

George Anthony Dondero, Michigan Republican, has his physical and ideological home in Royal Oak, center of the Coughlin movement. Shortly before Pearl Harbor Dondero assured Congress that "no nation on earth—not even Germany—has threatened the peace and security of our country," although we had "irritated and committed deliberate acts of unneutrality which would warrant Germany or Italy to declare war against us." He decried the presence in the Administration of men "notorious for their socialistic theories," and said, "Within our gates, and not without, lies the greatest danger to our American system of government and way of life." Dondero has opposed both the New Deal's foreign policy and its domestic program. He described the TVA as "one of the greatest swindles ever perpetrated on the American people," voted against the wage-hour law and other social legislation, and urged Congress to take action against "professional agitators" who seek to "impugn" the motives of business men. His post-Pearl Harbor record has been consistently bad. He voted for the inflationary farm bill and against needed tax legislation. He disapproved of restriction of automobile production. He wants to abolish the forty-hour week, time and a half for overtime, and the Farm Security Administration, and thinks that all social gains ought to be abandoned in the interest of our defense program. "One dictator nation," he said, "has demonstrated to the world how to build national defense. It was not done by social reforms or social gains." Dondero has inserted material from Social Justice in the Congressional Record and has been quoted by Coughlin's paper in turn.

James E. Van Zandt, Pennsylvania Republican, active in America First and an admirer of Hamilton Fish, has persistently tried to convince the country that the German war machine is invincible. On May 14, 1941, according to the New York Herald Tribune, he gave an America First rally at Brooklyn a "hair-raising description" of the German army, and said that if we entered the war we would share the fate of the small Balkan nations. In Congress he talked of Germany's "powerful forces" and "blitzkrieg victories" and cautioned against any effort against them. He opposed the seizure of German and Italian ships in American ports. He contended that under lease-lend Roosevelt could "literally take the clothes off your back," and he has used similar arguments against other phases of the Administration's foreign policy. His speeches have been reprinted in Roll Call and America in Danger, both named in federal sedition actions. He has placed in the Congressional Record articles by Lawrence Dennis, one of our better-known fascists, and Catherine Curtis, whose organization, the Women's National Committee to Keep America Out of War, has also been named in a federal sedition action. He has voted against most New Deal measures, saying of one that it gave Roosevelt as much power as the law authorizing Hitler's dictatorship.

William Purnell Lambertson, Kansas Republican, calls the New Deal "a system of planned sabotage by subterfuge for the destruction of the recognized American way." Lambertson's own conception of the American way is illustrated by a speech in which he said, "In the old days when breaking wild horses from Wyoming, it was common to put buckshot fish-line sinkers in their ears when they balked," and went on to suggest "similar treatment of defense strikers." In another speech he declared, "If there is one thing we could honestly do to help this country, it would be to dehydrate the labor standards of New York City." Lambertson opposed wage-hour legislation, the WPA, and other phases of the New Deal domestic program. His attitude toward preparedness was expressed unequivocally in Congress. "This hysteria about national defense," he said, "is hokey, and I am ready to stake my political future on that proposition." He charged that the declaration of a national emergency was a ruse to assure the reelection of Roosevelt, and he has repeatedly accused the Administration of seeking to return the United States to the British Empire. His speeches have been full of subtle anti-Semitism, and he has quoted from Walter Steele, leader of the American Coalition. In the summer of 1941 he urged a negotiated peace, berating those who were encouraging England and France to continue the war. Lambertson now holds that we "were maneuvered" into the conflict. He has continued to oppose the war program.

Howard W. Smith, Virginia Democrat, is a tireless labor-baiter and a leader of the Southern tory ring. Generally he has supported New Deal foreign policy, but last November, at a crucial moment, he insisted that Roosevelt "quell the labor insurrection with its violence and bloodshed" as a condition for further support. Smith has introduced a whole series of anti-labor bills designed to "regulate" labor unions out of existence. As a member of the House Rules Committee he has worked with Hamilton Fish and other Tories to tie up New Deal measures. He voted against the bill to allow men in the services to vote without paying a poll tax, and he has opposed every other measure to extend at home the democracy for which he asks others to fight abroad.

John M. Robsion, Kentucky Republican, regards New Deal foreign policy as a product of Roosevelt's "personal quarrel" with Hitler. He has opposed all preparedness measures, repeating the familiar Coughlinite line that "the great threat to our country does not come from forces across the seas. If this nation ever falls, it will be because of the enemies within the gates." He objected to the admission of refugee children because it would violate the immigration laws. He has objected to sending troops and munitions to England and to sending aid to Russia. He is the author of the tactful suggestion that "we should load all these alien criminal Russian Communists on ships and send them back to Russia," and tell Stalin that unless he "accepts these criminal aliens . . . we will refuse to give him money and munitions for war." His record on domestic legislation is almost uniformly bad. He voted for restrictive labor legislation and against price control. He is a staunch friend of the Dies committee and has criticized the President for failing to cooperate with it. His speeches have turned up from time to time in the fascist press.

Dewey Short, Missouri Republican, is a loud and rabid critic of the New Deal. Typical of his style of expression are his description of the NRA blue eagle as the "blue buzzard" and his suggestion that Roosevelt permit Ferdinand the Bull to draft executive messages to Congress. He thought the spilling of "a little blood" would solve the sitdown strikes in 1937, and he has backed the most drastic labor bills. He used to oppose any participation in the League of Nations and was violently isolationist in the recent foreign-policy debate. When Willkie came out for aid to England, Short called him a "Janus, vindictive, intolerant, bigoted, conceited, utterly unfit to be a leader of any party . . . [a] bellowing, blatant, bellicose, belligerent, bombastic blowhard." His attitude toward the European war was simple. "It was Great Britain and France," he said, "who declared war upon the German Reich after being clearly forewarned by Colonel Lindbergh that it would be utterly impossible for them to compete with Germany's air force." He spoke often for America First and was on the executive council of the National Committee to Keep America Out of War.

Lewis D. Thill, Wisconsin Republican, is the one man in Congress who has been so indiscreet as to insert in the Congressional Record material from a publication of the German Library of Information. He has also inserted articles from the Brooklyn Tablet and the New York Enquirer. He wrote to the Coughlinite Mothers Mobilizing Against War, "I cannot too highly praise the work your organization is doing in behalf of this country in keeping it out of war." During the foreign-policy debate he had much to say in condemnation of England and Roosevelt, but little about Germany. He has voted with monotonous regularity against New Deal domestic legislation, and he supported the most recent Smith bill to hobble labor unions.

Leland M. Ford, California Republican, sees the New Deal as a Communist plot. He fought the TVA as "socialism," predicted that mandatory joint income-tax returns would lead to the destruction of the family and to communism, and called price control a move by some people "to destroy industry in this country as well as the financial structure of the country in order to accomplish their communistic, socialistic purposes." He regards the C. I. O. as a party to the New Deal plot, and says that it "is destroying the country." He blames the C. I. O. for the fall of Guam, Wake, and the Philippines and alleges that its "main purpose" is to sabotage the defense program. In his anti-labor speeches he often refers to the "Russian-educated" Reuthers and the "Russian revolutionist" Hillman, and compares Murray with the Japanese peace emissaries. Last year he introduced a bill to make striking or inciting to strike on defense work an act of treason punishable by twenty-five years' imprisonment. Mrs. Roosevelt's comment was, "Perfect nonsense." Although Ford has generally supported the New Deal's foreign policy, last November he appealed to the House not to vote further military or lease-lend appropriation "until the Administration had demonstrated its ability at least to lick John Lewis and the C. I. O." He says that labor unions and New Deal social legislation are corrupting our democracy and makes the usual Tory analogy with the Blum government in France.

William B. Barry, New York Democrat, thinks Americans were unduly alarmed about Hitler. There is no reason, he said in the House last year, why we cannot "survive in a world where Hitlerism is involved." This belief has led Barry to oppose crucial New Deal foreign-policy measures and to speak frequently for America First and Coughlinite peace groups. He has addressed at least two meetings at which Father Edward Lodge Curran presided. At one of these Father Curran said, "We Christians don't need any help to preserve our Christianity. . . . That great priest in Royal Oak is with us." Barry, in the course of his isolationist activities, inserted in the Congressional Record an editorial from the Brooklyn Tablet and recommended it to his colleagues as "worth-while reading during the hysterical period through which we are now going." The editorial, undiluted Coughlin propaganda, asked, "Is not Churchill's expediency about the same as Hitler's, Stalin's, and Mussolini's? Is he not as cold-bloodedly anti-Christian in violating pledges, in ridiculing ideals, in championing anti-God?" Barry disclaims any association with Coughlinite groups, but in 1941 he was boomed for borough president of Queens by a group of Christian Fronters calling themselves the American Rock. The Brooklyn Tablet supports him vigorously.

Roy Orchard Woodruff, Michigan Republican, has opposed every New Deal preparedness measure. He said that the war danger was "manufactured" partly to provide Roosevelt with an excuse for copying the techniques of Hitler and Stalin. He saw this "sinister danger" lurking in the third term and in almost every other Administration act. The lease-lend bill, he said in a speech denouncing it, was "in fact and effect a proposal for the setting up of a dictatorship in the United States, with the President as dictator." He attributed defense strikes to a government plot to socialize industry. He objected to the seizure of German and Italian ships in American ports and more vehemently to aid to Russia. "We hear," he declared in the House, "that Mr. Hopkins is in Moscow clasping the bloody hand of the Russian dictator, Joe Stalin." He read into the Congressional Record a statement by Gerald L. K. Smith—whom he described as "the great leader and national chairman of the Committee of One Million"—which asserted that any lease-lend aid to Russia would be "the underwriting of atheistic communism." Last March he placed in the record an editorial from Smith's The Cross and the Flag: "The most serious thing about this crucifixion of the middle class [by the war effort] is not only the fact that our bureaucrats apparently don't care what happens to these people but they actually appear to delight in their annihilation." Woodruff himself saw "sinister conditions back of this rubber-gasoline mystery." Pearl Harbor had no perceptible influence on his views. He opposed automobile and tire freezing, he voted for the inflationary farm-parity amendment, and he has continued to hamper the war program. He has been quoted in Broom and Publicity and praised in The Cross and the Flag.

These men are our worst Congressmen. Others whose activities in Congress have been almost equally harmful are Eugene Cox, the Georgia Democrat whose labor-baiting is notorious; Clifton A. Woodrum, the Virginia Democrat who leads the House economy bloc; Paul W. Shafer and Fred Bradley, Michigan Republicans who follow the lead of Clare Hoffman; Karl E. Mundt, South Dakota Republican who was active in America First and has expressed pro-fascist sentiments; John M. Vorys, Ohio Republican who favored a negotiated peace; James F. O'Connor, the Montana Democrat who is Senator Wheeler's satellite; and John Taber, New York Republican, who has fulminated against almost every aspect of the New Deal, including the establishment of a Roosevelt library at Hyde Park. This does not exhaust the list of Congressmen who deserve to be defeated, but it is a guide to those whose continued presence in Congress would be a positive menace to the country's welfare. They are men with tarnished motives or small minds. They have impeded the war effort, and one dreads to think of how they may affect the peace.

BY RALPH BATES

IF ASKED to give reasons for the pre-war appeasement policies of London and Paris, nine out of ten American students of foreign affairs would mention fear and suspicion of the U. S. S. R. and the Communist parties. And most of them would probably assume that it was merely the ruling classes that were hostile and suspicious. The view is a simple one and, like most of its kind, dangerous. For it ignores what, after all, is another aspect of the division introduced into the world by the October Revolution. I refer to the hostility that has always existed between the Second and Third Internationals, the two main streams of the working-class political movement.

There is little need at this date to review the facts in detail, and even less need to apportion blame. The tactics and conduct of each body, infuriating as they were to the other, were the necessary consequence of their philosophies, of their stunted and inadequate elaborations of one half of a truth that was really indivisible. Whatever we may think of either the reformist or the revolutionary tactics or of the uses to which they were put, most of us will admit that the great schism broke the force that might have prevented the rise of fascism. There is not a German Social Democrat or a German Communist who does not today perceive that the unrelenting strife between their parties was of service only to Hitler. Every incident of the ceaseless struggle against pre-war reaction illustrated the same fatal phenomenon, even when there was no open clash. There was unity in Loyalist Spain; yet party frictions, increasing as time went on, were a constant drain on the strength of the Republic. It was party hatred and distrust, in this case four-cornered rather than two-sided, which finally gave the traitor Casado his chance to capitalize on war weariness.

ness. In other countries these differences were always present to prevent the full growth of anti-fascist conviction. To a European, at least, the collisions between the two currents and the sheer political incapacity of the two Internationals, as viewed in the light of after events, must always appear as among the contributory causes of the war.

To an American this opinion may seem an exaggeration; and it may be even less easy for American liberals to believe, as I do, that the war is unlikely to throw up any powerful new movement that will rid us of this old torment of disunity. The Labor Party, as Tom Wintringham suggests, may have remained immune to the new sentiment of reform in Britain. The representatives of the Third International may also be unable to win the allegiance of the masses. Yet when the post-war crisis inevitably arrives, the old parties and the trade unions must once again become the instruments of protest. If they do not, the movement for reform will collapse, and we shall sink into despair.

There would be no point in drawing attention to the schism if its continued existence did not so greatly imperil the successful waging of the war as well as the coming peace. I do not, however, pretend that there is any immediate solution. Most certainly this discussion is not the prelude to yet another sterile effort to find an intellectual common ground for the two movements. But the movements may not always remain as they are. While their philosophies cannot be harmonized, the parties themselves are continually being molded by history; so, too, are the temperaments, the traditions, and the classes from which these parties draw their life and strength. The European parties at this moment are being molded by circumstances. If the circumstances last long enough, I believe the gap can be closed. It is necessary to bring Socialists of all kinds within one broadly based, yet disciplined, party. I believe that it can be done and that a beginning can be made most easily in England. In point of fact, the first small step has already been taken by the British Labor Party and the British trade-union movement. As the war drives Britain and the U. S. S. R. into closer dependence upon each other, it will be possible to take longer steps. The Anglo-Russian Treaty of June, 1942, if it endures, may at last bring the Internationals together.

II

It is essential to review the past attitude of British Labor toward the Soviet Union and the Communist Party. One great European crisis demands attention first—the one leading to the end of capitalist intervention against the young Soviet state in 1920. It may truthfully be said that had the official British labor movement not prepared a nation-wide general strike against the government in that year, the Soviet Union might not be in existence today. The history of that crisis discloses something of extreme importance about the workings of socialist feeling in Britain. As early as December, 1918, the Labor Party Executive, by no means leftist, began to question the government's policy, but it was not until the militant Miners' Federation, at a special joint conference of the Trades Union Congress and the Labor Party in 1919, introduced a resolution demanding the end of intervention that the delegations had an opportunity to express themselves. On the evil of intervention the members were unanimous, though there was disagreement concerning action.

When, on August 7, 1920, Lord Curzon, the Foreign Secretary, officially threatened the Soviets with war if the Red Army's advance on Warsaw continued, Labor's response was instantaneous. Upon the receipt of party orders great demonstrations occurred all over Great Britain. On the next day the combined movement warned the government that "the whole industrial power of the organized workers will be used to defeat this war." A joint convention of the two wings of the movement was called, and when it met in Westminster four days later, a unanimous decision was taken. At this crowded and blazing convention British Labor pledged itself to resist any and every form of military and naval intervention against the Soviet government.

One decisive orator said, "This question you are called upon to decide today—the willingness to take any action to win world peace—transcends any claim in connection with wages and hours." That was the opinion of Ernest Bevin, now a powerful figure in Churchill's ministry. The following is from the official report of another important speech:

[The speaker] wanted to know what the party had done in the matter of the war on the Socialist Republic of Russia. They had got to realize that the present war against Russia on the part of this country . . . was not war against Bolshevism or against Lenin but against the international organization of socialism. It was a war against the organization of the trade-union movement itself, and as such should be resisted with the full political and industrial power of the whole trade-union movement.

The speaker was Herbert Morrison, now Britain's Home Secretary, and there was not the slightest obscurity in his words. The chairman of the Party Executive, Cameron, not a leftist, put the matter as bluntly:

If the day should come when we do take this action . . . we may be compelled to do things that will cause them to abdicate and to tell them that if they cannot run the country in a peaceful and humane manner without interfering with the lives of other nations, we will be compelled, even against the constitution, to chance whether we cannot do something to take the country into our own hands for our own people.

Twenty Years of Fascism in Italy

ON OCTOBER 28, 1942, Italian fascism celebrates its twentieth anniversary. The March on Rome is supposed to have been the starting-point of a movement which has given a name to modern barbarism. As a matter of fact, the exact date of its birth cannot be determined. Mussolini's movement was an influence in Italian internal affairs long before the March on Rome; and the march itself did not immediately wipe out parliamentary and democratic institutions. The day of Matteotti's assassination would be a more exact date if fascism is to be seen as the unleashing of a bloody terror upon the progressive forces of the people.

Unlike most other political movements, fascism had no well-defined philosophy or ideology. Mussolini himself once said that the core of his doctrine was to be found in his day-by-day policies and writings. Swayed by constantly changing conditions, these writings show no consistent positive line; what consistency they may have is negative—the liquidation of all progressive ideas. Sometimes Mussolini called his movement a translocation of the French Revolution into Italian; sometimes he attacked the ideas of the French Revolution as demoralizing and morbid. Sometimes he emphasized the Mediterranean influence in his movement; sometimes he called upon the Prussian ideal of absolute state power.

His foreign policy from the very beginning was aggressive and revisionist. He claimed that Italy had been slighted by the peace treaties, and fooled by the Allies in April, 1915, when the London treaty promised more than Italy subsequently received.

In the first year of its existence Italian fascism made little impression on world opinion. As a unique form of modern government it was considered an Italian internal affair. A British statesman once declared that if he were an Italian he would, of course, be a Fascist. The best propagandists for the new regime were the tourists who visited Italy for a few days or weeks, and who took the blue sky, the beautiful bays, and the hospitable Italian people for special Fascist manifestations. The highways, the clean streets, the lack of beggars, and the official enthusiasm of a small but very vocal portion of the population impressed them. The greater portion were inevitably silent, and tourists cannot understand silent people, especially when they are foreigners.

The tourists gave no thought to the fact that England, the United States, and other democratic countries had not found it necessary to stifle freedom in order to build highways and keep appointments.

Since his was the first totalitarian state in the world, Mussolini encouraged similar movements in other countries. Declaring that his ideology was not a commodity for export, he nevertheless encouraged Hitler in Germany and the fascists in Austria and Hungary. It was his agents who killed the Yugoslav King Alexander and Louis Barthou, the best Foreign Minister of France, in Marseilles and the Rosselli brothers in Paris. It was he who built a strong organization among the Italians in Tunisia and Fascist groups throughout Latin America. It was he who started the Spanish civil war; and even if he showed some hesitation about Hitler's annexation of Austria, it was clear by then that his destiny was indissolubly bound with Hitler's.

His attack on Abyssinia was part of a whole imperialist program in the Mediterranean area; his attack on France was projected before Germany started its invasion. Italian neutrality and Italian belligerency have from the start been planned from the point of view of the Axis; and what role should be adopted has been carefully calculated according to the immediate situation. Too few people read the books by Sforza, Salvemini, Borgese, or Ascoli, or the articles by Ferrero, a Prato, or Don Sturzo. Too many people saw the danger of fascism only when Italy entered the war on the side of Germany.

Italy should have taught the democracies a lesson, if a negative one. In no case was the futility of attempting to appease the Axis more eloquently proved. From the outbreak of hostilities in Europe to Italy's entrance into the war, every imaginable and even unimaginable effort was made to keep Italy neutral. Naval measures intended to stiffen the British blockade were reversed or softened just to please Rome. The slightest criticism of Italian foreign policy by a Pertinax or Kerillis was expurgated by the French press. London and Paris were ready to do anything to appease Mussolini and to help him protect fascism from the impact of the war, as they had helped uphold it in the pre-war years.

Il Duce arbitrarily fixed the birth date of Italian fascism, which came into being unheralded by the people of whom it claims to be the expression. Now it has died—died almost unbeknownst to those who today give the order for the celebration of its twentieth anniversary. It has been strangled by its younger and more terrible brother, German fascism, coming down from the north and assuming the monopoly of violence and tyranny. Hitler and his Gestapo are rulers in Rome.

The Sword, Not the Umbrella

"Public opinion knows that the capital crime of French policy during the interval between the two wars was that the representatives of the people placed blind trust in the technicians of the General Staff, who created an anachronistic army from the dual point of view of material and methods of combat.

"Public opinion knows that every technical question must be plumbed to the bottom, and by technicians. But it is disturbed by the thought that the supreme decisions of global war might be taken by the technicians alone. The place and the hour of the opening of the second front must be decided, after all the technical studies have been made, by the political leaders of the United Nations.

"The second front is not a question of strategy and tactics alone, but one of spiritual direction. It is, then, a question of politics in the highest and noblest sense of the word, of politics accumulating with cold lucidity the information of the technicians and taking its own tragic decisions with full responsibility.

"Public opinion calls upon the leaders of the coalition to carry in their hands the sword of Foch, not the umbrella of Chamberlain."

[From a letter by Emile Vaillancourt, distinguished French Canadian writer and lecturer, to Premier Mackenzie King, Prime Minister Churchill, and President Roosevelt]

The Radio Squadron

BY ALIX REUTHER

NOW that an Allied offensive is imminent, it is imperative that we work out a plan whereby our potential allies—the peoples of the occupied countries—may be utilized to supplement the action of our military forces. The first question this raises is: how can we inform the peoples of Europe of our plan and of their part in carrying it out?

At present our only means of direct communication is the short-wave radio. But the numbers that can be reached in this way are extremely limited. Throughout the occupied countries short-wave sets have been confiscated wherever they could be found, and the death penalty has been decreed for listening. However, though short-wave sets have been largely wiped out, nearly everyone in Europe owns a simple little radio on which he is compelled to listen to what his masters tell him. Only three or four fascist-controlled stations can be tuned in on these sets, but if we broadcast on the same wave lengths we can be heard. How can we do this? The answer is the "radio squadron."

The radio squadron will be attached to the spearheads of the invading United Nations armies. It will consist of skilled radio technicians with superb equipment. These will become what is called, in radio language, "pirates." They will set up their long-wave transmitters to broadcast on somebody else's wave length. The Russian ghost voice has shown the world how effectively this can be done. The equipment will have to be extremely compact so that it can be moved forward behind the front battle lines and be made ready for operation just as fast as are the field kitchens and the supply columns. It will have to be adaptable for use in the Flying Fortresses or patrol planes which accompany the armies.

Just as important as the technical equipment and the skilled engineers will be the "ground crews" of these radio squadrons. They will be experts in psychological warfare, and they should be natives of the country we are moving into. They must know the "terrain."

All over the free world there are thousands of anti-fascist refugees, many of them former newspapermen. In this country a large number of them are already aiding in the United Nations' psychological war effort by broadcasting daily, over government short wave, messages of hope and anti-fascist propaganda to their oppressed compatriots in Europe. These men and women, most of whom have become experts in psychological warfare, will form the nucleus of the radio squadron's ground crews. Theirs will be the job of speaking to their own people—of telling them what we expect them to do.

The radio squadrons will have to coordinate their activity with that of the armed forces and at all times subordinate themselves to the High Command, which will have a section devoted entirely to psychological warfare. The general staff directing this new branch of our armies will draw up plans like any military general staff. It will always keep in mind that this new kind of warfare cannot be directed from a swivel-chair in Washington or London; that after the broad outline of the strategy has been decided upon, the officers of the radio squadrons must determine, on the spot, where and when the next "ether raid" is to take place.

An important part of the job of these radio squadrons will be to tell the enslaved peoples of our ideas for the peace, to reassure them, and to hammer it into their minds that our invasion will not just bring a change of masters but will help them regain their national and personal liberties. This part of the squadron's attack will be in many ways the most difficult, because it will have to overcome years of fascist lies. Another task will be to inform the people of our progress, to give them "hot" news reports. The monitor unit attached to the squadron will pick up the enemy's hoax and combat it at once.

To illustrate, let us assume that we have established three bridgeheads on the English Channel. The fascist radio is already in action telling the people of France that the Nazi army has just achieved another "victory" and repulsed the United Nations' attempt to invade the Continent. The French people, tuning in their radios, hear the Goebbels lie that we have been driven back into the sea. In reality we have established bridgeheads and have already set up not only a service of supply but our radio squadrons. The monitors, hearing the fascist radio, are greatly amused to hear that they have been drowned. The ground crew takes over, and the counter-attack starts on the same wave length on which Goebbels has just drowned the invaders. As the counter-attack swings into action, the people, say, of Rennes hear that we are only about forty miles from their city. They realize that they have given way to despair too soon and that they can go ahead and blow up that certain bridge and dynamite that nearby railroad junction, and that within a few hours they will be able to join the armies of the United Nations.

The hypothetical incident just outlined shows that it will be impossible to direct this new kind of warfare from any other point than from the fighting front itself. Washington and London might not get the complete report on the successful establishment of the bridgeheads for twelve or twenty-four hours. By then the entire situation might have changed.

The commando raid at Dieppe proved the great need for radio squadrons. The moment Allied troops landed, the British Broadcasting Corporation started broadcasting urgent messages to the French people warning them not to let themselves be provoked into any action whatever and to stay home. Most important of all, it kept repeating that the action in progress was only a commando raid and not the expected invasion. The British did not know whether the French heard the warning broadcasts, but they probably did not, for it was later reported that the Germans had shot eleven Dieppe civilians and imprisoned several hundred. Had these heard the British warning to lie low and take no action, they would not have become involved.

On the day after the raid Fernand de Brinon, so-called Vichy ambassador to Paris, announced that all "illegal" radios throughout France were to be confiscated immediately. What could have been the reason for that statement at that particular time? Everyone, both inside and outside France, knew very well that it was not a new order, that confiscation and reprisal had been going on for more than two years, and that there were supposedly no more "illegal" radios in existence.

It is clear that the only reason the Nazis and their Vichy associates could have had for issuing this obviously phony order was to fool us, and especially the B. B. C. They wanted us to believe that we could actually reach the people by short- and medium-wave radio. The Nazis of Death, Victory

hope that once we really believe this, our General Staff will rely upon it in establishing invasion strategy. In reality, of course, any action based on such a false premise would be doomed to failure.

During the Dieppe raid and for weeks afterward the Berlin radio screamed to the world at large and to France in particular that l'affaire Dieppe was the greatest defeat yet suffered by the Allies inasmuch as it had been planned as a bridgehead for the second front; that this utter rout proved that the second front would never come to pass, that the Nazi fortifications were impregnable. The effect of these broadcasts on the morale of the French people cannot be exaggerated. If the commandos at Dieppe had included a radio squadron broadcasting on either the Dieppe or the Paris frequency, our warnings would have been heeded and the limited scope of the operation been made clear.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IF THE scene of a contemporary Offenbach operetta were laid in a government office called "Leadership of German Poetry" (Deutsche Dichtungs-führung), one would take it for rather sardonic raillery. But the thing actually exists. Goebbels, the commander-in-chief of the commandos of poetry, referred to his department as the "Poetry Leadership" several times in a long speech he delivered on October 11 before a German poets' meeting in Weimar, the city of Goethe.

There the assembled gentlemen of the pen heard once more what the chief demanded of them and what he censured in them. It developed that he was rather dissatisfied. And why? His reasons remind us of a phenomenon which has great significance for this column.

The trouble starts from the fact that the Herren Authors persistently fail to choose for their books the material which they should choose. Of course they cannot write what is forbidden; but most of them do not write what is wanted. They deny their "link with the present." They have no feeling for the times. To put it more plainly: they choose material which is not connected with the war, the Führer, or National Socialism.

And that is not all. Not only do authors refuse to use 100 per cent Nazi subject matter; they are apathetic toward other themes which the regime would like to have written about. For example, "a large group of subjects stemming out of such present-day German realities as the state or the worker receive only perfunctory treatment." Further, not enough industry is displayed in writing the popular books which the regime demands. "Many of you seem to have the idea that it is beneath your dignity, and not your mission, to write light, exciting books. I should like to say that in the National Socialist state every cultural task acquires worth if it finds favor with the people."

Writers form only one group in the great class of the intelligentsia, and it is even more interesting to observe that Goebbels attacked the apathy and stubbornness of the whole class. Using that defensive tone which of late dominates his speeches, he insisted that the Nazi regime is in principle not hostile to intelligence. "I consider this an opportunity to put a stop to a widespread error which threatens to alarm unnecessarily a certain part of our intelligentsia and to prevent them from giving their unconditional cooperation. It is the practice of National Socialism to keep a certain type of intellectualism under sharp observation, to subject it to biting public criticism. As a result, some honorable and entirely well-intentioned persons have felt themselves attacked when they were not meant at all."

But although Herr Goebbels swore he had nothing against intellectuals as such, he flayed a whole stratum of them as indifferent, skeptical, decadent. And he asserted further that these formed the great majority of moderate intellectuals. The average member of the intelligentsia, in his presentation, is the enemy. "It would be a national misfortune for our people," he said, "if this type of person, with his persistent doubts, were able to poison public opinion. . . . No worse perversity of the human spirit can be imagined. He must be unmasked and exposed to public contempt."

The long and the short of it is that a considerable part of the German intelligentsia forms a disturbing element for the Nazis. They refuse to write the right books, they cooperate only with "reservations"; their "persistent doubts" have a poisonous effect. Anyone acquainted with conditions has known this for a long time. It is clear that the intelligentsia provides the best leverage for lifting the Reich off its hinges.

Where Did They Go?

THE news that an Italian Alpine regiment had mutinied at Gorizia in northern Italy when it was ordered to the Russian front was hailed all over the world as a sign of Italian internal disintegration. But since the news was sent from London by Reuters, the Italian Propaganda Ministry found it easy to deny. More difficult to deny will be their own figures. The Italian High Command's report of casualties for the month of September officially announces total casualties as 13,936. Of these, 1,873 were killed, 5,431 wounded, and 5,632 missing. Further the communiqué specifies that the greatest casualties were on the Russian front; it gives them as 1,054 killed and 4,121 wounded, failing here to mention the missing. Why were they not numbered? Where did they go? The Reuters dispatch gives us a hint. On the Russian front "missing" might well mean "mutinied," and troops that refuse to fight or go over to the enemy are not included in the casualty figures.

Faced with this opposition the British government put an end to intervention.

There are many things to note about this first proof of solidarity between the British and Russian workers. First, no sympathy was shown with the tactics of the Russian government; yet the British labor movement explicitly recognized that the Soviet Union was a workers' state. A detailed account of the proceedings would show that the conventional leftist summary does not describe it properly. It is true that action was first demanded on the Clydebank and in South Wales, the two strongholds of revolutionary leftism in Britain. It is undeniable, also, that this early demand was resisted by the right-wing Executive. Nevertheless, to say that the left won the masses over to a vigorous policy of class struggle that was, in the last analysis, consistent only with a Communist philosophy would be to blunder very badly. For a considerable time before the August, 1920, showdown the vigor and enthusiasm of what is normally called the right wing had matched that of the left. The general strike was demanded by men who, ready enough to "revolt" if that became necessary, would never have instituted a regime of the Russian kind.

Second, long before August, 1920, the shrewdest labor leaders, whether they belonged to right, left, or center, understood that the British government's war on the Soviets was aimed at the whole Socialist and trade-union movement. The demand for action, however, only became unanimous when the question was unmistakably proved to be one of actual war or peace.

A last observation, on a fundamental point: one must note that sense of autonomy or "prerogative" which underlay the British labor movement's thought during this crisis. The reactionary press never made a greater blunder than to accuse trade unionists of threatening to strike on Russian orders. The British movement felt itself to be a brother of the Russian, but not a child or a pupil. It has never felt that, and it never will. And just as the political and industrial arms alike regard themselves as the British movement, so, through thick and thin, has British labor regarded the Russian government as the instrument of the Russian movement. I want to make this perfectly clear. I was for many years the only left-wing official of one of the largest branches of the British National Union of Railwaymen. Throughout the innumerable political debates in that branch meeting-hall, in which I was invariably in a minority of two or three, I do not remember hearing anyone raise doubts as to whether the U. S. S. R. was an authentic workers' state. As time went on, certain developments in Russia displeased more and more Englishmen, but they never destroyed the profound if sometimes vague sense of legitimacy which has attached itself to the Soviet Union from the beginning to the present day.

The British labor movement's consciousness of its prerogative is of great importance. It owes its existence to the tremendously significant fact that there is only one British working-class party of any size. Within the Labor Party the widest differences of opinion constantly give rise to debate, but the sharpest controversy has never been permitted to split the party. And when, as over the Popular Front issue, local breakaways have occurred, the splinters have returned to the national party before very long. Similarly, there has never been more than one great trade-union federation, the Trades Union Congress, within which the industrial and craft unions affiliated to the Labor Party exist side by side.

Though British Labor's attitude toward the Soviet Union remained at bottom the same, in later years the warmth and naturalness went out of it. The tactics of the Communist Party of Great Britain had much to do with this estrangement, certainly more than the rightward drift of the labor movement after the general strike in 1926. In its very first request for affiliation, dated August 10, 1920—during Labor's stirring defense of the U. S. S. R.—The Communist Party demanded to know whether "the Labor Party Executive decisively and categorically rejects the dictatorship of the proletariat." It is in the light of this question that the average British Labor Party member has always viewed the problem from that day to this. For that reason he has always rejected Communist affiliation.

On the other hand, the Communists have since vehemently asserted that the "dictatorship of the proletariat" was not in debate, that their intention was only to work within the party for a vigorous working-class program of action, a program which they were often able to devise and which was usually lacking in the major party. Whatever may have been the truth, a resolution proposing their inclusion was voted down for the first time in 1921, and for the last in 1942. It has so frequently been asserted that this rejection was the work of a reactionary trade-union leadership that it is worth while to recall one extraordinarily significant fact. It is that in the very years when the Labor Party was devising the most stringent rulings against the Communists, the British T. U. C., under its official leaders, was making persistent efforts not only to establish good relations with the Russian unions but to gain entry for the Russians into the International Federation of Trade Unions. Yet, broadly speaking, the British unions and the Labor Party were dominated by the same people. It was the October, 1924, convention of the Labor Party which most clearly defined and decided the Communist question. But in that year the Hull T. U. C., after giving a warm welcome to the Soviets' fraternal delegate, authorized a British delegation, headed by its highest officials, to attend the Sixth All-Russian Trade Union Congress in Moscow. On November 17, 1924, in Moscow, the Russian presidium and the president and secretary of the British General Council signed a joint declaration pledging both movements to work for international unity. Next year saw these phenomena repeated. The Liverpool convention of the party took fresh and more stringent action against the Communists, while the Scarborough T. U. C. unanimously agreed to persevere in seeking Russian admission to the I. F. T. U. in the face of bitter Continental opposition. All this was long before the general strike had deflected the movement to the right.

After the general strike the controversy was constantly refought in a mood of ever-increasing bitterness. I do not think that anyone who had intimate contact with the British movement at that time can possibly doubt that it was this infuriating, never-settled debate which gradually reduced the average party member's sympathy with the Soviet Union. Rightly or wrongly he felt that the government of the U. S. S. R. approved the Communist Party's tactics.

How disastrous this tendency was can now be seen. When, after the rise of Hitler, the Comintern reversed its immediate policy and strove to create those united or popular fronts which were the corollary of the Soviets' effort to further collective security, the British Labor Party would have no part of it. Somewhat tardily the party recognized the need for an Anglo-Soviet rapprochement, but it did not understand that only a united front with all other working-class and popular organizations, as well as with the Liberal Party, could drive Chamberlain toward such a course. The fault lay by no means exclusively with the Communists, although their past tactics would probably have been sufficient to earn rejection for the proposal. By the time popular pressure had compelled Chamberlain to abandon appeasement, the U. S. S. R. had gone another way.

IV

Yet even through the darks days of Soviet appeasement there was no fundamental change of attitude toward the U. S. S. R. The organized British workers rejected the suicidal advice of the Comintern, but were on guard against any attempt to "switch the war" against the Soviets. While the danger of such a switch has been absurdly exaggerated, during the Russo-Finnish war Sir Walter Citrine, president of the I. F. T. U. and an old opponent of the Communists, thought it wise to warn the Chamberlain government that the movement would resist any attempt to make war on the U. S. S. R. It was not merely that the Labor Party rejected the philosophy of such men as Wilfred Wellock, who within the socialist movement argued that Bolshevism and Nazism were two routes for arriving at the same goal. There was still a belief that the Soviet government, despite all changes, was a workers' and a socialist government.

Above all, the party realized that Nazism was the only real external enemy of labor's cause.

Then, with Hitler's attack on the Soviet Union, the socialist sympathy dormant within the labor movement rapidly awakened. It has been said that the popularity of the U. S. S. R. in Britain is due simply to a beleaguered and frustrated people's admiration for a great fighter. The great measure of truth in this is still short of being the whole truth. This fraternity in combat has, indeed, given strength to a second-front movement which is able to challenge and defeat governmental candidates in local elections, though it gets its backing neither from the Labor Party nor from the Communists. I refer to the "Second Front Now" campaign sponsored by Lord Beaverbrook in his Daily Express—as odd a phenomenon as if the New York Daily News were suddenly to break into a headlong pro-Soviet rampage. The Communist Party has put on considerable weight and is waging a campaign for increased production, which is undoubtedly of great service. But very few Britons have taken Soviet military toughness as proof of the soundness of the Communist political line.

On the question of Communist affiliation this year's Labor Party convention had nothing new to say. By a majority of thirteen thousand votes in two million, the party registered a civil-liberties decision by calling for an end to the ban on the Daily Worker, but against the old affiliation plea a majority of two million was piled up. However, people who would make this a test of sympathy with the Soviets completely mistake the point. Labor's recognition of Soviet successes has never taken the form of rallying behind the British Communists. Enthusiasm for some achievement of the Soviets, on the contrary, almost invariably encourages a British Labor man in his support of his own party. Every burst of enthusiasm for the Soviets also tends to move the Labor Party itself toward the left, its own left. This year's Labor Party conference was no exception. The observed leftward swing was doubtless due in great measure to Mr. Churchill's reluctance to talk about real reform. The sequence of military defeats had something to do with it also. But speeches from the platform as well as from the floor suggested that admiration for the Soviets' resistance was another incentive. Moreover, while the Soviets are immensely popular far outside the workers' movement, only the Labor Party as yet has expressed itself politically. Within the party and within the trade unions the new enthusiasm has had definite political results. The rapid war-time growth of the British unions and the rising temper of the political wing make it important briefly to review these developments.

V

When Hitler marched into Russia, the Labor Party at once greeted the Soviet Union. The T. U. C. Executive itself was not far behind in reviving the old Anglo-Soviet Trade Union Committee, the first war-time session of which was held in Moscow on October 13, 14, and 15, 1941. The British delegation, headed by the anti-Communist Citrine, included no member so far to the left as Tanner, the president of the Amalgamated Engineers and the most effective pro-Soviet non-Communist. More important than the eight-point agreement reached was the British invitation, in which Mr. Churchill had cordially concurred, to the Russian unions to send a delegation to England. None of the articles of the October agreement, unfortunately, expressly refer to the post-war period. The most interesting of them is the seventh, which pledges the two trade-union groups to the task of organizing mutual assistance. This is a text that may cover very much or very little solid ground. Exactly what it does mean will be decided by European developments in general. Attempts have been made to minimize the importance of the Soviet delegation's visit to England. Every account reaching me is emphatic that the Russian unionists' tour was a real source of encouragement to the British worker. Both the government and the T. U. C. had hoped that the visit would give a strong fillip to production. And there is no doubt that it did.

The Soviet delegates made no explicit political comments except to repeat strictures on management which the British unions had themselves already made time and time again. In one case, however, Shvernick, the leader of the Russian delegation, seems to have attempted to check unreasonable criticism of a management. In another case he said that the induction of women into industry was proceeding at too slow a pace, despite governmental orders, adding that it was more important to carry out these orders than to obtain an increased workers' share in management. The instructed observer will see in this a criticism of international and local trade-union leadership. At Liverpool, Leeds, Birmingham, and other industrial cities the Russians addressed important trade-union conferences and in some places took part in business meetings of the shop stewards. The T. U. C. significantly took advantage of the furor—that is the only word to describe the British response to the visit of the Russian delegation—to open a new drive for increased worker participation in management.

VI

Harry Pollitt, the real leader of the British Communist Party, writing in the January number of the Communist Labor Monthly, argued somewhat revealingly that the 1941 Anglo-Soviet treaty had made possible a new labor unity. At the June convention of the Labor Party the floor gave a tremendous ovation to the platform when it was announced that the party leadership intended to ask the Soviet government to receive a Labor Party delegation with a view to establishing full and permanent relations between the Russian and British political movements. This, incidentally, was very much more than a British move, for at the present time many past presidents and executives of the Second International are living in London. These men, as well as former trade-union officials of the United Nations, were consulted before the approach to Moscow was made, and their warm approval was given to it.

There is no reason for naivete. The kind of unity Harry Pollitt had in mind, the immediate affiliation of the British Communist Party to the Labor Party, was not intended to be furthered by this approach to Moscow. It was the larger view of Europe as a whole which moved the Labor leadership, and this was understood by the convention floor. The Labor Party was unmistakably expressing its belief that the two Internationals must draw together, for it was clearly not the Soviet government as such but the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and, behind that party, the Comintern which the Labor Party wished to meet. In thus going to what it believed to be the source of all authority in the Comintern, the Labor Party at least brought into contact the only two remaining working-class parties of any size in Europe.

It is probable, however, that a shrewd mental calculation had been made, not dissimilar to the one that seems implicit in Harry Pollitt's argument. If the Anglo-Soviet treaty of 1941, which did not promise a long-enduring post-war collaboration between the two powers, could have that effect, then the treaty of 1942, with its vision of twenty years' partnership, ought to have a greater result. The Labor Party knows that the policy of the C. P. G. B. is largely determined by the Soviets' international position. It is more than probable, therefore, that Labor thought that the Russian leaders might soon be inclined to recognize the British Labor Party as the British movement. The British party cannot fail to have noticed that the Comintern has not followed a strictly revolutionary policy for many years now. It is not easy to avoid polemics at this point, but it would seem that while the Communists have always kept revolutionary intentions at the back of their heads, the Comintern's direction has been increasingly concerned with Soviet defense rather than with preparing for eventual insurrection. British Labor perhaps thought that the Soviet party might be willing to make contacts with the massive and disciplined British movement upon the basis of recognition of prerogatives. Did the Labor Party also calculate that in accepting this much more effective defense against whatever opposition might arise in the post-war world, the Soviet party might advise the British and the European Communist parties to follow what could be called a Popular Front line? If this should come about, what consequences might it have?

This must be noted. The immediate policy of the British Communists today is perfectly assimilable by any organization as broad as the British Labor Party. To be exact, the C. P. G. B., if admitted to the Labor Party, would now constitute its right rather than its left wing. In the post-war world it will almost certainly move to the left again; but as long as the U. S. S. R. enjoyed good external relations, an affiliated Communist Party would not openly violate the constitution of the movement or go contrary to its spirit.

Would a long-term association of the U. S. S. R. and the United Kingdom so mold the two parties that they might work together in this way? And if so, what would be the effect on the European labor movement? These are questions I prefer to raise rather than to answer. Both parties must be molded. From a narrow right-wing standpoint one might ask, Why should the Labor Party make concessions? Many answers could be given, but they are all accessory to one powerful argument. To move leftward is not a concession but a sheer necessity if the party is to be reinvigorated. To be in earnest about socialism is not a concession. The old hesitancy will insure defeats in the post-war world similar in kind and ultimately as grave in consequence as those of the pre-war epoch. To effect such a reinvigoration it may be necessary to reduce the power of the trade-union delegates to the party convention. Yet if the party sets out to win the British masses, even that may be unnecessary. Moreover, it is now reasonably certain that the cessation of war will see an immediate upsurge of desire for reform. Not even the diehards of the Labor right wing can wholly resist that tide. In any case, one notes with a certain grim relief, the Old Guard will be dying off very shortly.

For my part, I believe that if the Communist Party persists in demanding affiliation in an atmosphere such as may be created in the next few years, it will probably gain it. And provided this demand leads to a constitutional debate about a legitimate leftism, the gain will be enormous.

With the problem solved in Britain and with consequent security for the U. S. S. R., the sad disasters of the European movements might be undone. The development would not run counter to the history of revolutions. The French Revolution itself, opposed by Britain, nevertheless had great and good consequences for English political life. I confess, with Alvarez del Vayo, a total disbelief in the "wisdom" of the old diplomacy. The problems he raised in The Nation can only be solved by the people themselves, by their relentless pressure for a new social order. The people, however, cannot do this without parties. The parties exist; they need invigoration. But without unity they will not, over the whole field of Europe, find new life. A unified labor movement, on its political as well as its industrial side, is an absolute essential.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

A Tax Victory for Business

THE least-publicized feature of the 1942 tax law, signed by the President on October 21, is the comparative lightness of the new burden which it imposes on corporation profits. In his recommendations to Congress on March 3 Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau asked for total tax increases of $7.6 billion, of which $3.2 billion would be derived from additional levies on corporations. The tax bill in its completed form achieved the goal originally set by the Treasury, but the contribution of business had been whittled down to about half.

This result must be considered a striking victory for the corporations, since the tax law actually comes close to fulfilling their fondest hopes. Last March, at the hearings of the House Ways and Means Committee, a representative of the National Association of Manufacturers put forward proposals which would have meant an increase in corporation income and excess-profits taxes of about $1.4 billion. This has proved a shot remarkably near the bull's-eye, for it is estimated that the increase in these levies provided by the new law will produce about $1.5 billion. As the Wall Street Journal says with engaging candor, "More concern for business was shown in this bill than in any other recent tax measure. . . . The new rates are high, but they are not nearly as high as the levels which were considered and discarded."

The following table illustrates this statement and shows how at each stage of the tax bill's progress through Congress the corporate load was lightened:

	1941 law	Treasury proposals	House version	Bill as enacted
Combined normal and sur- tax on corporations with incomes over $25,000	31	55	45	40
Excess-profits tax	35-60	50-75	90	90*
Additional revenue from corporate taxes		$3.2	$2.64	$1.5

* With a 10 per cent post-war credit and a tax ceiling of 80 per cent of total earnings.

This table, however, does not by itself tell the whole story or explain the 100 per cent difference in yield between the Treasury proposals and the rates approved by Congress. The secret lies in a mass of relief provisions which have something for almost every corporate somebody. Utility companies, for instance, benefit by a surtax deduction for dividends paid on preferred stocks which it is estimated will be worth $18,000,000 annually to them. All corporations stand to gain from permission to buy up their own bonds at less than par without incurring a tax liability. This relief is especially significant for the railroads, which will be encouraged to use their bonanza war profits to cut down their mountainous indebtedness.

Another section of the law is designed to foster the mining of strategic metals by exempting from excess-profits taxes all earnings derived from the production of antimony, manganese, tin, and other scarce minerals. Lumber mills and coal and iron mines are also to receive a rebate on earnings resulting from an increase in output over the 1936-39 average. Provisions of this nature are perhaps justified as war-time incentives, but the same argument can hardly be used in favor of maintaining depletion allowances for oil and other extractive industries at rates which have no relation to actually realized depletion. As Senator Robert La Follette, who strenuously but unsuccessfully supported the Treasury's recommendation of a revision in these allowances, revealed in the Progressive of October 12, "Tax returns filed by 78 oil companies for the year 1941 show total deductions of percentage depletion amounting to $30,600,000, while on their own books they acknowledged the actual depletion suffered aggregated only $6,100,000." The continued embodiment in the tax structure of special privileges of this nature is a tribute to the strength of the big-business lobbies but hardly to that of Congressional character.

In setting the excess-profits rate as high as 90 per cent, Congress appears to have outdone the Treasury in severity. But many corporations, especially those with an inflated capital structure, like the big steel companies, were delighted to exchange a punishing excess-profits rate for lower normal taxes and surtaxes. Moreover, the new law provides numerous offsets. The limitation of any company's combined income and excess-profits tax to 80 per cent of net earnings will enable some of the war babies—operating largely on capital provided directly or indirectly by the government—to make for their shareholders a very handsome return indeed on money actually invested. Those businesses, on the other hand, which have been hit by the curtailment of civilian production have been taken care of by provisions enabling them (a) to carry back losses incurred this year against 1941 taxable income; (b) to apply any excess-tax credit unused this year against last year's excess-profits payments. These relief provisions will result in some sizable refunds.

As a result of all this generosity, a good many corporate earnings statements for 1942 are going to show a much rosier state of affairs for stockholders than reports for the first three-quarters would indicate. Most companies, partly as a matter of prudent accounting, partly with the idea that a display of poverty was good policy while Congress was mulling over the tax bill, reported quarterly profits after making reserves for taxes based on the Treasury proposals. Now they will be able to write back substantial amounts out of these reserves, which thanks to Congress have proved unnecessarily high. Under the circumstances the recent bullishness of stocks hardly requires explanation.

CLARE BOOTHE LUCE was recently informed that one of her close associates in the Republican Party in Connecticut had once been decorated by Mussolini. "I know nothing," she wrote, "about Mr. Pallotti's receiving a decoration from Mussolini, nor what the time or the occasion may have been. There was a time, of course, when we all thought that Mussolini was doing a good job. That was before he became a partner in the Axis."

FROM AN ARTICLE on government press agents in the New Republic: "Pearl Harbor caught the United States with no clear-cut information policy. George Creel maintains that he did the job quicker, better, and cheaper."

THE DECLINE of the millionaires was the subject of a recent article in the New York World-Telegram: "Mr. and Mrs. Harrison Williams," the paragraph ran, "have closed four of their five homes, put their eight cars in storage, reduced the number of their household servants from twenty-five to ten, and shut off all except two floors of the thirty-room pink colonial brick mansion at 1130 Fifth Avenue where they now live. Millionaires are on the skids."

THE HOBO WAR LEAGUE, recently founded by the Hobo News, is starting an intensive campaign to encourage its members to fill the places of drafted farm workers. "Turn 'the bum factory' into a producing factory," is one of the league's slogans. Another is, "For Victory let us buy bonds to buy bombs to bomb the Axis bums."

THE MURDER of a war worker who had recently been involved in a felonious-assault case and because of that had lost his job was reported in the New York World-Telegram of October 19. The man's nickname, according to the story, was Red. But the headline said: "Aircraft Plant Fired Astoria Welder, Known as a Red."

A RECENT ISSUE of the Wall Street Journal reported the lengths to which employers of domestic help have gone in trying to keep their servants: "A United States employment office in Connecticut, for instance, has felt their pressure. Women protested directly to the office against factory placements, worked indirectly through their husbands. In Mississippi the government thinks it may lose a teapot battle against a group of women who don't want their help leaving for a war plant. The battle there reportedly proceeds more openly, with the well-to-do white women telling the working white women that they will get no jobs in the war factory if the colored women do."

POE AS A LITERARY CRITIC

BY EDMUND WILSON

POE, at the time of his death in 1849, had had the intention of publishing a book on "The Authors of America in Prose and Verse." He had already worked over to a considerable extent the material of his articles and reviews; and the collection of critical writing printed by Griswold after his death is something between a journalistic chronicle like Bernard Shaw's dramatic notices and a selected and concentrated volume like Eliot's "The Sacred Grove."

Poe as a critic has points of resemblance both with Eliot and with Shaw. He deals vigorously and boldly with books as they come into his hands day by day, as Shaw did with the plays of the season, and manages to be brilliant and arresting even about works of no interest; he constantly insists, as Eliot does, on attempting, in the practice of this journalism, to formulate general principles. His literary articles and lectures, in fact, surely constitute the most remarkable body of criticism ever produced in the United States.

Henry James called it "probably the most complete and exquisite specimen of provincialism ever prepared for the edification of men." But though Poe had his share of provincialism, as all American writers did in that period, the thing that most strikes us today is his success in holding himself above it. Intellectually he stands on higher ground than any other American writer of his time. He is trying to curb the tendency of the Americans to overrate or overpraise their own books, and at the same time he is fighting a rear-guard action against the over-inflation of British reputations and the British injustice to American writers; and he has also a third battle: to break down the monopolistic instincts of the New Englanders, who tended to act as a clique and to keep out New Yorkers and Southerners. On one plane Poe grapples realistically with the practical problems of writers in the United States of that time—the copyright situation and the growth of the American magazines, with their influence on literary technique; and on another plane he is able to take in the large developments of Western literature.

With his general interest in method, he has definite ideas about the procedures in a variety of departments of literature—fiction, poetry, satire, travel, criticism. And he can be elevated, ironic, analytical, as the subject in hand requires. His prose is as taut as in his stories, but it has cast off the imagery of his fiction to become simply sharp and precise—our only first-rate classical prose of this period. His mind is a livid but incandescent shaft that is leveled at the successive objects in the American literary landscape like the searchlight on the Albany night boat that picks out the houses along the Hudson; and as there we are induced to stare at even undistinguished places which have been plucked out of the darkness into a spectral intensity of relief, so here we must read even the essays on insignificant figures whose dead features the critic makes radiant even while he is speeding them to oblivion. When we have put the whole picture together, we see it as clearly—to change the figure—as the geography of a landscape on the moon under an unattainably powerful telescope. There is no other such picture in our literature.

But Poe had tweaked the beard of Longfellow and had made people laugh at a Channing, and the lurking rancor of New England seems to have worked against the acceptance of his criticism. There is an anecdote in W. D. Howells's book, "Literary Friends and Acquaintance," which shows both the attitude of New England and the influence of this attitude on others. Howells had visited Boston for the first time when he was twenty-three, and he had gone to see Emerson in Concord. Poe had been dead ten years.

After dinner [says Howells] we walked about in [Emerson's] "pleached garden" a little, and then we came again into his library, where I meant to linger only till I could fitly get away. He questioned me about what I had seen of Concord, and whom besides Hawthorne I had met, and when I told him only Thoreau, he asked me if I knew the poems of Mr. William Ellery Channing. I have known them since, and felt their quality, which I have gladly owned a genuine and original poetry; but I answered then truly that I knew them only from Poe's criticisms: cruel and spiteful things which I should be ashamed of enjoying as I once did. "Whose criticisms?" asked Emerson. "Poe's," I said again. "Oh," he cried out, after a moment, as if he had returned from a far search for my meaning, "you mean the jingle-man."* I do not know why this should have put me to such confusion, but if I had written the criticisms myself I do not think I could have been more abashed. Perhaps I felt an edge of reproof, of admonition, in a characterization of Poe which the world will hardly agree with; though I do not agree with the world about him, myself, in its admiration. At any rate, it made an end of me for the time, and I remained as if already absent, while Emerson questioned me as to what I had written in the Atlantic Monthly.

That Emerson's opinion of Channing was not so very different from Poe's is shown by an entry in his journal for 1855:

Ellery Channing's poetry has the merit of being genuine, and not the metrical commonplaces of the magazines, but it is painfully incomplete. He has not kept faith with the reader; 'tis shamefully insolent and slovenly. He should have lain awake all night to find the true rhyme for a verse, and he has availed himself of the first one that came; so that it is all a babyish incompleteness.

* It is true that Poe had not much admired Emerson and had been rather insulting about him in A Chapter on Autography.

The prejudice of New England against Poe was supported by the bad reputation that had been given him by Griswold's mendacious memoir. It was not so long ago that it was possible for President Hadley of Yale to explain the refusal of the Hall of Fame to admit Poe among its immortals on the ground that he "wrote like a drunkard and a man who is not accustomed to pay his debts"; and it was only last year that Professor A. H. Quinn showed the lengths to which Griswold had gone by producing the originals of Poe's letters and printing them side by side with Griswold's falsifications.

We have often been told of Poe's criticism that it is spiteful, that it is pretentious, that it is vitiated by Poe's acceptance of the sentimental bad taste of his time. In regard to the first two of these charges it must be admitted that these essays give us unpleasant moments; they do have their queer knots and wrinkles; they are neurotic as all Poe's work is neurotic; and the distortions do here sometimes throw us off as they do not do in the stories, because it is here a question of judgment, whereas in his fiction the distortion itself is the subject of the story. It is true, as Joseph Wood Krutch has said, that there is constantly felt in Poe's criticism the same element of obsessive cruelty that inspires his tales of horror. Yet in his criticism Poe does try to hold this in check—with an occasional effect of inconsistency, in judgment as well as in tone, as when he will begin by telling us that certain passages in some book he is reviewing are among the best things of their kind to be found in contemporary writing, and then go on to pick the poet to pieces slowly, coldly, and at a length of many pages. It is also true that Poe pretends sometimes, or at least sometimes lets us infer, that he has read things he has not read. The psychology of the pretender is always a factor to be reckoned with in Poe.

The child of a fascinating actress who had died when he was two years old, he had been adopted by a Scotch merchant in Richmond, brought up as a Southern gentleman, and then cast off with no job and no money at the end of his first year of college, during which his adoptive father had failed to pay even his necessary expenses, so that he could associate, as he said, "with no students except those who were in a similar situation with myself." Poe had always been in the false situation of not being Allan's son and of knowing that in the society he was bred to his parents had been déclassés; and now he was suddenly deprived of his role of a well-heeled young Southern gentleman with prospects of inheriting a fortune, and found himself a poor man with no backing who had to survive in the American Grub Street. He had the confidence of faith in superior abilities, and the reports of his work at his English school and at the University of Virginia show that he excelled as a student. But his studies had been aborted at the same time as his social career, and a shade of the uncertainty of the "gentleman" was communicated also to the "scholar." Perhaps, also, though Poe's mind was a first-rate one, there was in him a dash of the actor who delights in elaborating a part.

Out of this consciousness of being a pretender, at any rate, with its infliction of a habitual secretiveness, came certainly Poe's love of cryptograms, his interest in inventing and solving crimes, and his indulgence in concocting and exposing hoaxes. If Poe sometimes plays unavowed tricks by cheating the reader a little about what he has written or read, the imposture is still almost as gratuitous, as innocent, and as unimportant as Stendhal's disguises and aliases and his weakness for taking ladies from the provinces through Paris and misinforming them about the public monuments. And with this we must also write off Poe's rather annoying mania of accusing his contemporaries of plagiarism—a harsh name he is in the habit of brandishing to indicate borrowings and echoes of a kind which, whether more or less abject, is usually perfectly harmless. Poe himself was certainly guilty—in his imitation of Chivers, for example—of borrowings equally harmless. But these, too, touched off the pretender.

As for the charge of Poe's acquiescence in the mawkish bad taste of his period, it is deserved to only a slight degree. He more often ran counter to this taste, as when he came down on Fitz-Greene Halleck; and, for the rest, his excessive enthusiasm for poets like Mrs. Osgood is attributable to the same sort of causes as, say, the praises of Bernard Shaw for the plays of Henry Arthur Jones: the writer who is potentially a master sees in the inferior writer a reflection of the kind of thing that he wants to do himself, but the possibilities of which will hardly be plain to anyone else till the master himself has made them actual.

We must recognize these warpings of Poe's line; but we must not allow them as serious impugnments of the validity of his critical work. His reading was wide and great, and his culture was derived from a plane of the world of thought and art which had hardly been visited by Longfellow with his patient persistent transposition of the poetry of many lands and ages into terms of his own insipidity or by Lowell with his awful cosy titles for his collections of literary essays: "My Study Windows" and "Among My Books." The truth is that literary America has always resented in Poe the very superiority which made him so quickly an international figure.

He may have been a difficult person, though certain people seem to have got on very well with him; but it seems hard to explain the virulence with which Griswold pursued him after his death and the general hostility toward him which has haunted us ever since, except on the ground that he puts us out by making so much of our culture seem second-rate. In our childhood we read "The Gold Bug" and "The Murders in the Rue Morgue," and everybody knows "Annabel Lee" and "Ulalume" and "The Bells" and "The Raven"; but Poe is not, as he is with the French and as he ought to be with us, a vital part of our intellectual equipment. It is rare that an American writer points out, as Waldo Frank once did, that Poe belongs not with the clever contrivers of fiction like O. Henry and S. S. Van Dine but, in terms of his constricted personality, with the great inquiring and versatile minds like Goethe. So that it is still worth while to insist on his value.

In the darkness of his solitary confinement Poe is still a prince.

Power and Freedom

THE FUTURE OF INDUSTRIAL MAN. By Peter F. Drucker. The John Day Company. $2.50.

DRUCKER'S "End of Economic Man" was by far the most profound study of the dynamics of Nazism we have had and a very convincing refutation of purely economic theories of social motivation. It revealed its author's original mind in the field of social analysis and philosophy. There are many evidences of the same originality in Drucker's new volume on "The Future of Industrial Man." But the conclusions at which he arrives are not always convincing, and some of his most striking insights are not substantiated with sufficient historical evidence.

He is concerned in this new volume with the problem of achieving both a functioning and a free society within the conditions set by modern industrialism. The difficulties of our industrial society are attributed primarily to the rise of an irresponsible oligarchy of managers whose "illegitimate" power is the consequence of the abdication of their responsibilities by the stockholders of corporations. The power of managers, he declares, is "in no way based upon a fundamental principle, accepted by society as a legitimate basis of power." He does not assume Burnham's fatalistic attitude toward this development, and he certainly does not regard managerial authority as adequate for the problems of an industrial age. But he does not show just why and how this "illegitimate" power, this managerial irresponsibility, has produced the evils of our age.

It is important to challenge the uncritical identification of economic power and ownership which liberal and Marxist theory has made. In actual fact the real power may be held by those who control, rather than own, the economic process. The failure to recognize this leads to the illusion that the socialization of all property will eliminate all inordinate disproportions of power and privilege in society, whereas it may actually produce a new oligarchy which combines the effective control of both economic and political power.

The recognition that ownership is not identical with power in the economic process may prevent some of the aberrations of the left. But it does not cure any of the maladjustments of society which must be attributed to the inordinate disproportions of power in the economic process, whether derived from ownership or managerial function. Nor is it safe to assume that the power of ownership is completely insignificant.

Drucker rightly regards large-scale unemployment as the most obvious manifestation of the failure of our society. "The most frightening thing about industrial unemployment in the past twenty years," he declares, "was that it persisted in periods of recovery and indeed of high prosperity." He thinks that it represents "not only economic catastrophe . . . but social disfranchisement." He stresses that economic security is no solution for this double evil, for unemployment benefits may give minimal security without insuring the unemployed worker of "social status and function." The Nazis, he observes, turned the unemployed into storm troopers and gave them social status and function. But their society is organized only for "war and conquest."

The distinction between economic function and social function is provisionally important, but if we ask how to give workers "social status and function" in a society not organized primarily for war, it will become apparent that social function must be related to economic function. The distinction is therefore not ultimately important. It is at any rate no valuable directive for the creation of a functioning society. Drucker's two fundamental insights in analyzing the problems of a functioning society are useful, but they are not so significant as he seems to believe.

The second portion of the volume is devoted to the problem of maintaining freedom in modern society. Here again he makes a valuable contribution, but he slightly overstates his case. His discussion of freedom centers in a very vigorous attack upon "rationalist liberals," who are "ultra-bold in theory and timid in action," who know what is right and just with greater certainty than any human knowledge deserves, but who cannot act because "they can neither compromise with power or fight for it." Their indecision, and the chaos created by their conflicting absolutes, invites totalitarianism. A Rousseau or a Marx emerges and transmutes a liberal ideal, such as equality, into an absolute for the sake of which he is ready to suppress all dissidence.

This analysis prompts Drucker to the equally convincing conclusion that a free society depends upon some humble recognition of the imperfection of all human viewpoints and of the corruption of interest in all political and party positions. From this recognition society must derive the desire and ambition to guarantee the free expression of all views, in the hope that commerce and competition among them will lead to more truth and justice than the monopoly of any supposedly absolutely true political creed.

The thesis, however, is slightly overstated and fails to do justice to the contribution of optimists to democratic theory. If the idea of human imperfection is stressed too consistently, it results in absolutist political theories, like those of Thomas Hobbes. For if all human points of view are merely the rationalization of interest, then society would be engulfed in the anarchy of conflicting interests and require the imposition of tyrannical authority, as Hobbes maintains.

Democracy rests partly upon the assumption that no political position can be absolutely right, but it also rests partly upon the assumption that there is sufficient coincidence between conflicting points of view to make an uncoerced commerce and competition between them possible and fruitful. Drucker hardly does justice to this second root of democratic theory and practice.

Season of Confusion

LINCOLN AND HIS PARTY IN THE SECESSION CRISIS. By David M. Potter. Yale University Press. $3.75.

LIKE all the seasons of doubt and confusion which precede great wars, the months between Lincoln's election and the bombardment of Fort Sumter contain much that is perplexing to students of a later day. The Republican leaders were entirely unprepared to meet the crisis of secession. With ambiguous and frequently inconsistent policies, they drifted blindly toward national disaster. Dr. Potter's study of the "secession winter" is a penetrating analysis of one of the most baffling periods in American history. A coherent and matured policy could not have been expected of the party which attained its first national success with Lincoln's election. Composed of dissentient factions, it was a minority party, trained in opposition but not in leadership. "The crisis . . . demanded that they produce a formula to save the Union . . . at a time when they had never borne the responsibility of appointing a postmaster."

A still greater obstacle to weathering the crisis was the Northern incredulity of the threat of secession. Because of a firm reliance on Southern feeling for the maintenance of the Union, the Republicans derided and ignored the growing movement for separation. Their complacent belief that secession was merely a temporary move in a political game persisted even after the Gulf States had withdrawn from the Union. Hence their refusal to compromise held no taint of conscienceless war-mongering—they were blandly unaware that war was the alternative.

Dr. Potter has high praise for William H. Seward's effectiveness in keeping the national authority unimpaired until the new Administration was installed. But he points out that, though Seward was active and Lincoln was silent, it was the enigmatic man in Springfield who assumed, from the very first, the control of his party. This was, in the opinion of the author, a questionable advantage, for he stigmatizes Lincoln's opposition to territorial compromise on slavery as the policy of a partisan leader. Lincoln had not yet attained the stature of great statesmanship; yet it seems severely critical to speak of his "consummate folly."

Whether or not the Civil War might have been avoided is a question which Dr. Potter refrains from answering. It is a question constantly posed by his material, and the author's declaration of opinion might have strengthened his book and resolved some of his estimates. But the material is excellently presented, and Dr. Potter's position as the sworn enemy of hindsight lends a freshness and illumination to the treatment.

Sea Warfare

A LAYMAN'S GUIDE TO NAVAL STRATEGY. By Bernard Brodie. Princeton University Press. $2.50.

IT IS no exaggeration to say that Dr. Brodie, a professor of political science at Dartmouth, has produced here one of the very best recent books in the military field. In his "Sea Power in the Machine Age," published a year ago, he showed fine and careful scholarship and distinct writing ability as well as a faculty for interpreting data. His more recent volume indicates complete knowledge of his field, high scholarship, and refreshing absence of bias. Both books are well worth reading.

An idea of the scope of this later work is given by the chapter headings—Sea Power in Modern War, The Tools of Sea Power, Command of the Sea, Defense of Shipping, Land-Sea Operations, Bases, Tactics of Fleet Action, The Men Behind the Guns, and, for a long chapter devoted to the airplane-warship controversy, Must All Our Ships Have Wings? All these subsidiary topics are well treated, but the two chapters dealing with the tools of sea power form the most accurate and complete discussion of the subject which this reviewer has seen. Although written in July when shipping losses were at their highest point, the chapter on Defense of Shipping predicted that these would shortly be brought down—a prediction which has since been fulfilled. That on tactics is somewhat theoretical, and some naval men might be inclined to question its conclusions.

In his discussion of the place of the airplane in sea war Dr. Brodie pays full respect to the accomplishments of the plane but holds that its place in naval war has been greatly exalted by its proponents. Bombing planes in particular, with abundant opportunities during more than three years of war, have not lived up to expectations. The author admits that the torpedo plane is the greatest menace the warship faces today, but he believes that the problem of protection will be solved as it was for countless inventions in the past which appeared to revolutionize sea power. This chapter should be read with Major de Seversky's recent book in mind. Reviewing much the same historical data as those considered by De Seversky, Professor Brodie reaches diametrically opposed conclusions. Because of American negligence and Japanese treachery he feels that Pearl Harbor does not invalidate sea power. And the fact that under the very nose of the Luftwaffe the British, operating without air support, were able to withdraw 47,000 out of 60,000 troops from Crete does not indicate its obsolescence. Losses of both merchant ships and warships due to planes have so far been only a small fraction of those for all causes. In short, while the airplane has greatly affected sea war, it has not destroyed the value of any kind of sea power, especially that of the battleship. Whether or not these conclusions are correct, they are worthy of consideration and offer a good antidote to those critics who see victory only in terms of air power.

"A Layman's Guide to Naval Strategy" has many virtues. It is erudite in its background, balanced in interpretation, and cogent in reasoning. Unlike many recent books it is not written to convert anyone. Its only major weakness lies in the amount of detail and the lack of colorful illustration. It is, frankly, a trifle over the head of the average layman and is more apt to be read by students of war than by the general public.

Klee as Archaic

PAUL KLEE: PAINTINGS, WATERCOLORS, 1913 TO 1939. Edited by Karl Nierendorf. Introduction by James Johnson Sweeney. Oxford University Press. $6.

A DISTINCTION of Berenson's may be recalled as one examines the art of Klee:

No art can hope to become classic that has not been archaic first. The distinction between archaistic imitation and archaic reconstruction, simple as it is, must be clearly borne in mind. An art that is merely adopting the ready-made models handed down from an earlier time is archaistic, while an art that is going through the process of learning to construct the figures and discover the attitudes required for the presentation of tactile values and movement is archaic. On the other hand, an art which has completed the process is classic.

Klee's art is authentic reconstruction, not so much of "tacit values" as of movement (now that the faddishness of Berenson's formula has passed, we may admit that it has become an element of every intelligent appreciation); but above movement, of imagery, and beyond imagery, of a visionary and intuitional immediacy that sustains the unprejudiced innocence of perception without sacrificing the crystallizing intensity and coherence of genuine analysis or the severely objectifying sensibility that enforces the analysis. This sensibility he integrated with both wit and intellect, and he brought the preconscious to utterance, not with the loose and exhibitionistic self-indulgence of most current surrealism or with the denatured rigor of the more absolute abstractionists, but with an acute delicacy of nervous definition that rightly makes him envied and yet independent of both those rival and, in most cases, logically self-exhausting and inconclusive schools. Whether it was the music and poetry mentioned by Mr. Nierendorf in his biographical sketch as major passions of Klee that bred his disdain of a too theoretical sterility, or whether—as is more likely—it was his native and vigorous wholeness of sensibility, there is no mistaking here the presence of an authority that touched the quick nerve of a purpose and intention, and so brought into modern art one of its severest and yet most humane inventors.

Mr. Sweeney's foreword is apologetic to the point of misinformation ("Klee's art is engagingly simple of approach") and of irrelevance ("Klee does not pretend to reproduce the visible world"), and it makes sales talk of the symbolic principle; but it is engagingly persuasive, and with these well-chosen plates should aid the two Museum of Modern Art exhibitions (1930 and 1941) in furthering in America the knowledge of one of the most remarkable of modern creative personalities, a rival in his field with Chirico, Picasso, Miro, and the better Ernst, an immediate corrective to the excesses of Dali and his followers, and a master of one of the most living lines, subtle surfaces, intense sensibilities, and exploring intelligences the art of our time has known.

The Nazis in Poland

THE BLACK BOOK OF POLAND. Issued by the Polish Ministry of Information. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

THE Polish Ministry of Information here assembles the detailed records of what surely is the most appalling attempt to obliterate a nation since the days of Genghis Khan. As these pages pile thousands of verified details one upon another, we lose all human sense of magnitude. Newspaper readers shudder when they read that a hundred persons have perished in a flood or an earthquake. They cannot shudder much more if the number is a thousand. When the record shows death, torture, exile, enslavement for hundreds of thousands, the imagination goes numb.

Here are accounts of tens of thousands shot as hostages or merely for the crime of being respected leaders of the people, of hundreds of thousands sent into virtual slavery as common laborers in foreign countries, of millions deported from their homes, often on a few hours' notice, and dumped into strange lands without prospect of livelihood. Here we read of systematic stealing of property ranging from household effects to business corporations and landed estates. We read of priests and professors selected for the concentration camp or the firing squad merely because of their patriotic opinions, of squads of young girls requisitioned for "required service" in German army brothels. We read details of cruelties practiced by German soldiers on the streets, in prisons, in private homes. And we read how, as the Poles are driven from the farms they own, Germans are systematically moved in, to take possession.

The catalogue of horror is endless. Make every conceivable allowance for the difficulty of obtaining attested statements for such a compilation as this, allow for the unreliability of rumor, for the patriotic impulse to represent stern military measures as atrocities, for the tendency of propagandists to estimate in large figures; still this book reveals the persecution of a great people carried out on a scale and with a systematic sadism previously unknown in modern times.

It is hopeless to attempt to summarize in limited space the multitude of forms which this persecution has taken. But let us try to obtain from these pages some outline of the crude logic and purpose behind it.

For there is a logic in it—a Nazi logic. It would seem that Hitler has two immediate objects: (1) to "Germanize" western Poland, with its predominantly Polish and Jewish population of ten million, the part incorporated into the Reich, by depriving all non-Germans of their property and then dumping them en masse into the "Government General" lying just east; and (2) to reduce the Polish and Jewish multitudes of this latter province to a permanent condition of hewers of wood and drawers of water for the German Herrenvolk—a subject race without culture or social leaders, without any save the most elementary education, without any civil rights save the obligation to serve their masters.

Is it possible to maintain such a slave economy under modern conditions? Undoubtedly it is physically possible for a long time, provided the armies of the Herrenvolk are always victorious. But there are indications, even in this necessarily vague account of German economy in conquered Poland, that the Polish soil does not now yield what it used to, that such factories as are permitted to remain do not produce up to normal—in short, that slave economy is distinctly not a going concern in Poland.

This "Black Book of Poland" does not attempt any record of the lot of the inhabitants of those parts of Poland which were for nearly two years, in 1939-41, under Soviet rule. From all we know, hard as their life may have been under crisis conditions, the Soviet government has never discriminated between Poles and Jews and others of its citizens. If the Polish Government-in-Exile possesses factual information as to the condition of the Polish population that was "conquered" by its present ally, Russia, it seems regrettable that it did not incorporate such information in this book.

And why on earth does the Polish Information Bureau forbid the reproduction of any parts of its record "in any form without permission"?

HIRAM MOTHERWELL

IN BRIEF

EAST OF FAREWELL. By Howard Hunt. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

An absorbing novel by a twenty-four-year-old ensign about life on a United States destroyer—a book about this war written by someone who has actually fought in it, and the kind of book that in the last war was not written until the war was over. Mr. Hunt has no doubts that the fight must be fought and won, but like the officers who are the chief actors in his drama, he isn't trying to convince either himself or anyone else that to convoy a group of freighters through submarine-infested waters is a romantic pastime. The men are bored, dispirited, short-tempered, and at odds with each other; they don't have the right kind of food or enough sleep, they suffer from extremes of heat and cold; even the boat itself isn't all it should be. There is a literalness, almost a simple-mindedness, in the narrative that seems to vouch for its authenticity as reporting—the automatic way in which, even as a novelist, Mr. Hunt separates his officer world from his world of enlisted seamen; or the uneditorialized report of the officers' attitude toward their colored servants. Yet when the destroyer finally does engage the enemy, every man does his job beautifully and bravely: victory is the only glamour. That a realistic novel of this kind can be written and published at the beginning of a war is surely a high compliment to our peculiar much-to-be-cherished brand of American morale.

THE BEST AMERICAN SHORT STORIES, 1942. Edited by Martha Foley. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.75.

Mixture as before, put together this time by Martha Foley instead of the late Edward J. O'Brien, representing everything from the Saturday Evening Post to the small quarterlies. Most of the selections are unimpressive, but there is a beautifully talented story by Nelson Algren, Biceps, from the Southern Review and a nice piece, Those Are as Brothers, by Nancy Hale, from Mademoiselle. The New Yorker representation, despite Miss Foley's prefatory salute, is well beneath the best of that magazine: the Bemelmans selection, The Valet of the Splendide, is surely that fine writer at his least happy, and the Sally Benson story, one of her Kensington reminiscences, is the New Yorker at its limpest. Thurber is represented by an over-the-shoulder baseball yarn from the Saturday Evening Post and Steinbeck by a mild but pleasant sketch, from Harper's, about how a little girl named Edith McGillcuddy met R. L. Stevenson.

THE LITTLE PEOPLE. By Albert Halper. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

In the thirties Mr. Halper's novel about a group of retail-store employees—clerks, salesmen, delivery boys, elevator operators, hatters, and the like—would have been announced as proletarian literature; in the forties it is fashionable to think of such persons as "little people." The change in political approach, between the two decades, is clearly reflected in Mr. Halper's approach to his story. There are no trade unions, strikes, or demonstrations in this novel; love is a valid, end-in-itself problem; even an employer is allowed his human miseries. For the rest, so far as insight into character goes, "The Little People" comes out of the same old competent—very competent—realism machine.

THE PRODIGAL WOMEN. By Nancy Hale. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

In adolescence Miss Hale's prodigal women—two sisters and a friend who grow up together near Boston—are full of vitality and high hope, but love and marriage put an end to the promise of their youth. This is the bald outline of Miss Hale's story: it scarcely suggests the psychological extravagance with which it is developed. Concentrating on the relations between men and women, Miss Hale provides her three heroines with two men who belong nowhere but in a psychiatric case book. Instead of going crazy themselves, however, the men drive their wives crazy—in one case, literally—and confusion is twice confounded by the fact that the wives clearly ask for just this kind of treatment; Miss Hale even stacks the cards on the side of pathology by demonstrating that the life of the only woman who resists subjugation to a man issues in emptiness. In all this welter of sexual paradox one wonders where the author herself stands. In a scene near the close of the book, when a conversation turns to politics, one of the characters points out the analogy between dominating men and conquering countries, between masochistic nations and masochistic women. Clutching at straws and recalling the stern bias against fascism which Miss Hale has expressed in her stories, one cherishes the faint hope that she intended her novel as political parable, though if it is parable, it is entirely unsuccessful. To anyone acquainted with Nancy Hale's intelligent well-knit short fiction, her 700-page novel must be a great disappointment.

THEN WE SHALL HEAR SINGING. By Storm Jameson. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Miss Jameson has written a grim fantasy on the subject of what science can and cannot do in support of political evil. To a village in a German-conquered protectorate comes an eminent German surgeon with a plan to destroy people's will to freedom by destroying certain sections of the brain; in the course of his experiment he discovers that there are factors which his "medicine" has failed to take into account. Despite a perhaps inevitable touch of mysticism, Miss Jameson's novel is distinguished by its refusal to make political hope too easy, and by Miss Jameson's creative handling of her simple villagers.

THIS SIDE OF LAND. By Elizabeth Hollister Frost. Coward-McCann. $2.75.

Mrs. Frost's novel about the early settlers of Nantucket is subtitled "An Island Epic," and epic it is, if to write an epic is to lard your prose with eccentricities that pass for poetry and make a heavy-handed to-do about the primal forces. There is no question that Mrs. Frost has mastered her historical material: when what she knows about life in Nantucket, as opposed to what she feels, manages to come through her overlaid narrative it is fascinating stuff—which is, of course, all the more reason to regret that she didn't pass it on less self-consciously. Added sour note: at least one reader could dispense with twins named Me-Me and You-You and an infant named Bay-be.

FRONTIER PASSAGE. By Ann Bridge. Little, Brown and Company. An Atlantic Monthly Press Book. $2.50.

Neither the flesh of a spy story, fish of polite fiction, nor fowl of political commentary, Miss Bridge's new novel still manages to do a pleasant and decent job. It is about an English family by the name of Oldhead—father, mother, and seventeen-year-old daughter Rosemary—who come to the town of St. Jean-de-Luz on the French-Spanish border in the last year of the Spanish civil war; Rosemary makes the acquaintance of an assortment of newspapermen and refugees, both red and white, and becomes precociously involved in a series of border intrigues. By no means a "serious" book but an interesting example of the effect of our turbulent times on a conscientious writer in a modest tradition, and notable for one fine descriptive chapter on the French reception of the first refugees from Franco's terror.

THE DOLLAR GOLD PIECE. By Virginia Swain. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.75.

Kansas City in the 1880's, what it looked like, how its people dressed and ate, the color of daily life in a boom city in the Middle West—a whole wealth of patient detail to embroider a shabby story about an heiress and a pair of fortune hunters, one an anonymous young man from the East, the other a scheming young woman befriended by the heroine's father. The chief distinction of Miss Swain's novel is its curious morbidity. The major suspense of the story, for instance, hangs on the revelation of the heroine's mysterious malady; the heroine's father and the scheming lady secretly read up on it in medical books; there is a villain who is horrified by disease but has the misfortune constantly to stumble on dogs with broken legs and beggars with no legs at all; a neighbor's child has a penchant for murdering her dolls—and so on.

Drama Note

BIRD IN HAND (Morosco Theater) is announced as the first of "a series of established Broadway plays" to be offered at $2.20 and down per admission ticket. Such ambitious announcements are not always to be taken as binding promises, but the present enterprise at least deserves good wishes. Some critics complained that the opening performance left something to be desired in the way of smoothness, but when I saw the piece several days later the presentation of Drinkwater's pleasant if not exactly searching comedy about the younger generation struck me as competent all the way through and quite admirable so far as the contributions of Romney Brent and Harry Sothorn were concerned. It should also be reported that the appreciative audience did not seem to find the play any more old-fashioned than it was intended to be.

As for George Abbott's "Beat the Band" (Forty-sixth Street Theater), I must admit that I have no great fondness for such polite and plot-ridden musical comedies and much prefer the more orgiastic review. Even so, I think I am safe in saying that "Beat the Band" is pretty mild even for its genre and should be recommended only to those whose prejudice in favor of the so-called sophisticated operetta is as strong as I admit my prejudice against it to be.

MUSIC

MUCH of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" is not only exquisitely contrived as sound and as music but marvelously contrived for the realization of the poetic qualities of the episodes it deals with. I say this about the work as it reached my ears at the recent performances by Toscanini with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra; and my statement therefore characterizes the performances as well as the music. Toscanini's approach to the music was at all times by way of the poetic situation: it was as the pronouncement of an angered prince that the passage for the brass in the Introduction was worked over for quality of sound, inflection, legato, portamento; at the point where Romeo's entrance into the vault of the Capulets Allegro agitato e disperato broke off, Toscanini prefaced the soft antiphonal chords of the brass, the woodwinds, the strings with hushing outspread arms and the words "grand silence!" and the tearing phrases later in this section caused him to remind the orchestra: "DI-SPER-A-TO! You are all DI-SPER-A-TI!"

His poetic insight operated through the unique musicality that produced its usual marvels of inflected, contoured phrases and plastically moulded forms; poetic insight and musicality made use of the ear for beauty of sound and texture, the technical mastery that produced what the ear desired; technical mastery was made effective by the will, the concentration, the intensity which—on this occasion as on so many others—had to overcome the inertia, the indifference of some for whom this was merely work for pay. It was not until the second performance that the beauty of sound and texture was fully achieved by the orchestra; not until the third that the horns played their difficult passage in Queen Mab without the blemishes that had disfigured it previously. On the other hand the singing of the Westminster Choir and of Jennie Tourel was superb at all three performances.

With music like Berlioz's it is poetic insight; with other music it may be called emotional insight; and in Toscanini's performances of Beethoven or Mozart, no less than in his performance of "Romeo and Juliet" there is not a tempo, not a nuance that does not proceed from his feeling for what the music is about. The feeling is his own; it is very often different from Koussevitzky's, Beecham's, Walter's; it may be different from yours or mine; and though one must respect it one does not have to agree with it. My idea of what Schubert's Unfinished Symphony is about is different from the one that Toscanini expressed in his broadcast performance last year (notwithstanding which I would want to hear the performance every time he gave it); but the man who produced that mercurial finale of Haydn's "Clock" Symphony, with its subtle, sharp inflections, understands Haydn for me. And this understanding was evident in the performance of the great Symphony No. 99 at the second week's concerts of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society—a performance marvelous as a construction in sound embodying content, blemished this time by the occasional dryness and stridency of the strings in fortissimos.

At these concerts there was also a performance of Shostakovich's Seventh Symphony, which I would have been able to listen to after Brahms's First, but not after Haydn's No. 99.

The "Gramophone Shop Encyclopedia of Recorded Music," originally compiled by R. D. Darrell and published in 1936, has been revised by George Clark Leslie (Simon & Schuster, $3.95). Though it does not mention his name the new volume retains the larger part of Mr. Darrell's 1936 listings and his elucidations of the complications of some of the listings; the revision subtracts and adds what was withdrawn and issued between 1936 and December 1941 for foreign records, June 1942 for domestic, and offers new introductions to some of the composers. The book assembles and arranges in convenient form the information that is to be got only from a number of catalogues; on the other hand a statement on the front of the jacket—that the book "lists the best performances of the best works"—which gives the impression that it is also a selective guide, is misleading. The best are listed, but together with the less good, and with nothing to distinguish one from the other in music, performance, or recording.

Changes in the C. I. C.

Dear Sirs: I feel that when The Nation has more information on the problem which the Chinese Industrial Cooperatives have faced, it will not regard the recent administrative changes as inimical to democracy in China.

The cooperatives were organized near the start of the Sino-Japanese war because a few farsighted individuals saw that China's final victory would depend as much on economic as on military resistance. They have enjoyed a close relationship with the Chinese government from the beginning, since their initial capital—$5,000,000 (Chinese)—was loaned by the government, and they receive a subsidy of $20,000 (Chinese) monthly, without which they could not continue. Today 35 per cent of the total capital is supplied by the government, about 10 per cent comes from paid-up shares owned by the workers, and the rest is mainly supplied by the Chinese banks. Their own financial machinery is being developed in the Kung Ho treasuries, already organized in many localities, with the hope of a Central Cooperative Bank.

The organization has had the interest and generous support of friends abroad, especially the overseas Chinese. With support from the Philippines, Malaya, and Java cut off, the contributions from British and American friends are correspondingly important.

The American committee, known as Indusco, Inc., has remitted funds to an International Committee in China. In doing so, it has by-passed the Central Headquarters of the C. I. C. This has made an unfortunate triangle, creating within the movement in China dual control and dual loyalties and an uneven disbursement of funds. Central Headquarters must be able to account for all revenue, whether from the government or from contributions.

If I know Rewi Alley and I think I have known him for fifteen years, he is one of the last men to desire to be put on a pedestal as the sole founder and indispensable head of a great Chinese organization. But I fear he thought the only way to retain American aid was to insist on letting the International Committee—British and American with one Chinese as secretary—receive and disburse American gifts, ignoring Central Headquarters and the Central Executive Committee, which is Chinese.

Admittedly the Central Executive Committee was not elected by the individual cooperatives. But neither was the International Committee. The new secretary-general, a man of high integrity and fine administrative record, Z. Y. Chow, was not so chosen. But neither was Rewi Alley, nor George Hogg, nor Ralph Lapwood, nor any of the other regional directors and inspectors. The units are not that articulate yet. They are already organizing themselves into federations to handle supply and marketing. Local federations will organize into regional ones. And a national federation will finally emerge, bringing to fruition the highest hope of the C. I. C. leaders—that the cooperatives will finally be completely self-governing.

In the meantime, C. I. C. administration is no less decentralized than before. The Chinese government has no more control than formerly. There is no reason to lose faith in either the cooperatives or China. To seek to run the movement by the remote control of our contributions from America would be a form of philanthropic imperialism as outmoded in China today as extra-territorial rights. Its true meaning would be none the less apparent if cloaked as "liberalism seeking to circumvent an undemocratic government." The C. I. C. need encouragement and support from abroad, but they will remain a Chinese organization under Chinese leadership. And they will be one of the most significant movements the world has ever seen.

GERALDINE T. FITCH

New York, October 22

[The Nation is glad to pass on to its readers the information contained in this letter. Unfortunately, many persons who have been closely associated with Chinese cooperatives from their formation are profoundly disturbed by the recent reorganization, believing that its purpose is to crush any development of democracy in the movement.]

Grand Fellows

Dear Sirs: The following is taken from a letter just received by my family from a young British naval officer whom we entertained last summer while his ship was in port here for repairs:

The most popular, well-mannered, well-behaved, respectful, and soldierly warriors ever to land on English soil are your American Negro troops. This is the nation-wide opinion and a very strong one too; they quite outshine the white Americans in popularity, even the nicest type of female enjoys their company and their courteousness. Isn't it strange? or is it? Unfortunately, the American authorities over here have requested that Negro soldiers be barred from certain clubs, pubs, and the like. Our own authorities have agreed to post notices but absolutely refuse to give the police the authority to interfere in any way. I do not think our attitude will alter; I am sure it won't. After all, which is preferable, a crowd of quiet interesting Negroes or a crowd of noisy English or American soldiers? Anyway, the Negro soldier is considered a real grand fellow, and if his present exemplary behavior continues, he will continue to be thought so.

For Martin Dies— a "Way to Heaven"

[The following letter was sent to Representative Dies in Washington; a copy of it to us. It is published here as a ringing answer to the charges of disloyalty Martin Dies has leveled against large groups of American citizens.]

Dear Sir: In your defense to Congress against the Attorney General's report that your charges of Communist sympathy against more than one thousand government officials are unsupported, you repeat the charge against nineteen officials, including myself, and also include several organizations.

If you made an investigation, you found, what you already knew, that I am a Democrat, but distinguished from yourself in at least one particular—that I am an Administration Democrat. From the beginning I have been devoted to the Administration's defense and war measures, as I am to its domestic policies. You will of course recall conferences you and I have had in the past respecting pending legislation recommended by the President. I urged you to support it. You criticized and opposed it. You had a perfect right to oppose such measures, but you have no right to misinterpret my views and my attitude.

Far more serious than your attacks upon myself or any individual are the indiscriminate and inaccurate charges of disloyalty leveled from time to time against large groups of loyal citizens, such as the Farmers' Union and many labor organizations. The Farmers' Union, for example, as you and everyone else knows, is an organization of patriotic farm men and women. At this moment they are helping to feed the nation, pay its bills, and fight its battles. Thousands of its members and their sons are serving in the armed forces. This organization is vigorously cooperating with the President to bring about a higher degree of national unity in order more effectively to prosecute the war, to curb inflation, and to plan post-war security.

An honest report would not conceal but would reveal these facts.

Labor unions are another example. More than two thousand of the Maritime Workers, as you must know, have perished on torpedoed ships, yet these seamen continue to volunteer for this hazardous service to insure delivery of food and war supplies to our allies. Must they continue to sail submarine-infested seas with charges of disloyalty ringing in their ears?

An honest report would reveal these facts.

Allowing for some exceptions, management, labor, and farmers have joined hands with the Administration to give to the nation a maximum of striking power against the enemy. An honest report would record these facts, plus the fact that tens of thousands of members of these organizations are in the nation's armed forces on every battle front.

You know very well that this government and its people, by cooperating with our Russian ally to crush Hitlerism, is not embracing communism any more than our alliance with the people of China commits us to chopsticks or Taoism, although I might commend to you the Taoist precept that "to withdraw into obscurity is the way to heaven." At this moment the American people and our armed forces are watching with intense hope the heroic defense of Stalingrad. The suggestion that this sympathy with the steadfast Red Army is un-American is plain political claptrap. The battle raging in that Hitler-created hell is as much ours as the battles of the Atlantic and Pacific in which our own resolute sons are fighting to destroy Hitler's power.

I am a relatively unimportant government official. Nevertheless, as a citizen and supporter of the government and its war measures I must challenge any Hitlerized methods and procedures designed to lynch the reputations of citizens and their organizations without hearing or trial, while they are giving to the nation the best service of which they are capable. Those who are unfit for service either in the armed forces or on the civilian front can at least abstain from poisoning the atmosphere in which their fellow-citizens must fight and work. If you want something un-American to investigate you can find a wide variety of home-grown Nazis and Fascists. The FBI and the press are turning them up almost every day.

ON THE STALINGRAD FRONT NAZI ATTACKS

have slackened, but a new threat to vital Russian positions has developed in the Caucasus. There the Germans have switched their main effort from the Mozdok region to the central foothills below the pass over which the great Georgian military road leads to Tiflis. They have captured Nalchik and are now thrusting toward Ordzhonikidze, the railhead at the northern end of the highway. Here as elsewhere the Red Army is putting up a great fight, but it is handicapped by difficult communications between the lateral valleys which it is defending. On the other hand, the Nazis will encounter increasingly heavy going as they work upward toward the deep snows that cover the pass 16,000 feet above sea level. Meanwhile it must cheer the Russians to know that a rain of shells and bombs as heavy as they have had to endure at Stalingrad is now crashing on Rommel's lines in Egypt. It is true that owing to the comparatively small number of men involved Soviet commentators tend to regard the desert battle as a sideshow, but the fact remains that a British victory would have important strategic results beneficial to Russia. Cairo continues to be reserved in its claims, but General Montgomery's tactics appear to be wearing down Axis resistance. And his armored forces are still in reserve ready to mop up if the enemy lines crack. ✕

THE STRONG JAPANESE COUNTER-OFFENSIVE

in the Solomons has apparently been beaten back, thanks largely to American air power. Navy and army fliers share the credit, and Admiral Halsey and General MacArthur deserve congratulations for the effectiveness with which they have cooperated. We should also like to commend the navy for speeding up its news releases, even though this has added to the difficulty of reconstructing the course of events chronologically. It appears, however, that a very powerful Japanese task force, seeking to outflank our position in the southern Solomons, was met by our fleet in the neighborhood of the Stewart Islands, northeast of Guadalcanal. As in the Coral Sea and Midway battles the actual fighting seems to have been carried on by planes, though it is not yet entirely certain that there were no clashes between surface craft.

Our blows were struck not only by carrier-borne aircraft but also by land-based Flying Fortresses and dive bombers, which intervened with effective and nicely timed blows. Our acknowledged losses were an unnamed carrier and the destroyer Porter sunk and several vessels damaged. The navy makes no claims of enemy ships actually sunk, but a great many were damaged, including two carriers and two battleships, and it is reasonable to suppose that some of these did not return to their bases. Our own experience has shown that heavily bombed warships do not usually sink immediately but succumb after a few hours to internal injuries. In any case Secretary Knox's claim that we have "won the first round" seems to be justified, for it was the Japanese who retired. Part of their fleet is back again at Buin in the northern Solomons, where it is being steadily pounded by MacArthur's fliers. And control of the waters around Guadalcanal is in our hands, making it possible for surface craft to bombard enemy shore positions by daylight.

WESTBROOK PEGLER NEEDS A CHAMPION, and ever ready to defend the underprivileged, we rush to his support. Poor Peg's recent assault on the character and purposes of Eleanor Roosevelt has raised again the question of whether he is a deliberately vicious fellow or merely an unfortunate man who finds himself with a keen style and no mind to match it. The defense inclines to the latter belief. Pegler, it must be remembered, lays no claim to any knowledge of the world affairs which he discusses every day in his column. He is fiercely anti-intellectual and associates any kind of organized knowledge with long hair, brain trusts, and Red Russia. He really believes, we contend, that the wife of the President went to London to plot the class struggle which will one day bring her and Franklin D. Roosevelt to power. Britain, you see, "is the base from which her communistic and Social Democratic authorities or feeders are now operating," and as a "cunning and persistent politician" she has to be on hand while plans for the overthrow of the American system are being worked out. Since precedents are always useful in these matters, we wish to draw on the case of The People vs. John Glutz (N. Y. Supp. 327) in which defense counsel pleaded with the jury: "My client may talk like a fool and he may act like a fool, but don't be deceived, gentlemen. He really is a fool."

IN THE MOVIES THAT OLD REPROBATE, SEX, is rendered invisible by an impenetrable Hays of censorship. But sex will out, and it seems about to encompass the ruin of Errol Flynn as it once caused the fall of Fatty Arbuckle. We find it very difficult to choose between Mr. Flynn and the two movie-mad girls, Peggy and Betty, who have assumed the role of outraged virtue in a real court. Neither of them pretends to have been seduced against her will. Betty admitted that she had been "raped" before. "I said 'No' three times," she said, describing one episode, "then I disrobed." But both girls happen to be under eighteen, and the law of California rules that a sex offense against a girl under eighteen constitutes rape, regardless of consent—a state has to have some standards. One might think that Mr. Flynn would have had at least enough gray matter, or legal advice, to observe the statutory limit if for no higher reason than to protect his lucrative career from such ruinous assaults. We can't say we should miss Mr. Flynn as a celluloid lover—his banishment would save us the trouble of making sure we missed him; we do not share the enthusiasm of the giggling Betty, who revealed that two days after the "criminal attack" she had returned, so to speak, to the scene of the crime by going to see his newest picture, "Desperate Journey." But we hope, nevertheless, that the case will be thrown out of court.

THE ORDER LIMITING SALARIES TO $25,000 a year after payment of federal taxes is a crude and ineffective instrument for accomplishing the limitation of income that was twice proposed by the President. The regulations issued by Director Byrnes will limit earned but not unearned income. Since the bulk of the really large incomes in the country are unearned, the limitation on salaries will probably accomplish little in the way of curbing inflationary spending or eliminating the discontent that results from flagrant inequalities in war-time sacrifices. It has the disadvantage of limiting the incentives of management without penalizing idleness. And it will prove extremely difficult to administer. Responsibility for the inadequacy of the order rests not with Director Byrnes, who went as far as he could under the law, but with Congress for failing to accomplish its purpose by the simpler and more direct method of taxation. Congress not only failed to consider the President's specific request for a $25,000 ceiling on income but ignored the vital question of morale by enacting a tax bill in which a disproportionate share of the burden is placed on incomes ranging from $1,500 to $2,500.

A CAMPAIGN AGAINST THE FORTY-HOUR week has been under way for some time in a large number of the country's newspapers. In trying to make a case against the present provisions of the Wages and Hours Act, many of the papers have been guilty of a shameless distortion of the facts. In contrasting the average work week of fifty-six hours in England with the average forty-three-hour week in this country, the usually careful New York Times neglects to point out, for instance, that England has retained its standard work week throughout the war, paying overtime as provided under union contracts for the additional hours. Most of the papers also fail to point out that many of our essential war industries are now working a forty-eight-hour week, or longer, and that the only effect of wiping out the provision requiring the payment of time and a half for overtime would be to reduce wages for the workers and increase profits for the companies. Most workers are willing to put in additional hours if necessary to increase war production, but there is no reason why they should consent to a cut in wages. The only way the government could benefit from the reduced costs resulting from the abolition of overtime pay would be through a renegotiation of all existing contracts. But no one advocating revision of the wage-hour law has even taken notice of this fact.

REAR ADMIRAL EMORY LAND HATES UNION organizers, and if there is any substance in the charges brought against him by Senator Aiken of Vermont, we can see why. In a letter to Senator Walsh of the Naval Affairs Committee, Senator Aiken accuses the Maritime Commission, of which Land is chairman, of brazen collusion with private interests. "It [the commission] has spent millions of dollars in subsidizing ships for private corporations, particularly the Alcoa Steamship Company, owned by the Aluminum Company of America, when these ships were intended primarily to carry the goods of the corporation itself. It has failed to collect the statutory 3½ per cent interest charge from shipping corporations on secured and miscellaneous accounts (other than new construction), constituting an estimated indebtedness of $45,139,824." These are only two points of the indictment. The commission is accused of having bought for $45,000 an old Coast Guard cutter which it knew had been sold six years ago for $6,605. It is said to have been a party to transactions whereby completed ships were sold to private companies which later resold them, with the commission's knowledge, to the navy at a higher price. Presumably these charges will be fully investigated by the proper authorities. There was ample cause for removing Admiral Land after his outburst two weeks ago; if Senator Aiken's accusations are well founded, he should certainly be eliminated.

THE RIGHT OF 10,000,000 AMERICANS TO choose their representatives in Washington hinges on the battle now being waged to bring the anti-poll-tax bill to a vote in the Senate before the end of the session. It is taken for granted that the bill will pass by a substantial margin if it can be brought to a vote. It will be recalled that in August the upper House voted thirty-three to twenty to abolish the poll tax for soldiers. The issue raised in the present bill is essentially the same. If the poll tax is undemocratic as applied to soldiers, it is equally undemocratic for the civilian population. For rather obvious reasons, support of the poll tax is limited primarily to the Senators from the eight poll-tax states. Yet this small group could carry on a filibuster under the Senate's free and easy rules. Whether they will dare to tie up all legislation in the upper House for the last two months of the session in order to thwart the free exercise of the right of suffrage in their states depends on how actively public opinion in the other forty states demands passage of the bill.

REWI ALLEY, FOUNDER OF THE CHINESE Industrial Cooperatives, has been retained, temporarily at least, in his post as field secretary as a result of protests by liberal groups in China against his dismissal. To what extent this action represents a solution of the conflict that has grown up around the movement is not clear at this distance. But those who know Alley personally are confident that he would not remain if the essential democracy of the movement had been destroyed. The clarification of the situation in Chungking makes it difficult to understand the action of the United China Relief in withholding a very considerable amount of money which it has collected for the cooperatives. The United China Relief is only a collection agency and as such is not responsible for the distribution of funds. This responsibility rests with Indusco and the International Committee, both of which are still operating. We assume that steps are being taken to forward the badly needed funds to the cooperatives.

Monopoly in News

THE Department of Justice is being bitterly attacked for launching an anti-trust suit against the Associated Press. Once again the banner "freedom of the press" is being unfurled by the publishers as if that precious constitutional right were their exclusive possession. We must remind them that freedom of the press is primarily a right of citizens as a whole—the consumers of printed matter—and that any tendency toward a monopoly in the publishing field is an abridgment of that right.

In its complaint against the A. P. the Department of Justice certainly makes out a prima facie case in support of the charge that our major news-gathering organization constitutes "a combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade." It is the courts, however, which are being called upon to decide whether or not this charge can be sustained, and we fail to see why the government should be attacked for seeking a formal legal test of so important a public issue. Our sensitive publishers must learn to distinguish between prosecution and persecution.

The gravamen of the charge against the A. P. in our view is not that it is a monopoly in itself but that its membership requirements are such as to promote and perpetuate local newspaper monopolies by placing obstacles in the way of new competition. No daily newspaper can exist without access to the services of a news agency. If it is barred from membership in the A. P., its choice is restricted to the United Press and the International News Service, neither of which has such extensive coverage. Furthermore, both these commercial agencies are controlled by publishing chains; so that in many cities a new newspaper may be compelled to rely on an agency closely connected with a competitor. This situation is undoubtedly a serious handicap to any would-be newspaper promoter and one that helps to account for the low birth rate of daily journals. More and more, local competition between newspapers is becoming a thing of the past. According to a Federal Trade Commission report, in 1940 there were only 181 cities in the United States with competing daily newspapers, as compared with 1,245 cities in which there was a local monopoly.

This is not a healthy state of affairs. In a recent University of Chicago Round Table discussion, Samuel E. Thomason, publisher of the Chicago Times, declared: "In my judgment the free press that the public is entitled to is one in which any member of the public can find a newspaper in which he can have confidence and, incidentally, in which he must have interest. The function of the newspaper publisher is merely to see that the public doesn't lose its free press, not that he doesn't lose his free press." It can hardly be denied that in many American communities many citizens cannot find the kind of newspaper to which Mr. Thomason says they are entitled, and to this extent it may be said that the public has lost its free press.

The answer filed by the A. P. to the complaint of the Department of Justice has, however, little bearing on this aspect of the question. Claiming to be "a mutual cooperative association," the A. P. asserts that if it were obliged to admit every paper prepared to pay a pro rata share of expenses, it would become merely "a commercial news agency." Further, it declares that in this case it might really become a monopoly, since "in view of the good-will attaching to its name . . . it might well become the only news agency furnishing complete news coverage." These statements show a queer confusion about the principles of cooperative organization, the first of which is that membership must be open on equal terms to all. And if the A. P. adopted this principle, it would not become a monopoly even though it might obtain exclusive possession of the news-agency field. For it would be offering all consumers of its product—news—the same opportunity to buy it at the lowest economic cost.

In its answer the A. P. makes great play with the case of the Chicago Sun, alleging that the government only moved against it after membership had been denied to the Sun. This is no reply to the charge of monopoly, and its place in the brief must be ascribed to an attempt to confuse the issues with political red herrings. The government complaint does, indeed, cite the exclusion of the Sun—as well as that of the politically opposite Washington Times-Herald—but it is thoroughly justified in so doing since this provides a flagrant example of the way in which the A. P.'s rules operate against the public interest. Until the advent of the Sun nearly a year ago, many citizens of Chicago could not find a morning paper in which they could "have confidence." The monopoly of the Chicago Tribune, a monopoly which it successfully fought to preserve at the last A. P. convention, was buttressed by its exclusive possession of the A. P. franchise. It is true that the Sun has succeeded in establishing itself despite this handicap, but the fact remains that its exclusion is a serious obstacle to its growth.

Incidentally, in the course of its brief the A. P. most unfairly and unnecessarily repeats the attacks made against Marshall Field, owner of the Sun, by the Chicago Tribune. Publication of the Sun, it declares, enables Field "to deduct from his personal income tax whatever loss he may sustain by reason thereof." The result is, it continues, that Field enjoys a subsidy at government expense which places him at a great competitive advantage. How far are the newspapers supporting the A. P. brief prepared to carry the implications of this charge? Is it in the publishing business alone that a man must refuse to invest his money in an enterprise which may yield only losses for some years? Is it true that high taxes promote risk-taking, and if so why is the conservative press always telling us that high taxes discourage rich men from venturing their wealth? Until we receive some intelligible reply to these questions we shall regard the pleading of the A. P. in this particular as both specious and nauseous.

Negroes and Unions

DISCRIMINATION against Negroes by powerful international and local unions of the American Federation of Labor has become a national scandal. It is too late for weasel-worded apologies, for assurances that "the situation is improving," for pious citation of the federation's formal—and meaningless—resolutions against race bias, for reminders that employers are more frequently guilty of discrimination than labor unions. These rationalizations are as obsolete as they are unconvincing. They merely reflect the inertia and complacency and—in some cases—the outright prejudices of the A. F. of L.'s high command.

Nor is there any point in the A. F. of L.'s protest that airing the issue will give "aid and comfort" to labor's enemies. The issue has been publicly presented to Westbrook Pegler and his cohorts by such A. F. of L. dignitaries as Tom Ray, boss of Local 72 of the Boilermakers' Union, which has a closed-shop contract with Henry Kaiser. Ray recently informed reporters that he would "pull the place down" if Negroes were given equal classification rights at Kaiser's Portland yard. As this is written, government officials have summoned a conference for November 10 at which Ray will be confronted with new demands for relaxation of his lily-white standards. John P. Frey, head of the A. F. of L.'s metal-trades department, has even sent Ray an indignant telegram, and has indicated that he will support the government representatives in their showdown with the Portland metal-trades crowd. His bold gesture, however, comes after weeks of behind-the-scenes conferences and pleadings to persuade Ray to treat Negroes—who traveled from New York to take jobs at the Kaiser plant—as fellow-workers. Moreover, on the same day that Frey made public his telegram William Green was insisting in New York that the federation was powerless to do anything except write telegrams. "I can't tell Ray what to do," he said. "It's like the President. Can he tell the governor of a state what to do?"

Ray may ultimately yield, but the total problem will remain, and other Rays will dictate their own policies for war production. They will do so as long as Green flaunts his own lack of authority. They will do so until federation leaders clean house at the top as well as at the bottom, putting pressure on international unions which retain color clauses in their constitutions and disciplining local big-shots who exclude Negroes from jobs.

The federation's recent convention failed to meet the issue. It heard A. Philip Randolph, president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters—and one of two Negro delegates to the Toronto meeting—deliver his annual indictment. His bill of particulars was not new; the A. F. of L. had heard it before. Randolph cited more than ten international unions which have color clauses or "ritualistic provisions" that bar Negro workers; among them are such important units as the Machinists, the Boilermakers, and the Department of Railway Employees. He mentioned others, including the Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Plumbers, which have "unwritten laws" excluding Negroes. He described international unions as influential as the Carpenters which have no constitutional color lines but permit locals to do as they please; the locals are often pleased to draw the color line. Finally he condemned the Jim Crow units which have been created by the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks and other unions as a "compromise" solution. These "auxiliaries" permit Negroes to join, pay their dues, hold separate meetings—but deny them the right to elect delegates to national conventions.

Randolph had been heard and ignored at previous conventions; but this was the year when federation orators felt called upon to pay longer and lustier tributes to the democratic way of life and a free post-war world. This, moreover, is a time of approaching man-power shortages, when victory over our enemies requires the complete mobilization of our man-power. The federation's leaders weren't moved. They listened to Randolph and they ignored his appeal. They turned down even his minimum request—the creation of a committee to investigate cases of discrimination within the federation. Such a step, A. F. of L. leaders have always explained, would violate the ancient "autonomy" of federation unions. Moreover, a resolution adopted by the convention said, "We are doubtful whether any method other than the educational one can make the progress which is necessary." Tom Girdler used to express the same views about the Wagner Act.

Only Dan Tobin tried to make a reply; it was a dismal effort. For it was no answer to accuse Randolph of "lighting the torch of disunity," no answer to say that hundreds of A. F. of L. units welcome Negro members, no answer to say that the Teamsters have always loved the Negro worker. In effect Tobin talked like an apologist for lynching who takes pains to point out that many Negroes die natural deaths.

The Manpower Commission has stressed the urgency of increasing Negro employment in war production. In the coming months every worker—black or white, male or female—must serve in the post for which he is best fitted. This must be done whether Governor Dixon of Alabama or Tom Ray of Portland likes it or not. Labor representatives on the Manpower Commission are opposing enactment of new work-or-fight legislation and employment controls. Green has publicly pleaded for further trial of "voluntary methods." The Negro issue is a key test. Are A. F. of L. officials prepared to open all the doors to Negroes? Are they ready to challenge international unions which cling to constitutional provisions against Negroes? Will they crack down on intransigent local officials—not via Western Union appeals but by summary dismissal or revocation of charters? "Autonomy" in the federation is sacrosanct only when its officials don't want to act. If a union local fell into the hands of avowed Nazi agents, would its "autonomy" be respected? Is Ray much above that level?

The truth is that a clean-up is neither as difficult nor as complex a process as the A. F. of L. leaders suggest. A few decisive steps in individual cases would have repercussions throughout the federation; repudiation of Jim Crow by one powerful international would put others on the spot. Instead, Tobin and other A. F. of L. chiefs have covered up for the offending unions and Woll has fashioned various profound legalisms to safeguard them.

The Strategy of Reprisal

By FRED A KIRCHWEY

THE Axis war of reprisals moved into a new area when the Nazi Foreign Office let it be known that Germany and its associates were considering the advisability of denouncing the Geneva convention in regard to the treatment of prisoners of war. This threat, the sickening implications of which have sent a chill through every non-Axis nation, is obviously an answer to Britain's proposal that the Swiss government investigate the original German charges. The Germans, it will be recalled, put in chains some 1,300 British and Canadian prisoners of war as a reprisal for the alleged chaining of captured Germans after the Dieppe raid. Thereupon a similar number of German prisoners were put in chains in Canada and England. These acts set off a barrage of charges and counter-charges. They were followed by Japan's promise to punish for "inhuman cruelty to civilians" the American fliers captured after the raid on Tokyo. And the anti-Axis world discovered that it was faced by a new and peculiarly horrible variety of political warfare. How it is to be met, no government seems to know.

One thing is certain. Hitler's war of reprisals, like his war on the innocent inhabitants of conquered territories, will neither be waged nor settled according to any rules laid down in the past by civilized nations. Such rules will be used by Hitler only as weapons against those who respect them. They will be used as fake alibis to excuse in advance acts of terrorism to come. And no decent peace in this war against helpless men can be negotiated through the good offices of any neutral power. Even to suggest such procedure is to appear to accept Hitler as an honorable opponent who has made his charges in good faith. The one useful purpose that may be served by a neutral investigation of the facts is to prove to the non-Axis world the nature and purpose of the Axis reprisals.

Hitler's threat to denounce the Geneva convention was, of course, his only possible next move. He must now do as he has always done—follow specific false charges with vastly broader ones, step up the offensive, and, when the rules can no longer be used against the enemy, wipe them out altogether on the pretense that the enemy has violated them.

But if legal procedures are likely to prove useful to the Allies only as a form of counter-propaganda, if they have no value as a deterrent or to save prisoners already suffering reprisals, what can be done? The half-hearted counter-reprisals instituted against German prisoners are certainly no answer. The British victims are still in chains, and Hitler has threatened to visit vengeance on Allied prisoners, without regard to nationality, in a ratio of three for every German suffering reprisal. But it needed no new threats of frightfulness to teach the old lesson that in a competition in terror the Axis war lords are sure to win. They will play the game according to a double-or-quits system that other nations would never dare to adopt. Already Hitler's spokesmen have threatened to deprive of sight and hearing an unannounced number of British prisoners in Germany if German prisoners are "inhumanly" treated by the Allies. A war of reprisals is won before it starts by the nation trained and hardened to methods of terror at home.

What is necessary is a cool examination of the reasons why Germany, followed so closely by Japan, has adopted this new strategy. Assuming, as we may reasonably do, that Hitler expected retaliation in kind, what use can he make of it? It is unlikely that he hoped to frighten his enemies into inaction by the threat of mistreating prisoners. The sickening brutality practiced against captives—military and civilian alike—in Russia has not weakened the morale of the Red Army. It has stiffened it by generating a murderous hate. The Nazi atrocities in the occupied countries have created a spirit of general rebellion in place of dull apathy. Hitler can hardly believe that the British, who were forged into a solid fighting force by the fires of the blitz, will waver or give up in the face of new threats.

I feel sure that the Nazis have launched their war against prisoners in the confident hope of counter-reprisals. For counter-reprisals can be presented both to the German people and to the German army as unprovoked atrocities—samples of what the soldier must expect if he surrenders, what the simple German citizen must expect if the Allied forces succeed in their plans for invasion. Counter-reprisals will only provide propaganda material to bolster up the faltering courage of the German people with threats of the horror that will follow defeat. In an article published in The Nation over a year ago J. Alvarez del Vayo wrote: "It would be unduly optimistic to expect the Nazis and their accomplices, when their backs are to the wall, to surrender without a terrible struggle. . . . They will fight like mad dogs before giving up." Today Hitler is still far from surrender. He is, however, facing a fourth bitter winter. Stalingrad stands. His war factories must be manned by slave power from the occupied lands. His people are apathetic and weary. His vast conquests have brought neither victory nor peace. A strategy of reprisal is a strategy of desperation, the act of a tyrant on the defensive. To say this is not to underestimate the dangers that lie ahead. But it is to discount utterly the hope of defeating this strategy by either of the methods so far attempted. However hard it is to look on while innocent prisoners suffer, we may as well accept the brutal fact that they cannot be helped except through the final defeat of the terrorists who are using torture as a political provocation.

It's Not a Laissez Faire War

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, October 30

THERE are some extraordinary revelations in the latest report of the Tolan committee. Most of them reflect the planlessness that continues to be the principal characteristic of the war-production effort, despite the innumerable directives, the endless flow of orders, and the vast amount of paper work at the capital. Some elementary steps in effective organization of procurement, production, materials, and man-power have yet to be taken. Perhaps the most appalling single sentence in the entire report is this one: "No contract to date has carried with it a bill of material requirements and a time-production schedule."

The failure to gear materials to production has forced war contractors to grab and hoard what they could get. "Excessive inventories," the committee says, "have become the rule." But the inventories, though excessive, are not well balanced, and major contractors have surpluses in some materials, shortages in others. The gravity of the problem is indicated by the committee's estimate that not more than half of the increased steel production in 1940 and 1941 "went into military items and increased civilian production." The rest was hoarded.

More than a year ago the Tolan committee urged recapture of excessive inventories. It believes "an aggressive inventory policy could increase our material supplies of copper and steel by 50 per cent in the next six months." The chief of the WPB inventory branch reported that although there were probably about 400,000,000 pounds of copper in excess inventories, only 100,000,000 pounds had been reported and only 30,000,000 pounds taken over by the WPB. When Donald M. Nelson was before the committee he was asked why it took so long to recapture these inventories. His floundering attempt at a reply revealed the confused state of affairs in his organization. "Well, I cannot answer that," Nelson said. "It has taken too long, there is no doubt about it. It involved the setting up of a corporation, involved trying to evaluate these different products. We have done as good a job as we could have done on the recapturing of the inventories. I cannot say except that it has taken too long." This is not the answer of a man with a real grip on his job.

Lack of time-production schedules, like inadequate supervision of materials, has unbalanced the supply of war materials and their components. Production scheduling, if any, is largely in the hands of the individual producer, who tends to concentrate on items easiest to make. "Trucks and radios which closely resemble normal civilian products, for example, may run far ahead of schedule, while the tanks to which they are complementary lag behind." Each producer tries to fill his contract at maximum speed, but there is a lack of over-all scheduling to gear his output with that of other components: "Frames are completed without engines or instruments to make them into airplanes." This kind of scheduling is elementary in big business. The job of marshaling the flow of materials, parts, and sub-assemblies over the production and assembly lines is a basic one in General Motors or General Electric. G. M. cannot afford to be left at the end of the season with, let us say, 30,000 cowls and 100,000 radiators and 5,000 mudguards. Yet our war-production program today is out of balance in just this way. "Critical materials and labor time are tied up in components which do not make final assemblies: we have airplanes without propellers, guns without carriages, machine tools without spindles."

The WPB and Nelson do not have a monopoly on fumbling. The same slipshod management is evident in the agencies dealing with man-power. As the shortage of labor grows acute, it is more important to keep some men at their work bench than to put them in the armed forces. Yet the committee discovered that "Selective Service is making huge monthly drafts of men without any adequate machinery for occupational deferment." The armed services bid for man-power as they please. "During the past six months," the report says, "major aircraft concerns on the West Coast have lost thousands of workers through volunteering. Many of these men are highly skilled, and others are required temporarily to train workers being drawn into that expanding industry." Certain branches of the armed services insist, nevertheless, "upon drawing off the cream of the nation's youth through individual recruiting techniques and the use of preferential commissions." If the manufacturer could find out in advance what men he could keep and how long he could keep them, he could plan training programs to replace those he will lose, but the Selective Service boards "receive little advance notice of requirements" and are unable to provide the war contractor with this information.

Hoarding and poor planning are as evident in the case of man-power as in that of materials. The committee proposes that we adopt the British system of labor-supply inspectors, working out of regional man-power offices. Improper utilization of skills is as pernicious as hoarding, and both may be found in government arsenals and navy yards as well as in private plants. In one instance brought to the attention of the committee, "demand by a government plant for 200 machinists resolved itself upon analysis into need for a small number of machinists and various types of machine operators with much lower orders of skill." The committee believes that by reorganizing and rationalizing the use of labor within plants we can obtain the equivalent of a huge increase in man-power. Brigadier General Frank J. McSherry of the War Manpower Commission testified that in some plants productivity had been increased from 50 to 75 per cent by more efficient use of the labor force. The commission announced weeks ago that a force of labor inspectors would be established, but this has not yet been done, "though considerable time was spent in wrangling with the War Production Board over which agency would supervise the inspection system."

The man-power problem is made more difficult by the maldistribution of war orders and the construction of new facilities in new areas instead of the conversion of existing facilities. Here too there is confusion. "There is not today available within the federal government any single agency," the committee says, "which knows whether conversion has taken place at 30 or at 50 per cent efficiency." The committee found idle convertible facilities in both large and small business. "Whole areas, including both small and large cities, exist," the report declares, "which through mismanagement of contract letting and subcontracting are idle." The committee found this particularly true in the Middle West and New York City. Plans to concentrate civilian output in smaller plants in areas of labor surplus "continue to be shuffled back and forth between industry branches, industry advisory committees, and other sections of the War Production Board." Of the three concentration programs announced so far, "at least one has concentrated production in an area of labor shortage."

This lack of planning derives from laissez faire habits of mind. Nelson, as he explained to the committee, conceives of the WPB as an "umpire," settling disputes between various war and civilian agencies competing for materials. "We cannot expect to organize war production by using umpires," the Tolan report comments tartly, "any more than we can expect to operate a railroad system with umpires instead of schedules." The natural tendency is to think of the war-production program in terms of normal business. "War production," the committee says, "is treated as a salesman's proposition rather than as the mobilization of our entire national industrial plant for total war." The different parts of the government act like rival business firms. "In the absence of a program of production and an organization to coordinate it," the report declares, "we have today only a series of individual competing production projects. At virtually every point where coordination and planning should be exercised, we find competition and maneuvering. There is competition among the major branches of the military services. There is competition between the military services and the industry branches of the War Production Board. There is endless jockeying among the individual industry branches."

To carry on the war-production program in the image of the free market is only possible with a surplus of men, machines, and materials. We have a shortage of all three. One of the chief virtues of the Tolan report is that it sees man-power and materials and production and strategy as parts of one big problem, so closely interwoven by the necessities of total war that they cannot be dealt with separately. Without a decision on strategy, decisions cannot be made about man-power and munitions. The production needed to implement the strategy cannot be insured, in its turn, without man-power, materials, and production schedules. This is the frame of reference in which the Tolan committee opposes compulsory labor service; the problem is much too complicated to be solved by the bark of a labor sergeant.

The Tolan committee believes that the time has come for a reorganization of the war-production setup which will provide centralized supervision of men, machines, and materials. It proposes an Office of War Mobilization headed by a director. Under this there would be three offices—one the equivalent of a Ministry of Supply, the second to handle man-power, the third to control prices and wages. The first, the Office of War Supply, would take over the procurement divisions of army, navy, Maritime Commission, and lend-lease, as well as the functions of the War Production Board. Though mere organizational changes are often of dubious value, this one would have two advantages: it would give us a coordinated war effort, and it would finally take the job of procurement away from the armed services, which have enough to do and which have not demonstrated any genuine capacity for industrial mobilization. "The Director of War Mobilization would by this reorganization," the committee says, "assume for the first time the power to demand a significant detailed accounting from the armed services. He would become the agent for obtaining a statement of military requirements and for matching them against the capacity of our economy to deliver. The flow of materials, man-power, and machine facilities would become subject to his regulation."

The Tolan committee would have the war program planned, not "umpired." At the same time it understands that to plan is not the same as to regiment. Wise planning is not synonymous with centralization. If we finally begin to chart our course instead of allowing monopoly to muddle through, we can provide for much more participation and initiative on the part of the individual region, community, and plant than they have today. For the most important of our idle resources is the energy and enthusiasm that would be released by giving the worker, the independent business man, and the small town a more responsible role in the war program.

Congress and the People

BY ALEXANDER MEIKLEJOHN

A BASIC principle of American political theory is now being sharply challenged. The legislative body, we have been accustomed to say, is more truly "representative" of us than is the executive or the judiciary. It has therefore a certain superiority over them. Our lawmakers, it is true, must recognize as equals in status the other branches of the government. For example, we speak of a "balance of powers" among these three. We have also devised methods of procedure by which they may "check" each other in various ways. And yet the essence of free, representative government has seemed to require that the Congress shall be, at least, "first among equals." The President may act. But fundamentally his action is limited to the execution of the decisions which "the representatives of the people" have made. The judges may rule and interpret. But the conclusions of the courts are not intended to add to or subtract from the explicit or implied meaning of the laws themselves. These limiting statements are, as all men know, open to question and even to qualification; but it remains true that in a peculiar sense the Senators and Representatives of our federal system "represent" the sovereign people. The will of the nation resides in the body of the legislature.

But nothing seems more obvious than the fact that the principle of which we are speaking, as a description of the actual processes of our national government, is no longer valid. The Congress is not, today, first among equals. It does not rank in public esteem and confidence above the executive and the judiciary. So far as representative character is concerned, it is commonly regarded as blocking and distracting the will of the people. We do not trust it to make wise and objective decisions furthering the general welfare. Apparently its action is wise only when it does what the executive or the voters tell it to do. It "plays politics" even when the winning of the war is at stake. Of course the same charges have been made against the executive and the judiciary, but the difference in degree at this point is so great that it becomes a difference in kind. Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Wallace, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Stimson, Mr. Nelson—whether one agrees with them or not—must be regarded as working desperately in the common interest. The Congress, on the other hand, seems to be regarded as an obstacle, as a body that must be cajoled, or frightened, or driven into actions that are essential for the realizing of the common purpose.

A striking and dramatic illustration of the drift of which I am speaking was found in President Roosevelt's recent "shotgun" message to Congress. In that message he declared that if the lawmaking body did not, before a certain date, take action toward an assigned end, he, as executive, would take the matter into his own hands. Further, in his Labor Day broadcast, he appealed to the people to support him in that intention. There can, I think, be little doubt that as the issue was then seen, the people stood by the President. And on the whole they are convinced that in the entire present situation he "represents" them. They are equally convinced that, in general, the Congress is failing to give expression to their will. American citizens may deplore that such apparent executive usurpation of authority should be necessary. But the plain common sense of a people is ready to declare that if, in a desperate emergency, one branch of the government fails to meet its responsibilities, some such action as that of the President in this case must be taken. We seem ready to say that, if necessary, Congress must be bludgeoned into doing its duty.

A second observation supporting my contention has to do with the general attitude of Americans toward their representatives. President Roosevelt, it must be noted, did not originate the shotgun method of handling Congressmen. We too deal with them by hold-up methods. We too threaten and demand. In our attempt to influence their action, it does not usually occur to us to present "reasons" to appeal to their judgment. We pile up mountains of telegrams and letters to terrify them. We impress upon them how many votes they will lose if they fail to do our will. Editors, columnists, advocates of causes good and bad seek to drive or lure them into submission. And in all this we do not seem to recognize that we are declaring them unfit to represent a free people. No man can represent the citizens of a democracy if he will change his mind, or change his vote without changing his mind, because of threats or pressure. And the fact that we deal with our Senators and Representatives in these terms shows all too clearly what we think of them. They are not our representatives; they are our messenger boys. And messenger boys as such, though they can deliver telegrams, are not fitted to represent the highest intelligence, the most resolute purpose, of a free people.

II

If what has been said is true, it is evident that our government is confronted with a constitutional crisis which is exceedingly difficult to interpret and, hence, to deal with. If it appears that our chosen representatives do not represent us, we have a desperate problem on our hands. Something fundamental to our scheme of government has slipped. And the difficulty of the problem is increased rather than diminished if we recognize, as I think we do, that the defect in the action of Congress is not primarily one of personnel but lies rather in the governing process itself. The basic trouble is not that unwise or corrupt men are elected to office. As the Congressional ranks now stand, unwisdom and corruption seem to be far overbalanced by ability and experience and devotion to the common welfare. The essential difficulty is that the moral and intellectual standards of the legislative body as a whole fall below those of the individual legislators. And to say that is to say that Congress does not "represent" even its own members. The political machinery by which men are elected or defeated, by which they are reelected or discarded, by which they keep in touch with their constituents, by which they do their work in committees and on the floor—all this machinery seems designed to make bad men effective and good men helpless. It gives representation to selfish desires and interests and prejudices. It does not, in any adequate degree, give representation to deliberate purposes and common intentions and reasoned judgments.

If the representative defect of the legislature does not lie in its personnel, where precisely does it lie? To answer that question we must ask what, in a democratic government, "representation" is of and for. In what sense, for example, is it true—as it undoubtedly is—that in the conflict over the control of prices, Mr. Henderson has been more representative of the will of the people than the farm bloc which stood in the way of his attempts to prevent inflation? What are the representatives of a free people expected to do and to be? The American answer to that question seems, at present, to have neither clarity nor validity.

III

Any agency which undertakes to act for the people has two tasks facing it. First, it must find out what the people want. It must discover and take account of the whole range of private interests which are at stake throughout the country. In this sense, every individual, every group, every region, has a right to representation in the councils of the government. And that representation must be equal, must be enjoyed without prejudice and without special privilege. But, second, since the huge conglomeration of a nation's desires and needs and intentions is riddled with conflict and contradiction, since interests are at war with one another, any representative body has another job to do. It must choose. It must think. It must discover the common good in all the separate goods. It must deny as well as affirm. In every case it must make sure that the greater good prevails over the lesser. As it does so, no genuine human interest of any individual or group may be ignored. But it is equally imperative that no private or public interest be allowed to have its way if it denies other interests which are found by impartial judgment to be more important.

Now the falling off of public confidence in the Congress is, I am sure, a popular recognition of the fact that our national lawmaking body is failing in both these fields of its responsibility. But the failure in the second field is far more extensive and disastrous than in the first. With some degree of adequacy the legislature does represent our wants. But as an agent of our thoughts the Congress is a misrepresentative body rather than a representative one.

In both fields American political philosophy has been drifting into a belief which has eaten away the integrity of our representative institutions. We have said that every interest, when expressed, becomes a vote. And we have taken this to mean that every vote expresses, in the last resort, an interest—and nothing more. The outcome of this theory has been that we have thought of the halls of Congress as a battleground. They are for us places where any interest may thrust itself forward, may demand and fight for such attention and acceptance as it can get.

This is the "pressure-group" theory of legislation, a theory which has given a basis for lobbying in all its vicious forms. According to it, each legislator is fighting for some interest or some set of interests, and in the free-for-all which results when all the interests meet in the common arena, he must see to it that "his" interests are persistently and cleverly promoted. The process of legislation thus becomes one of struggle and compromise and bargaining. In that struggle interests are not equally represented. The powerful, the selfish, the unscrupulous fight their way to dominance. The weak, the generous, the scrupulous are unheard and unheeded. The free-for-all of partisan strife does not give equal representation to all the interests of all the people.

But it is especially in the second field, where plans are to be made, where interests are to be measured, where purposes are to be woven into a coherent pattern, that the pressure-group theory has undermined the legislative process. It is here that the present-day legislator falls far short of the present-day judge or administrator. The President, as he watches over our national interests in war or in peace, cannot trust the blind struggle of conflicting interests to make his decisions for him. He must think and plan and decide. He must take into account all interests and must try to resolve their conflicts by means of deliberate and well-considered policy. So, too, the Supreme Court; so, too, Mr. Stimson, or Mr. Hull, or Mr. Nelson, or General Marshall. These men are responsible for the welfare of the nation as a whole. They must therefore study the forces at work and seek to control them. They must, as we like to say, "get tough" whenever private interest or individual stupidity stands in the way of the general welfare. But that means that they are doing what Congress is apparently unable to do. They are "deliberating." It is a curious and tragic reversal of the basic presuppositions of our scheme of government when it can be said that "deliberation" upon our common problems is to be found not in "the deliberative assembly" but in the courts of judicial decision and in the offices of executive administration.

IV

What shall we Americans do in the face of this constitutional crisis which has come upon us? There is no quick and ready answer to that question. The difficulty goes too deep for easy mechanical remedies. We cannot remove it merely by devising new political machinery. It rises out of our national understandings and misunderstandings of what freedom is and what government is. Very near to the source of it is the false theory of "localism" which has played such dreadful havoc in the field of American education. Appeal to that localism is today the favorite device of those who, with or without good conscience, fight for selfish advantage at the expense of the common good.

But these words are not written to offer a solution of the problem. Their purpose is, rather, to insist that the problem must be faced and studied by everyone who has regard for the basic principles of our government. First of all, we must recognize that our representative institutions have gone wrong. Our political smugness must be shattered. We owe many good things to the political genius of President Roosevelt, but I am inclined to believe that no action he has taken will prove to be more significant than his recent challenge to the legislative branch of the government. He challenged not primarily the control of prices but rather the efficiency and integrity of the process by which our laws are enacted. On an earlier occasion he issued a like challenge to the Supreme Court. That action was open to serious question, but this time he is clearly right. The representatives of the people must represent them. And they are not doing so.

One additional remark must be made. In my opinion, the principle of the primacy of the law-making body is fundamentally valid. The Congress must be first among equals. It must stand higher in public confidence than either the executive or the judiciary. And the practical question is: How can that principle be reestablished in our political life? If we are to have a government under law, then the making of the laws must be recognized as the expression of the highest intelligence, the most resolute purpose, of the people. Only as it meets that demand will Congress be restored to its proper place of dominance in our political life. Representative government rests not upon the freedom of our interests but upon the freedom of our minds. The basic question is: Can Congress, as a legislative body, represent the mind and will of America? Can Congress think—as a deliberative body must think if it is to take the lead in a government of equality and freedom?

Hymn to Victory, by a Sailor on Shore Leave

Hail to thee, Victory!
Victory dresses and Victory hats,
Victory camembert, Victory spats,
Victory coffee-bags, Victory milk,
Victory undies (much better than silk),
Victory doughnuts, they're shaped like a V,
Victory pants—not a cuff will you see,
Victory malteds to keep up your strength,
New cigarettes in a Victory length.
Science has leaped o'er the grimmest of hurdles:
Hail to the rubberless Victory girdles!
Double-size Victory bottles for booze!
Victory cocktails to lighten the news!
Try Viktori-Rub for that pain in your chest,
Eat Victory bread, Uncle Sam says it's best;
And when your lips murmur a prayer for the dead,
Be sure that your lipstick is Victory red.

Hey diddle diddle! Rome's burning, let's fiddle!
"Here's an idea, boys—hot off the griddle!
Looks like our sales are beginning to droop;
How about launching a Victory soup?
Red, white, and blue stripes all over the can,
Under the trademark a shot of Bataan;
Plaster the land from Seattle to Trenton
(Dignified copy, though—paintings by Benton).
Hang the expense, it would all go in taxes;
Here's the big tag—'In the Soup with the Axis!'"

... Oh, say, can you see, by the dawn's early light,
Sales going up, with the end not in sight,
Ads getting bigger and sales mounting higher,
Climbing like flames from a city on fire?
Hail to thee, Victory, goddess so fair,
Torch in the night of a sailor's despair,
Sent from on high to the land of the free
To replace Latakia and Vitamin B.
Victory, hear—when this struggle is past,
And the full, final triumph is ours at the last,
We'll leave to the billboards that name maledictory;
Whatever we call thee, we'll not call thee "Victory!"

Americans Can't Be "Frozen"

BY THOMAS FOYLE

LET'S be honest with ourselves about this question of man-power. Involved in it are four uncomfortable facts which must be faced squarely before a satisfactory solution can be reached. These facts are:

1. There is a strong prejudice in many industries against employment of women, Negroes, Jews, aliens, and first-generation American citizens.

2. Public opinion is turning against the closed or union shop; and it is not easy to justify forcing a man to join a union because he works at a job which he has been forced to accept.

3. Wages are very unequal throughout the United States for jobs requiring comparable skill and physical effort.

4. Equalizing wages on a basis of skill and effort would require either an inflationary increase in total pay rolls or drastic reduction in the pay of certain skilled and strongly unionized workers.

Unless the war is won sooner than anyone has a right to expect, these four facts will interfere seriously with the production necessary to win the war. At best, solutions for the problems they present cannot be found before much damage has been done. If they are not dealt with soon, victory may be long delayed, and if they are not dealt with at all, victory in war may mean defeat for decency and progress in the reaction which will come with peace.

Prejudice against women and minority groups is slowly giving way before the pressure of circumstances. Few employers are so reactionary that they will turn away business rather than change their employment policies, and from now on most employers will have to take any workers they can get or do without workers. The problem will be chiefly to guarantee fair and equal treatment for the new employees. Even though there is likely to be a revival of prejudices after the war, there will be some net gain in tolerance, as there was the last time.

The union question is more delicate. If there is a draft of man-power by federal legislation, Congress will be under tremendous pressure to include a provision which would outlaw the closed shop at least so far as new workers are concerned, and there is a good chance that all closed or union-shop contracts will be voided for the duration. An unyielding attitude by union leaders on this point might easily lead them to disaster. Now is a time for political realism, not for stubborn clinging to principles which were developed when the nation was at peace and unions were struggling for a toe-hold in mass-production industries. Every poll of public opinion indicates that the newspaper campaign against strikes in war industries, dishonest as it is on the basis of statistics, has been widely effective. In the long run the unions stand to gain far more by voluntary action which would disarm hostility than by a last-ditch battle for their abstract rights, whether they win or lose.

Nor is political expediency the only reason why unions should act with some caution in war time. The economic and moral justifications for a union shop of the traditional type are largely lacking when wages and working conditions are fixed by government decree. Collective bargaining has been virtually suspended, for reasons accepted by an overwhelming majority of the American people, and for the duration the chief function of unions has been wholly changed. Their contribution to war production in providing a mechanism for adjustment of grievances, in making suggestions for greater efficiency, and in reporting bad management practices to government authorities and to the public is of the greatest value. But it would be hard to argue that this contribution depends upon a closed or union shop.

On the other hand, the unions have every right to insist that the war should not be made an excuse to sabotage the gains they have already made, or to train millions of potential scabs. Union leaders have an opportunity for constructive leadership in suggesting a solution to this problem which would win public support without sacrificing the principles of unionism. They might, for example, offer memberships to emergency war workers with nominal dues, and might even consider allowing non-union workers to be employed in closed shops if union rights were properly safeguarded by long-term contracts. The unions have much to gain by offering temporary concessions of their own free will, and everything to lose if they offer nothing. They are now dealing primarily with public opinion rather than with employers—whose labor costs in the heavy industries are largely paid by the government—and it will be tragic if they fail to adjust their actions accordingly.

Moreover, the unions particularly and labor in general have an opportunity today which transcends any program for standing pat on the gains of the last ten years. For the first time since the Industrial Revolution conditions are becoming ripe for labor solidarity based on equal pay for equal work throughout a whole nation. The stumbling-block to labor unity for sixty years has been the fact that the privileged classes of labor could not join the rest without losing their special advantages. Skilled workers had a stake in existing conditions, not only in their own higher wage rates, but also because sweatshop conditions in non-union industry kept down the prices of the shirts and food and luxuries for which they spent their money.

Today, prices are frozen. The threat of inflation is being used as an argument to freeze wage rates also. But farm labor and poorly paid labor generally will not stay put when jobs go begging at high wages in shipyards, plane factories, arsenals. The notion that men can be frozen to their jobs when much more money is offered elsewhere borders on the fantastic; Americans are not built that way, and neither persuasion nor force will keep them in one place when they can do better somewhere else.

In sober terms of war production, over a period of more than a few months, the idea is hopeless. Preventing a man from taking advantage of opportunity is so wholly contrary to American tradition and to every statement of the aims for which the war is being fought that it is hard to accept it as the suggestion of a sane person. It is, quite literally, a proposal to freeze the status quo ante bellum, and that is most certainly not what we are fighting for. There is something monstrous in this delusion that the way to win the war is to keep everyone, except those drafted into the army, exactly where he is now. It is equally reactionary to propose that men and women should be shifted from one job to another without regard to the rates of pay.

But how can wages be equalized on a fair basis without starting a cycle of inflation which would be disastrous to the middle-income groups who hold the balance of political power? More specifically, how can the United States provide adequate incentive for the production of food without raising the price of subsistence beyond the means of four families out of five?

These questions must be answered not only in relation to winning the war, but also in relation to conditions after the war. If it is the intention of the people of the United States to keep on paying farm labor much less than industrial labor—and to pay textile labor much less than automobile labor—then the chances are that the war inflation and post-war deflation of twenty-five years ago will be repeated. The pressure of labor supply and demand during the next year will blow the lid off any attempt to keep the arbitrary differentials between various wages and prices exactly as they are today. There is no justice in many of the existing wage differentials, and there is no logic in many of the existing price differentials. Sentimental arguments about soldiers fighting and dying for $50 a month will not long carry weight in a country where more than one-third of the families have less than $50 a month clear above room and board, and another third have a hard struggle to make ends meet.

For the moment, the United States is still enjoying war prosperity. The stores are well stocked with goods no longer being produced. Unemployment is disappearing. But real hardship and the impact of a new tax bill are just around the corner. When the people begin to feel the blow, they will not take kindly to a freezing of conditions which are not, as they thought, the conditions of November, 1942. When the full meaning of this war hits them in their pocket-books and in their standards of living, their anger against a program which purported to keep things as they are today will grow in intensity, and it may turn in any direction. Talk about equality of sacrifice means nothing yet, because there has been little real sacrifice. But when the United States faces both casualty lists and lack of consumers' goods next year, the gross inequities of wages and prices frozen at current levels may gravely disrupt this country.

There is no serious demand for dead-level equality, for paying the cotton picker or the loom tender exactly the same wage as the skilled mechanic. At the same time there is an increasing realization that many of the cotton pickers and loom tenders are quite capable of becoming skilled mechanics in a few months, and these workers are not likely to accept a 1,000 per cent difference in wages if at the same time they are denied the right to become mechanics. Since we must have cotton pickers and loom tenders to win the war, the only alternatives are to pay them more or to keep them in their places by force. No matter what pretty words man-power stabilization is dressed up in, it comes down to one of those two things.

And keeping Americans in their places by force—even by vote of Congress—is not likely to win the war unless we have the improbable luck to win a full victory before the people know what has been done to them.

To win the war, and to win the peace after the war, a flexible system of adjusting wages, prices, and employment is infinitely preferable to any attempt to freeze them. To be honest about it, a flexible system would mean some inflation—the degree depending upon the skill with which it was handled—and the political tides are all against that at the present moment. Middle-class families with comparatively fixed incomes are in the saddle. They are not only numerous enough to be effective, but sufficiently justified in their fear of a run-away depreciation of the dollar which would wipe them out to have the support of poorer people with a sense of fair play. Unfortunately, they do not see that their attempt to stand without bending at all may lead to a break which will destroy them completely. The sentiments of the political leaders who are trying to achieve wage and price stabilization are praiseworthy, but the effort to postpone adjustment of gross inequalities of wages and salaries until after the war is likely to lose the war. Liberals, radicals, and reactionaries in the United States have apparently reached a curious agreement on a war economy which has no resemblance to either laissez faire or socialism and no virtue except that it puts a sudden stop to argument. But it will not do.

The United States in its war economy can easily afford to make adjustments in wage rates which will satisfy workers compelled to stay in the jobs where they are most needed. Obviously wage rates should be adjusted upward wherever necessary, and where necessary, prices should be adjusted upward to meet the increased wages. Moderate relative increases in some prices will provide a basis for a much sounder economy after the war, and any inflationary tendency caused by increased wage payments which are not compensated for by the moderately higher prices of such commodities as food and textiles can be adjusted by generally increased taxes.

The proposal is not utopian. Workers as a whole will be satisfied if reasonable adjustments are made. Full adjustment is a long-range problem to be dealt with after the war. But it should not take an extended argument to prove that there will be more war production if some wage adjustments are made, to correspond with war man-power needs, than if men are told arbitrarily to work at certain jobs for whatever those jobs pay.

For the moment, the war man-power picture seems to have got badly out of focus, with a lot of emotionalism about draftees and the horrors of inflation. In perspective, it becomes a natural part of the economic changes which everyone accepts in theory as a consequence of the war. The odd thing is that so many people expect the economic consequences to wait until the war is over.

A MOVIE SHORT now being shown in theaters throughout the country contains an appeal for scrap material by Donald Nelson and numerous pictures intended to convince the audience that steel and rubber shortages are an immediate obstacle to all-out production. Another being shown simultaneously in some houses warns against loose talk. One example of this, it says, is the story that we may lose the war because we are short of raw materials. Actually we have all we need, says the commentator, and the film shows huge stockpiles of steel and rubber.

THE LOS ANGELES TIMES, which favored the reelection of Representative Leland Ford, a leader of the anti-labor forces in Congress, defended its position on military grounds. It would be unfair to the army, the paper said, to relieve it of such a vigorous and capable young officer as Lieutenant Will Rogers, Jr., Ford's opponent, by electing him to public office. And it would be harmful to the morale of parents whose sons have been drafted to allow soldiers to return to civilian life merely by being elected to Congress.

THIS COLUMN on October 24 cited "rumors in Washington" to the effect that A. A. Berle, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State, was about to become a Catholic. We have the best possible authority for reporting that these rumors, though persistent, are unfounded; that Mr. Berle was baptized a Congregationalist and expects to stay one.

A WRITER in a Brussels Nazi paper laments the refusal of some Belgian mayors to register babies who have been christened with German names. "I have heard," he wrote, "that some mayors refuse to allow Germanic names to be given to our children. But what could be more beautiful than a name like Erwin, which means 'man of honor,' or Oswald, which means 'holy power'?"

CITY COLLEGE in New York, which once was the center of agitation against military training for undergraduates, now has the largest volunteer R. O. T. C. unit in the country—3,157 members.

GAS RATION COUPONS sell at about fifty cents a piece in the black markets on the East Coast.

ASKED FOR A STATEMENT on a murder believed to be the work of a Negro, Governor Paul B. Johnson of Mississippi said: "I'm doing everything I can to locate that Negro murderer and to see that he is . . . given the benefit of as fair and impartial a trial as would be given to any Negro charged with murder."

American Progressives—Your Hour

WITHOUT indulging in the delusion that the peoples of the earth are fighting to establish the American Century or that America alone should order the march of the democratic coalition, it is certain that no other nation can so dominate the outcome of the present struggle as the United States. That is what gives the question of America's position on the problems of the war and the peace such overwhelming importance. To rise to its task, this country must liquidate the last vestiges of isolationism and substitute a constructive and bold democratic foreign policy.

Pearl Harbor put an end to isolationism in its most virulent form. Among his political opponents Roosevelt lost to the Axis his place as Enemy No. 1, though only to become Enemy No. 2. The slogan "Better Hitler Than the People's Front," had been so closely identified in France with the betrayals of the Pétains and Laval that after Pearl Harbor the American isolationists dared not openly adapt it for domestic use. "Better Hitler than the New Deal" could become a respectable public expression only in the eventuality of a negotiated peace. For the moment it was not a platform on which even a Hamilton Fish would feel entirely comfortable.

But we must not deceive ourselves. Isolationist thinking survived the terrific shock of December 7. In one way it is natural that this should be so. Even among the best Americans the tradition of the long period preceding the First World War was still alive—that period in which America's political and economic development followed its own energetic course, rather removed from that of the rest of the world. Suddenly, in 1917, the United States plunged into the struggle of the nations and within a year turned the tide in favor of the Allies. Nothing was better calculated to liquidate the isolationism of the previous century. But hardly had the last shot been fired in Europe than America again withdrew into its traditional detachment.

Twenty years later neither the terrific lesson of 1939-40, with the destruction of a dozen independent nations and the immediate menace of an attack on England, nor the Nazi penetration in Latin America was sufficient to induce certain American elements to abandon their isolationism. Isolationism, in fact, showed itself capable of resisting every reality. The Hitler war was a world war, all right, not only because the fighting engulfed one continent after another, but because for the first time in history a nation and a regime openly promised to make good the megalomaniac dream of world domination. American planes flying to Europe in eight or nine hours without landing liquidated a part of the isolation. The other side of the coin was also visible to everyone. In the same number of hours European planes could fly to New York. The plane led the way, arguing the interventionist case. Policy followed, hesitating. And more hesitating still, the general thinking of a country of 130,000,000.

But let us suppose isolationism definitely overcome. There remains the second part of the problem. The mere fact of ceasing to be isolationist does not make a foreign policy democratic. In the case of the United States the main danger lies in the absence of an organized left to fight efficiently for a progressive foreign policy. Though they agree in their general position, the groups of intellectual liberals are disconnected. Labor was until recently predominantly isolationist. Today its interest in world affairs has deepened in a most encouraging way. But labor is not yet a force that influences the foreign policy of the United States. With all its millions of organized workers, American labor has not the strength and perhaps not even the desire to force its way into the inner councils of government as has British labor. If the American labor movement were to take the same interest in international problems that it takes in trade-union problems, an army of eight million organized workers would be decisive in the waging of political war.

To create a popular basis, not in terms of emotion, but of political efficiency, for a foreign policy oriented toward a people's peace is the immense task that confronts American liberals and labor leaders. It is their hour. And it would be most encouraging if such groups were to come forward with some concrete proposal that would give their intervention a realistic quality. The first and most important change to introduce in the present situation is the creation of an Inter-Allied Political Council to conduct the war as a war of the people. We are convinced that the struggle itself will impose the creation of such a council—whether with the will of the leaders of the United Nations or against their will. We are convinced of this because the alternative is defeat, and as we have said many times, the peoples are not going to allow themselves to be defeated only because of the obstinacy or the routine conservatism of their leaders. The creation of a council now could spare the democracies many disasters. A delay of six months or a year may lead to a situation in which the first task of the council would be not to wage political war against the Axis, but to reestablish peace between the United Nations themselves.

But in the United States the Attorney General's decision, though in itself it must be warmly applauded, will have harmful consequences if it is not coupled with another measure. The government should announce that proceedings have been initiated to deprive of their citizenship certain prominent persons of Italian extraction who have taken part in Fascist activities during these last years, thus showing that their oath of allegiance to the American Constitution was taken with mental reservations.

All Fascist agents for the past twenty years have been teaching citizens and residents of Italian origin in this country that "democracy" is stupid, gullible, and inefficient, and that it can be challenged by anyone without danger. If the stigma of "enemy aliens" is removed and nothing more done to give evidence that "democracy" knows how to be firm when necessary, generosity will be construed as stupidity.

Attorney General Biddle has provided the Fascist agents—who are still active and aggressive everywhere—with a fresh argument discrediting "democracy." "At last," they are telling simple-minded people, "we have won our point. We are always in a position to dictate our will to Washington. We have demanded that the Italians be no longer regarded as enemy aliens. And we have got what we wanted."

There is no need for hecatombs. No more than two or three score people out of one million Italians in New York, half a dozen in Boston, a dozen in Chicago, should be singled out. But they should be taken from among the big shots and not from among the small fry, and the widest possible publicity should be given to their names and their punishment. To deprive of his citizenship some braggart like Domenico Trombetta when the highest leaders of the Fascist movement are left undisturbed, even kept in key positions, will lead nowhere.

BY ARGUS

THE political strategists of Berlin have had ample opportunity recently to ring changes on the theme of the disunity among the United Nations. Such demonstrations as the demand for a second front or the editorial in Life have not escaped them. For weeks they have been passionately reminding the Russians of the treachery of the London plutocrats, and the English of the arrogance of the Moscow bolsheviks. When speaking to America they have, pro Life, denounced the perfidious egotism of the British; and when speaking to the countries of the British Empire, they have, contra Life, declaimed against the self-seeking perfidy of the Yankees. It was inevitable. The chief aim of Nazi foreign propaganda is to strengthen any tendency toward mutual dislike or distrust among the various members of the United Nations.

The dissensions of the Allies have also been a favorite topic with the German people during the past few weeks. All through October the press and the domestic radio have resounded with it. It is said not only that each of the Allies is completely indifferent to the war the others are waging, but that each is carrying on a Machiavellian war against the others. That is the situation between the "Anglo-Saxons" and the Russians, and even more markedly between the Americans and the English. America is fighting only a nominal war against Germany—as camouflage. Its real purpose, the motive underlying all its acts, is to destroy the British Empire and inherit its lands.

It is fantastic, the incidents that are seized on to make the German people believe in this shadow war of "American imperialism" against Great Britain. Secretary Knox made a statement that the American navy would soon be the largest in the world. What did he mean by the largest, and what did he mean by soon? Simply that America intends to take over the British fleet and incorporate it in its own navy. Word has been received—false or true—that the American government has been granted the use of a railroad in Canada. That means, of course, that "sooner or later Canada will be swallowed up by the United States."

One wonders whether such stories—provided that they find credence—arouse any interest or emotion. Probably not. To the average German today nothing seems of less importance than which flag is finally going to wave over Canada or what will be the future relationship between England and the United States. However, a propaganda which is active twenty-four hours a day must sometimes use rather unpromising material.

Whether the fantastic story of anti-British American imperialism is accepted as true is another question. Obviously its inventors assume that at least part of their public will believe at least part of the tale. It is a fact that some Germans tend to view any alliance between states as a mask for attempts to swindle each other. During the First World War many informed persons, addicted to this brand of realism, were wholly convinced that the English could never be turned out of Calais. Published documents show that Marshal Hindenburg, for example, was of this opinion. At the end of September, 1918, when Ludendorff proposed that Germany ask for an armistice, Hindenburg answered, "But we must lay down the condition that the English shall not keep Calais." Ludendorff interrupted him harshly: "It is not the time for that now." For four years the Field Marshal had been convinced that the ultimate purpose of France's ally, England, was to despoil France.

This throws light on how certain groups in Germany conceive of their own obligations toward their allies.

G. E. F. (Ilium)

BY JOEL SAYRE

SAMUEL BUTLER, that perverse man, once argued that the "Odyssey" was written by a young woman. Well, whoever Homer was or wasn't, a young woman surely did not write the "Iliad." Whoever had the final say on the "Iliad" had been to the wars. He had been in battle, and he knew how it looked and smelled and sounded and felt. In their sharpness of detail, both visual and emotional, great chunks of the "Iliad" seem as modern as the finest Hemingway. Yes, I would bet any money he had been in many a battle, this fellow who put the "Iliad" together, for he knew all the gear, and how the men talk when they are sore at each other, and all the old soldier tricks. As they say in the Marine Corps, he was salty. What a combat correspondent!

These Greek troops—they had been on this front nine years, remember—are as genuine as the characters in "What Price Glory." You might argue that they themselves were marines, for they were at home on board ship, too. They are brave in battle, homesick out of it, interested in equipment—Homer stops his story a long time for an almost microscopic description of Achilles's armor—and in girls, food, drink, sports. As for their serious side, exactly as Catholic soldiers in the field nowadays are careful about their religious duties, so the more pious Greeks would not think of neglecting their proper sacrifices and prayers. And when anybody gets hit, Homer gives it to us the way it was, in close-up slow motion.

Besides all this wonderful reporting, which could take some cutting in spots, there are characters you can't forget: Thersites, the silly, chattering guardhouse lawyer who has been found in every outfit that ever fought in any war; Odysseus, the smart operator, greatest master of strategy or tactics in the whole campaign; Diomedes of the loud war cry, who in civil life raised man-eating horses; Nestor, the first Old Soldier in literature, endlessly complaining that he can't understand what's got into these kids of 1183 B. C.—when he was their age, men were men; Helen, the War Aim, who kept insisting to the Trojans, "You must think I'm terrible!"; Patroclus, the young squire of Achilles, who, sulking in his tent, couldn't stand it any more when the Greeks began to get their brains kicked out and rushed back into battle to save the day and the war and be killed; Chryseïs of the Fair Cheeks and Briseïs of the Fair Cheeks, the two Charmaines that caused all the trouble between Achilles and Agamemnon, a stupid boothead of a man if there ever was one; poor old Priam, father of Hector and forty-nine other sons; and Paris, the pretty boy, whom his brother, great Hector, caught strutting and wenching back in the city when every man was needed in the lines.

But what makes you positive that Homer was in the field himself was the way he understood fear. Take the great scene near the close where Achilles has driven all the Trojans back into the city except Hector, who stands there in front of the gates. His mother, Hecuba, and old Priam plead with him piteously, but he won't move; he just waits there while the terrible Achilles runs toward him. Then this superb Homer goes inside Hector's mind and gives him a short, sad day dream as he watches Achilles come closer and closer. What would happen if he took off his armor and laid aside his spear and stepped out, offering to shake hands? Suppose he made Paris give Helen back to Menelaus and all the riches he stole with her, and they agreed to throw in half the city of Troy for reparations. Why wouldn't that be the way to end this awful thing? But then he takes another look at Achilles, sees his face and the smoke pouring out of his shinguards, and he knows he has just been thinking foolishness.

Suddenly his nerve snaps. He turns and runs, and with Priam and Hecuba and all the Trojans watching from the walls, he is chased by the swift-footed Achilles. Then Hector gets hold of himself and turns to make his last stand. He puts up a great fight, a fight that he should have won; but it is down for him to die, and as he dies he asks Achilles please to send his body back to his family. But Achilles says, "The only family that'll be at your funeral, Jack, will be the dog family and the vulture family." So Hector says, "All right, you iron-hearted bastard. You're living on borrowed time yourself. I hope you know it's all set for Paris to get you. Ha ha, my silly little brother, Paris. That's a good one, that is." He dies. Achilles strips the armor off him, and then the other Greeks come up and stick their spears in him, one after the other.

Achilles is spoiled, selfish, swollen-headed, and lacking in team spirit, like a star athlete who goes on strike because he thinks he isn't appreciated, but you never have any trouble believing how good he is once he gets going. Even when he battles a whole river in torrent, you somehow believe it. If you saw that in a movie, what a sequence it would make!

The "Iliad" is also a poem, in case anybody has forgotten. Achilles is trying to cremate Patroclus. He has put his dead friend on the pyre with horses and cattle and a dozen young Trojans for kindling, but he can't get the fire lighted:

But the pyre of the dead Patroclus kindled not. Then fleet-footed Achilles had a further thought: standing aside from the pyre he prayed to the two winds of the North and West, and promised them fair offerings, and pouring libations from a golden cup besought them to come, that the corpses might blaze up speedily in the fire and the wood make haste to be enkindled. Then Iris, when she heard his prayer, went swiftly with the message to the winds. They, within the house of the West Wind, were feasting all together at meat, when Iris sped thither and halted on their threshold of stone. And when they saw her with their eyes, they sprang up and called to her, everyone to sit by him. But she refused to sit and spoke her word: "No seat for me; I must get back to the streams of the Ocean, to the Ethiopians' land where they sacrifice hecatombs to the immortal gods, that I too may feast at their rites. But Achilles is praying to the North Wind and to the loud West Wind to come, and promising them fair offerings, that ye may make the fire be enkindled whereon lieth Patroclus, for whom all the Achaians are making moan."

She having thus said, departed, and they rose with a mighty sound, rolling the clouds before them. And swiftly they came blowing over the sea, and the waves rose beneath their shrill blast; and they came to deep-soiled Troy and fell upon the pyre, and loudly reared the mighty fire. So all night drave they the flames of the pyre together, blowing shrill; and all night the fleet Achilles, holding a two-handled cup, drew wine from a golden bowl, and poured it forth and drenched the earth, calling upon the spirit of the hapless Patroclus.

Can We Win with Planes?

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

IN A period which has seen only moderate naval and air activity and fighting by less than 1 per cent of the troops in our army, blueprints for defeating the Axis have appeared by the score. A campaign in the North Pacific, an invasion of Italy, a land offensive against Japan on the continent of Asia, victory through air power, and even psychological warfare have all had their more or less able advocates. The furor over strategy has produced a few weighty books, several brilliant defenses of military get-rich-quick schemes, and a fair amount of trash.

Most of these books plead a special cause, the use of some one weapon or line of attack. They offer air power or land power or sea power as the way to victory rather than all three. Because the air-power enthusiasts are the most vocal and persuasive of these special pleaders, it may be useful to survey the role of the airplane in the war to date.

World War II has developed two major uses for the airplane. First, it can be employed in the capacity foreseen by General "Billy" Mitchell and the Italian General Douhet and championed in recent years by Major de Seversky and Al Williams—that is, as a long-range striking weapon which can either win a war alone or so greatly damage economic life and morale as to make subsequent mopping up by army or navy a comparatively simple matter. The current bombing offensive of the Royal Air Force is an example of this use of air power, as was the Luftwaffe's unsuccessful all-out attack on England in 1940. Secondly, air power can be used as an extension of other forces. It played this role in the battles of Midway and the Coral Sea, and on land was a component part of a victory team in the German conquests of Poland and France and Rommel's defeat of the British in Libya last summer.

A study of the war to date shows us in which of these capacities it has been most effective. As an independent striking force air power has to its credit the destruction of ships, bases, cities, and industries, but it has never dealt a decisive blow. In the German counter-blockade of England, airplanes, despite great geographical advantages, have been only one-fourth as destructive as submarines. The current air offensive over western Germany has enjoyed many advantages—it has had large targets at close range and met inferior defending planes—but the undoubted devastation it has wrought has not crippled Germany's production centers, transportation, or armed forces. Whether it can do so in the future is a question yet unanswered.

On the other hand, as a cooperating force air power has usually been decisive. The exceptions are few. In Libya Rommel defeated an enemy superior in air power but failing to coordinate it effectively with ground forces; in the Burma fighting the A. V. G. for some time held the whiphand over the Japanese air forces, yet the British were steadily pushed back by the invading army. But in most instances an army that has lost command of the air or a naval force whose protecting umbrella of air power has been destroyed is earmarked for defeat.

Air power today is operating in four main theaters—

Egypt, the Soviet Union, Western Europe, and the Pacific. The Pacific is, of course, so vast as to include many lesser arenas. What are the conditions in each of these areas, and what may we expect of air power?

In Egypt the United Nations have had air superiority for at least a year. They have employed their airplanes as an independent striking force—with moderate success—and as a cooperating unit as well. In the first capacity the R. A. F. has hindered the shipment of supplies across the Mediterranean, sinking or crippling a number of ships and badly damaging harbor installations and supply dumps. But though its activities in this field have been of considerable value, they have not compensated for its failure to act in concert with the Army of the Nile. The stunning British defeats of early summer would almost certainly not have occurred had the troops benefited from the aerial reconnaissance and received the close support in battle which the superiority of the R. A. F. made perfectly feasible. The last-ditch stand of the British army before Alexandria was due in no small measure to a change in aerial tactics: the fliers were directed to put cooperation with the army before the bombing of military targets, no matter how tempting. Not aerial weakness but unintelligent use of our aerial strength has been responsible for the Allied disasters in Africa. The solution is being found in an improvement in tactics.

We know less about the air fighting in the Soviet Union. Both sides have used planes as support for their armies rather than as an independent striking force. Neither air force has at any time seriously threatened the destruction of the other, though the surprise and impact of the original German attack handicapped Soviet planes during the first few months of the war. Most of the time the Luftwaffe has been somewhat superior in numbers. Because air operations here and in Libya are usually conducted at low altitudes, some of our older fighter planes have done better on these fronts than elsewhere. The good quality of most types of Soviet planes has refuted the statements of such airmen as Major Al Williams, who before the war dismissed them as valueless misfits. The real surprise, however, has been the success of the Russian Black Sea Fleet in maneuvering under the nose of German air power.

In Western Europe too much was expected of both the R. A. F. and the U. S. Army Air Corps after the June raid on Cologne. There followed loose talk about thousand-plane raids every night and even wilder predictions of raids of five thousand planes a night. Since the replacement and maintenance problems of 1,000-plane raids are almost prohibitive, these expectations were not fulfilled. Only on two occasions, over Emden and Bremen, were the airmen able to repeat; bombing expeditions of from five hundred to a thousand planes have occurred only half a dozen times. Although centers as far distant as Genoa and Danzig have not been forgotten, attacks have been concentrated on northern France and western Germany. That they have achieved great destruction of material and impairment of morale is revealed by the industries that have been moved elsewhere and the as yet unfulfilled promises of help from both Göring and Goebbels. The summer and fall raids frequently dropped many times the quantity of explosives that fell on Coventry. German retaliation has been weak and intermittent.

The air offensive will increase in scope and effectiveness in the coming months as more American bombers become available for daylight raids and as the longer nights lengthen the range of British night bombers. At the same time, the fact that the Germans have not recalled their air force from Russia proves that Allied air activity is not yet considered a serious threat to German victory. Another disappointing feature of the air war in Europe was the unfortunate failure at Dieppe, in spite of Allied air dominance and close coordination between planes and landing forces.

In the southwestern Pacific, now an active area, the United States has clear-cut qualitative superiority in air power and possibly superior numbers as well. Here airplanes operate both independently and in conjunction with sea and land forces. While the inability of planes alone to prevent Japanese reinforcements and supplies from being landed on Guadalcanal is disappointing, the general record is good. Had sea and land units been managed recently with equal skill, the United Nations would undoubtedly be in a better situation.

At Kiska the Japanese seem destined to take an unmerciful pounding, since nearby American air bases now give us all the advantages. Unless a Siberian campaign is opened, this foothold has lost for the enemy the very slight strategic value it once possessed.

Meanwhile, aerial reinforcements have aided both India and China. In conjunction with the terrain obstacles, the reinforcement of British naval units, and the large Indian army, they have made an immediate Japanese attack on India unlikely. In China they have improved morale and aided the Chinese armies. The limiting factor on their effectiveness has been the difficulty of transportation and supply—especially the supply of gasoline. In evacuating airfields within bombing range of their homeland the Japanese probably knew that these fields could not immediately become bases for Flying Fortresses.

If there is one lesson which the war has emphasized more strongly than any other it is the need for cooperation. Victory is the reward of teamwork, not of brilliant solo performance. A command which has kept our air forces unified with the army and navy has made mistakes but has spared us many of the jealousies and squabbles which have hindered the teamwork of the two services.

BY CONSTANCE CARRIER

Out of the sterile eye he sees, or does not see, the live ones galloping by in angular grace, their manes and their tails blown back by the wind like banners, their hoofbeats heavily hollow against the ground.

And now the music begins: the machinery starts, and the wooden horse moves with it, his lifted forefoot ignorant always of motion, of the feel of the ground, the flare of his nostril a travesty on breath.

But he gains momentum, and the moving air slides over his painted body as over live hide:
he is carried around the core of the music—around and around and faster and faster till surely he has come into freedom at last, for almost the hoof paws at the air, almost the carved mane breaks the pattern to which hand shaped it, almost he leaps to run with the others across the measureless meadow.

But the music stops, and the ancient crazy engine slows to a grinding halt, and the moment is over, and the others, the living ones, gone, and he only left tethered, staring inscrutably, fiercely, speared on a rod, his mane blown back by no wind, his forefoot lifted.

Brown Among the Brass Hats

SUEZ TO SINGAPORE. By Cecil Brown. Random House.
$3.50.

EXPELLED from Rome, arrested as a spy by the Nazi invaders of Yugoslavia, Cecil Brown reached the Palestine border in high hopes. "Here there were men who wanted to kill Axis soldiers with the same lust to kill that I felt. . . . This was escape, mental and physical, from the Axis."

This honeymoon mood quickly changed to disillusion. Brown got on happily enough with the fighting British, for whose steadfast courage he again and again expresses the utmost admiration, but he was soon at loggerheads with the officials and brass hats. Everywhere he found himself tripping over red tape and banging his head against a blank wall of censorship. Buzzing like an angry bee and stinging every hand that refused to feed him information, or snatched from him the news he had gathered for himself, he tried in vain to make the British authorities see that their cause would be strengthened by giving America unvarnished reporting instead of bed-time stories.

All Mr. Brown's colleagues—including those British correspondents now struggling with censorship in Washington—will sympathize with his tribulations and applaud his valiant fight. But, it must be admitted, his valor often got the better of his discretion; somewhat suaver methods might have proved more effective in achieving the commendable task he had set himself. Stupid as many of the censors were, they were not always at fault, and some of them may be forgiven for resenting the brashness of a correspondent who, on occasion, seemed to take the attitude that the war was being fought chiefly for its news value and ought to be regulated to conform with American deadlines.

It must be admitted, too, that Brown was given to editorializing in a way which would have made a good copy-desk man, as well as a censor, reach for his blue pencil. For instance, on December 3, 1941, Sir Robert Brooke-Popham, commander-in-chief of the British forces in the Far East, gave a general off-the-record press interview on the subject of probable Japanese moves. He said, in effect, that while Japan might go off the rails, the indications were that it would not attack Britain or America at that time. Brown accurately scribbled on his note-pad: "They think it ain't going to happen"; but when he wrote the story of the interview, he began: "Informed quarters whose reliability unquestioned asserted Japan now virtually certain to engage in military operations and direction will be southward." The censor sent it back reading: "Informed quarters asserted Japan not certain engaging in military operations," which was a much more accurate summary of Brooke-Popham's talk. Brown, however, complains: "That, of course, changed the whole sense. My effort was to try to convey to the American people that war was coming out here. . . . The British still believed that war was not coming." Clearly Brown was a better prognosticator than Brooke-Popham, but as a reporter it was not his job to substitute his own views for those of the authority from whom his story had been derived.

In spite of such lapses, Cecil Brown is normally a good and careful reporter. His greatest story, brilliantly retold in this book, is of course the sinking of the Prince of Wales and the Repulse, a tragedy of which he was an eyewitness and nearly a victim. But apart from a few such set-pieces, the chief interest and value of the book are in its running account of the decline and fall of Singapore. And a grim tale of muddle, mismanagement, and complacency it is. Brown quotes Edgar Mowrer as saying that the legend of Singapore's "impregnability was the greatest hoax ever played on the American public." The truth seems to be that the British authorities, unwilling or unable to divert troops and materials on a really adequate scale to Malaya, built up the legend in the naive belief that they could scare off the Japanese. Instead of bluffing Tokyo—whose spy system functioned with unimpeded efficiency—they succeeded in persuading themselves that nothing would happen. Even the first Japanese raid didn't wake them up. They still relied on the "impassable jungles" of the Malay Peninsula to stop the enemy.

"Suez to Singapore" would be a better book if it were shorter. There are too many personal details, too many round-by-round accounts of fights with censors, each one depressingly similar to the last. In his broadcast talks Mr. Brown is forced to be terse; he may be allotted exactly three and a half minutes to describe a whole campaign. He can, therefore, be forgiven for seeking relaxation in a literary sprawl between covers. But his publishers would have been doing both him and his readers a service if they had cut this self-indulgence short.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Four Decades of American Prose

ON NATIVE GROUNDS. By Alfred Kazin. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.75.

ALFRED KAZIN'S study of the American prose literature of this century is an admirable book. Good in itself, it seems even better when compared with two works of smaller but similar intention, Bernard Smith's passionately dull "Forces in American Criticism" and Maxwell Geismar's dully passionate "Writers in Crisis." Mr. Kazin has no political partisanship to defend, no simple moralism to recommend. He writes with spirit, though an essentially good manner is too often spoiled by too much of itself; his scholarship is notable for range and painstakingness; his taste is mature and discriminating.

It is a good book and a saddening book. Some of its saddening quality is, I feel, unnecessary, but most of it is inescapable. Mr. Kazin believes, and he is right, that the common estimate of our literature has been too lenient, that we still judge our recent literary past with the pleased surprise that we have any books at all. And when it is judged, as Mr. Kazin judges it, by standards more than local, our literature of the last forty years seems far from adequate—seems, indeed, almost to have failed.

In saying this, Mr. Kazin says what is now in many people's minds. Now, in a period of literary pause, when literature seems to be waiting for events to resolve themselves, we naturally turn back to what we have so long considered the periods of fertility; we look for something in the not-so-distant past to fill the present gap, and we find very little. Sydney Smith's famous question was answered long ago: everybody reads an American book. The new question is, "Who rereads an American book?" To be sure, our classic literature of the nineteenth century still stands, but how easily the great names of twenty, fifteen, ten years back have become merely historical and symbolic. They are the names of the men who helped educate us, but can we read them now with the pleasure which, in literature, is profit?

Even when we take into account the natural impulse to overvalue what is contemporary and even if we take for granted that, in any period, the greater number of interesting writers must soon sink out of sight, we cannot help feeling that the proportion of the demodé and the impossible to read is too high. As Scott Fitzgerald said, there are no second acts in American lives, let alone third acts—not in American literary lives. We seldom see a writer grow in power, develop and go on to new things. The typical fate of the American writer is to burst forth with the perception of a moment, impress it on us, exhaust his own vision, and die.

Such, I think, is the saddening fact. It is hard, perhaps impossible, to explain. Mr. Kazin gives a good deal of weight to the rapidity with which American political and social situations change. By the time a writer has encompassed a particular situation it has passed, without giving him a chance to grow into it: to the writer, American life is a series of challenges from an antagonist who steps out of the fight and leaves his opponent flailing the air. And the pressure of rapid change has a provincializing effect, for the American writer becomes so preoccupied with the present and the local that he maintains no adequate relation with the past and the general, with the tradition of Europe or of his own America. Of this Anderson and Dreiser are examples. Then there is the public demand that every book be an event, so that no writer can easily conceive his career as a development; Sinclair Lewis exemplifies the effect of this demand. None of these, of course, is a sufficient explanation; the sad fact remains unexplained.

Yet perhaps Mr. Kazin makes the fact even sadder than it really is. His appreciation of achievement is both delicate and generous, yet he too much inclines to rest his judgments on the inadequacies rather than the accomplishments of a writer's work. Thus, to take a notable example, in dealing with John Dewey, Mr. Kazin ends with Dewey's lack of the tragic sense of life and supports his judgment with a quotation from Yeats. Perhaps this is a pertinent objection to make to Dewey (though it would be better as a comment on him), and I will not dispute it except to say that Dewey is not Yeats and that Yeats does not have the manipulative sense of life; but I think it is not an objection that qualifies, to the extent Mr. Kazin suggests, the monumental work Dewey achieved. So with Edmund Wilson: Mr. Kazin has a just appreciation of both Wilson's powers and limitations; yet he would have been even juster if he had begun with Wilson's limitations and ended with his powers, rather than the other way around.

There is, indeed, a saddening amount of individual failure in our literature, but there is also a heartening amount of general success. The individual figures shrink under close examination, any number of them did not fulfil the promise of their talents: but I cannot help feeling that the general achievement is large. And clearly Mr. Kazin thinks so too—the belief is implicit in the very tone of his book; the very assumptions by which he judges failure could have been made only in a culture that had developed successfully.

I am sorry that the plan of Mr. Kazin's book forced him to exclude the poets. They would have made the picture both more cheerful and more instructive. Not that all our poets are exempt from the judgment of inadequacy. But many of our poets, preoccupied as they are with form, hopeless of appealing to popular taste and of seeming to solve immediate situations, have been able to cultivate the inwardness and growth whose lack in the prose writers Mr. Kazin so often and so rightly deplures. When we have said all the hard things about the obscurity by which they have alienated popular taste, we must see that they, far more than the novelists and critics, have given us that rightness of tone which—we too often forget—is all-important in literature. The very saddest thing we can say of contemporary literature is that so few men's voices ring in our ears as trustworthy and lovable. I think all of us are beginning to be conscious of sharing Pascal's feeling that what we want is not the "writer" but the "honest man"—remembering of course that the voice of the honest man depends on the honesty of his art. What we have all become so dissatisfied with in our prose writers is exactly the tones of their voices—Anderson's quasi-religious cheerful whine, Wolfe's velvety self-love, Dreiser's sourness, Hemingway's brag, Faulkner's rant. And among the poets there are voices—Frost's, Cummings's, Stevens's, Van Doren's, Louise Bogan's, Ransom's—that can sound right and true.

And this suggests the ground of my disagreement with Mr. Kazin when he attacks the formal critics—Ransom, Tate, Blackmur, Cleanth Brooks—putting them at the opposite pole of critical extravagance from the Marxists. With the political assumptions of these critics, when they have them, I do not agree. With much of their method I have elsewhere expressed disagreement. But these critics with their precise, sometimes too precise, study of poetry have helped remind us what poetry is.

Other readers of Mr. Kazin's book will find other matters about which they will want to argue with him, and their disagreement will be, as mine is, the measure of the respect his book commands. Conceived on a grand scale and as not only a literary but a moral history, it is quite the best and most complete treatment we have of an arduous and difficult subject.

Progressive Unionism

THE DYNAMICS OF INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY. By Clinton S. Golden and Harold J. Ruttenberg. Harper and Brothers. $3.

LABOR practice and theory are coming of age. No longer forced to wage mere guerrilla warfare for recognition, organized labor is broadening the tactical approach to its interests to fit them into the interests of other useful functional groups in the community. The Golden-Ruttenberg book is an important expression of the new unionism.

The book comes out of the experience of the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee, now the Steel Workers' Union, in the years 1937 to 1941, as distilled through the understanding and imagination of a regional director and the research director of the union. Workers come alive in this book, animated by their needs and the needs of the community in which they work and live as workers and citizens. You will not find in these pages either the distortions of the limited old-style unionism or the distortions of "radical" doctrinaires who want to make labor the object of their struggle for totalitarian power. The book is fresh, clear-headed, realistic, yet unyieldingly faithful to labor's interests. It propounds thirty-seven "principles" of union-management relations; most of them are basic, only a few are incidental or dubious. The revealing discussion of many problems—the human as well as economic motives that impel workers to join unions, qualified property right in the job, the workers' quest for security, the case for the union, not the closed shop, the need for industry-wide collective bargaining—is knit together by understanding of the attitudes of both workers and management and by a broad grasp of economic tendencies and realities.

Case after case might be cited to prove the book's clear-headed, realistic, fresh approach. One of them is the need for wage equalization because of what the new technology is doing to old wage structures. Under the new technology, which is largely automatic, efficiency depends almost wholly on the mechanical equipment, not on the workers. Hence the value of incentive wage systems becomes nil. Moreover, wage rates based on the workers' muscle and skill are no longer an index of performance. Yet in the new continuous-strip steel mills, for example, sheet-metal workers—upon whom output used to depend, whereas it now depends on the equipment—are still paid a specific tonnage rate; this brings about unjust conditions, with one group of workers overpaid and other groups underpaid. It is one of the "most explosive" problems in union-management relations; the Steel Workers' Union is experimentally yet courageously tackling it in a move for equalization of wages.

Golden and Ruttenberg use the term "industrial democracy" in a narrower yet truer sense than the doctrinaire "radicals," to designate a constitutional democratic set-up in industry, where labor and its free unions have definite rights and powers in relation to management and government. It is not the metaphysical "industrial democracy" of communism, which ends in bureaucratic totalitarian mastery over the workers. The Golden-Ruttenberg conception of industrial democracy—democratic relations and inalienable rights in the places where people must work to live—fits into any form of economic organization, from private enterprise to public enterprise and cooperatives.

The Golden-Ruttenberg conception of union-management cooperation is much broader and more progressive than the one that prevailed in the 1920's. The older conception was largely an expression of union weakness; the new is an expression of union strength. While the new conception emphasizes the increased productive efficiency—cases are cited in which cooperation brought efficiency gains ranging from 20 per cent to more than 50 per cent—union-management cooperation as practiced by the Steel Workers' Union is an integral part of collective bargaining and proceeds under definite contractual relations, with machinery for research and planning composed of an equal number of union and management representatives; no worker loses his job from the greater efficiency that comes of union suggestions. Moreover, cooperation becomes the foundation of a constitutional order in industry where—in the words of the president of a steel company quoted by the authors—"the union and plant management are a kind of natural check and balance on one another."

The book closes with a plea for more governmental economic activity and planning to bring full production, which cannot be brought by collective bargaining and union-management cooperation. This is the least satisfactory part of the book since its argument is limited almost exclusively to the "industry council" idea, for which too much is claimed. More exciting and significant is the fact that the authors see what so many liberal intellectuals do not see—the danger of statism, the need to confine the state's new powers to those spheres where they are indispensable while allowing the largest measure of self-government to all useful functional groups in the community.

In a free society [they write] private groups can fail to settle their problems in direct relationships only at the peril of their independent existence, because each unsettled social and economic problem eventually finds its way into the halls of Congress. And when the government assumes final responsibility for the solution of these problems, private groups must forfeit certain freedoms and powers. Government action in the field of social and economic matters should be in the form of assisting private groups in our economy toward a solution. . . . The future of free America might well hinge on the extent to which industry will go in cooperation with organized labor, and government will go in encouraging it.

The Carrier Lex

QUEEN OF THE FLAT-TOPS. By Stanley Johnston. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

IT WAS a new kind of war to which Stanley Johnston sailed when the aircraft carrier Lexington set out from Hawaii one morning last spring for the South Seas. The experience was almost as new to the navy as it was to the lone newspaper reporter aboard. The Lex, as navy men called her, was twenty years old, but they had been peace years, and her wars had been fought on blackboards.

On this cruise she was put to the test, and so was her brand of warfare. She became the first American carrier to engage an enemy carrier in battle, and she sank it. She played the starring role in the war's first major naval engagement, the Battle of the Coral Sea, which was so predominantly aerial that the contending surface ships never came within gunshot of each other; the carriers and their planes decided the issue. She made history, and she went to the bottom in flames.

Mr. Johnston saw it all. His recounting of it is not too smoothly woven together; for the most part it is unadorned, and better so. He does not belong to the introspective school of war correspondents. His hero is the Lex, not himself, and he does not mention the fact that her commander asked the navy to cite him for heroism for having dragged seared men from the fires inside her in her dying hours. Later he and his paper, the Chicago Tribune, were under fire from the Navy Department because his background analysis of the Battle of Midway was supposed to have given away secrets. A grand jury cleared them. No one who reads this book could believe that Mr. Johnston would knowingly write a single word injurious to the navy.

If anything, he is over-enthusiastic. He likens the Lexington's battles to the conflict between the Monitor and Merrimac as a turning-point in naval warfare. To him the aircraft carrier is supreme, despite the loss of the Lex, and his book makes a convincing case. The battleship simply is not in the picture. Whether land-based planes will outmode the carrier, as Major de Seversky maintains, is a question at present irrelevant in these vast ocean areas of the Pacific; no land planes with sufficient range are available.

The value of Mr. Johnston's book lies in his fascinating details about the new warfare he watched. When dive-bombers attacked an enemy aircraft carrier, they started at 16,000 feet and followed each other down in the same track, "like salmon flashing over an immense waterfall." Scout planes two hundred miles at sea identified themselves by girls' names in reporting back to the Lex by radio: "Jean to carrier. Concentration enemy shipping Tulagi." A pilot in the clouds above the Lex reported a Japanese four-motored seaplane, and the carrier asked where it was. "Wait a minute and I'll show him to you," replied the pilot; sure enough, a minute or two later a large ball of fire spun to the water in the midst of the fleet. In the last hours of the Lex, when the ammunition was about to blow up, the men waiting to be rescued calmly ate up the ship's ice cream.

Mr. Johnston's book offers something no other correspondent has been able to write—a tale of war pioneers in action.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

To God via Semantics

PHILOSOPHY IN A NEW KEY: A STUDY IN THE SYMBOLISM OF REASON, RITE, AND ART. By Susanne K. Langer. Harvard University Press. $3.50.

PATHS OF LIFE: PREFACE TO A WORLD RELIGION. By Charles Morris. Harper and Brothers. $3.

THESE two books testify to a rather startling development, which has its tinge of irony. Hitherto theory of signs, or "semantics," has been chiefly associated—and especially in its popular manifestations—with debunking. The debunking has usually been directed against metaphysics, art, ethics, and religion in behalf of the scientific attitude. With Dr. Langer and Professor Morris, however, a more thorough philosophical exploration of semiotics—as the study is called by philosophers—has led to the conviction that science is not enough, that the symbols of art and religion have their indispensable value. Neither of the two philosophers in question, indeed, has been primarily a debunker. But both have acquired their reputations principally as students of the scientific uses of language. Mrs. Langer, of Radcliffe, has written an excellent "Introduction to Symbolic Logic," and Professor Morris, of Chicago, is an editor of the "International Encyclopedia of Unified Science" and the author of "Foundations of the Theory of Signs," a synthesis of those scientifically minded doctrines, positivism and pragmatism.

Mrs. Langer declares that for our age the key to both scientific and humanistic problems is the study of "symbolic transformation." This study is considerably more inclusive than what has been popularized as "semantics," and wider even than philosophy of language. In "Philosophy in a New Key," Mrs. Langer attempts to treat the scientific of ritual, myth, and art. To this end she draws upon the findings of psychoanalysis, anthropology, and aesthetic criticism as well as upon those sciences which have previously been the focus of semiotics.

What is distinctive about her philosophical approach is that it is, to put it technically, naturalistic without being reductive. The study of artistic and religious symbolism has for the most part been carried on by idealists who have been more concerned with establishing a transcendental source for mind than with analyzing its operations. When empirical and naturalistic thinkers, on the other hand, tackle these problems, they usually employ a heavy hand. They force the non-scientific uses of symbols into the scientific categories; or they dismiss them as "emotive"; or they "explain" them by means of such crude concepts as glandular functioning or conditioned reflexes. Mrs. Langer starts from the principle that man has characteristically human needs, and the chief of these is the need of symbolization. Man is the talking animal, the symbol-making animal. Other creatures use signs, but only man has the developed capacity to use symbols. Signs are proxies for objects, events, or situations—indications of their existence, past, present, or future; they are merely instrumental to action. Symbols, on the other hand, are both instruments and ends. Their primary function is representative, and they represent conceptions as well as objects. Man has a compulsive need to transform his experience into symbols, so that symbolization is an activity pursued in part for its own sake.

Mrs. Langer accepts the highly speculative theory of the "festal" origin of language, according to which speech becomes fixed in the rituals generated in the play-excitement following successful communal enterprise. Expressions whose meanings are thus established are applied to similar feelings and perceptions outside the festive situation, and speech develops by the dual processes of "emendation" and "metaphor."

Ritual and myth, then, are the twin sources of symbolism. Ritual begins in motor tendencies, and has as its chief function the articulation of emotional and practical attitudes toward the world. Myth begins in dream-fantasy, and develops through the folk tale, heroic legend, and epic into a coherent picture of social and cosmic forces, imaginatively represented.

From here on, symbolism branches out in two divergent directions. One is toward the logical and scientific functions of speech, which create language. The chief characteristics of language are a vocabulary of elements with fixed meanings, definite rules of syntax, and the logical implications that flow from these. The other direction of symbolism is toward artistic expression. Music, the art which receives most of the author's attention, is not, properly speaking, a language, for its notes do not constitute a vocabulary, since they do not have in isolation definite meanings which are retained when they are combined. Yet music is not mere self-expression; it has a semantic function. It represents and communicates "emotions, moods, mental tensions, and resolutions"; it gives a "logical picture of sentient, responsive life"; it is "a source of insight, not a plea for sympathy." It is suggested that the characteristic function of art in general is to give us a similar "knowledge by acquaintance" of our affective life.

The book concludes with a plea that our ethical and social thinking should take into account the universal human need for imaginative as well as logical symbolism. Man "can adapt himself somehow to anything that his imagination can cope with, but he cannot deal with chaos." Since logical symbolism does not suffice to organize our emotional and ethical attitudes, we need also the "charged" symbols with multiple meanings which have been supplied in the past by art and religion. "A life that does not incorporate some degree of ritual, of gesture and attitude, has no mental anchorage. It is prosaic to the point of total indifference, purely casual, devoid of that structure of intellect and feeling which we call 'personality.'"

In "Paths of Life," Charles Morris is less concerned with the general theory of symbolism than with establishing a set of concrete symbols which can help us to understand and direct our lives in a chaotic age. The conflicts of our time have emphasized the need for a "basic orientation of the total personality," and this, he declares, is the religious need. Yet no one of the existing traditions can now fill this need.

The first task, he holds, is to find a scheme for classifying the principal components of human personality. The components he singles out are the "Dionysian," "Promethean," and "Buddhistic," which consist respectively of the emotionally expansive tendencies, the active or manipulating tendencies, and the tendencies leading to self-restraint. Combined in various proportions, these give rise to six personality types, which he classifies as the Buddhist, Dionysian, Promethean, Christian, Apollonian, and Mohammedan. Arts, doctrines, and cultures take their form from the personality types which prevail in them.

Each of the six, however, Morris says, neglects some important aspects of human nature. So he proposes for our allegiance a new ideal of personality which he calls, after the future Enlightened One prophesied by Gautama Buddha, the Maitreyan. This is the completely balanced man, who will hold the Dionysian, Promethean, and Buddhistic components in equal proportion. Maitreyan man's goal is "detached attachment"; this consists in a critical humanism which seeks to absorb the partial insights of other points of view without falling into an amorphous eclecticism. Morris conceives Maitreyanism as not merely an ethics but a religion, and in an appendix he contributes some free-verse psalms to its liturgy.

Such attempts to will a religion have their sanguine side, and it is easy to laugh at them. Certain objections will readily occur: that religions in the past have not been created by fiat but by a slow and secular growth, that similar efforts, from the French Revolution's worship of the goddess of Reason, through Auguste Comte's Religion of Humanity, to the humanistic cult of the Reverend Mr. Potter of Chicago, have failed to win popular allegiance. A difficulty with the first two of these, at least, was that they attempted to cut a religion out of whole cloth. Professor Morris seems to be aware of the problem, since he says that in America we have our Christian and Promethean traditions to build on. A still further problem is the absence today of a rich popular store of myth, legend, and folk art such as frequently has blossomed into high religion. But our civilization is self-conscious as no previous one, and it is unlikely that a worthy new religious movement, if possible at all, would "just grow." The need which Mrs. Langer and Professor Morris are concerned with is such a tragically evident one that we should give ear to our prophets, however strange and uncouth may be the mantles they wear.

The Sorcerer as Elegist

PARTS OF A WORLD. By Wallace Stevens. Knopf. $2.

THE toucan is an enchanting bird. He is perky and pensive by turns. His round eye flashes as he eats, but when he has swallowed, the long beak bends slowly down, now to one side, now to the other, and the head is the head of a skeptic. Wallace Stevens, who often writes of toucans, is the most entrancing of them. But now he seems to have swallowed his magical world for good, and to watch him sadly contemplate the darkening scene is to wish, sometimes, that he were an eagle.

For it takes an eagle, preferably a Yeats eagle, to be at ease on the heights to which Stevens here aspires. Of course, he may become one: his growth has been steadily manifest these past twenty years. In "Harmonium" he created an enchanted country, uniquely rounded, wholly credible. It has its pathos, but chiefly that of individual yearning for a more perfect imagined universe: the "idea of a colony" in "The Comedian as the Letter C," the "paradise" of "Sunday Morning." In the two subsequent collections, "Ideas of Order" and "The Man with the Blue Guitar," the conflict of such longings with the increasingly cruel outer world is dramatized, and the poet's power grows with his theme. Once it was Crispin, the aesthete "comedian," "green crammer of the green fruits of the world," who sought a "mythology of self." Now it is "all people," those who "cry and cry for help," that must find again "the warm antiquity of self." And when the search leads to defeat and despair, Stevens approaches the tragic, as in The Men That Are Falling, which I consider his most intensely moving poem. But the present collection reveals that he has been experimenting with that perilous thing, the poet's answer to his own predicament.

Our time makes such answers peculiarly hard, because the predicament is largely imposed by the very formation of a poetic personality, a creative ambience. Colossal effort of will is needed in order to dwell for the needed time "where," as Henry James phrased it, "in the dim underworld of fiction, the great glazed tank of art, strange silent subjects float." And this effort necessitates a severance from the actual. How is the artist to "return," to set his art right with the world, if to do so he must employ the only creative processes he knows, those which established his unique world, his true mythical self?

As with Yeats, Stevens's attempt involves some rejection of former aims. Yeats "banished heroic mother moon and vanished, came to look upon the timid sun"; and Stevens cries, in Montrachet-le-Jardin, the most successful of these poems: "Bastard châteaux and smoky demoiselles, / No more. I can build towers of my own, / There to behold, there to proclaim, the grace / And free requiting of the responsive fact, / To project the naked man in a state of fact, / As acutest virtue and ascetic trove." But he doesn't build the towers; he chiefly proclaims that he can. In the series entitled Examination of the Hero in a Time of War he does make an impressive effort at construction, developing—by his accustomed devious routes, but with fewer green vistas than before—a concept of the hero as a redeeming, radiant force inherent in humanity: neither the superior "Leader" nor the uncreative "common man," but "Instead of allegory, / We have and are the man, capable / Of his brave quickenings, the human / Accelerations that seem inhuman." It is good doctrine, strongly and often beautifully stated, but not with the light and music, pensive and perky by turns, that made his other world so livable. These are more evident in the shorter, more personal poems, many of which are extremely lovely, notably On the Road Home and The Hand as a Being, utterances of a contemplative yet quickening love of the sensible world.

Stevens himself, as one would expect from so sure a critic of his work, seems disquieted by this development. He finds it necessary to append a comment stating that in war time "consciousness takes the place of the imagination." I assume that by "consciousness" he means "intelligence," but the choice of words is revealing. As the "unconscious" imagined world fades, the force that created it is supplanted by the endeavor to understand the total world—or so Stevens feels. But this feeling indicates that his is not the invincible imagination of the supreme poet, an imagination that always feeds, peace or war, week day or holiday, on precisely that "consciousness," in Stevens's sense of the word. Why, as it increases, does a Yeats grow greater, a Stevens become unsure? For one thing: toucan or eagle, Stevens's imagination matured in a willed detachment, Yeats's in a willed togetherness with the past and present of his nation. Such factors may have nothing to do with the difference between talent and genius, but they certainly affect the capacity of self-renewal.

IN BRIEF

THE STATUS SYSTEM OF A MODERN COMMUNITY. By W. Lloyd Warner and Paul S. Lunt. Volume II, Yankee City Series. Yale University Press. $3.

This is the second of six volumes in the most elaborate study of an American city ever made. The study is important, and this volume deals with a fresh and badly underworked aspect of American life. But the authors bury their readers under an avalanche of matter-of-fact summaries of statistical tables and charts. It is regrettable that such a magnificent study has been put together by the mechanical routine of the assembly-line. Professor Warner and his staff here analyze how the 17,000 people in a New England city, classified in six social classes (from upper upper to lower lower), group themselves into associations, cliques, economic, political, religious, and other structures. This has never been done before, and it is an important thing to do, particularly at this time when we Americans confront the urgent necessity of discovering how to weld our society together more securely and effectively. But the point in studying static structure is to get on beyond it to the understanding of dynamic interaction. And the authors largely let things stand as structure. The treatment of the phenomenon of "social class" is typical. The authors dislike "class" as the nasty controversial concept Karl Marx talked about; so they attempt to get down beneath the solid fact of "class" as an economic phenomenon to its allegedly more real essence in "social status." This procedure succeeds so well that it largely blunts the cutting edge of "class" as a dynamic analytical concept for dealing with the life of an industrial city.

UNTIL THAT DAY. By Kressmann Taylor. An Eagle Book, Distributed by Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.

The author of "Address Unknown" does a quiet, circumstantial but inevitably dramatic account of the Lutheran Church's fight against Nazism. Karl Hoffman, the son of a pastor in Magdeburg, was a student at the time of Hitler's coming to power; he joined his father in maintaining God against the swastika—a heroic battle and an uneven one in which the father is killed and the son is in constant danger until his final escape to America. A book to prove that at least some part of the church can and will fight when once it recognizes fascism's threat to its existence.

FAIR IS OUR LAND. Edited by Samuel Chamberlain. Introduction by Donald Moffat. Hastings House. $5.

A fine collection of strong, clean, and unpretentious photographs, weakened by the inclusion of a few insipid etchings. There are no contributions from the "Tobacco Road" school of photography, but an abundance of technically superb images of often fabulously beautiful landscapes. By way of foreword Mr. Moffat has deliberately written something so "fine" that even this hardened reader of picture-book prefaces still does not believe it to be possible.

THE PORT OF NEW ORLEANS. By Harold Sinclair. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

New Orleans, by all odds the most romantic American seaport, receives the least romantic treatment of any so far covered in the Seaport Series. As there is no dearth of romantic books on the subject, which possesses enough fascination to stand the most straightforward account, this is not in itself a drawback. The political and social history of New Orleans, however, is subdued to a mere adjunct of its economic rise and fall as the gateway to the Mississippi Valley, and its atmosphere and charm are dealt with in a rather grudging final chapter tacked on as compensation. The author's whole attitude is sharp and hard-boiled, doubtless in reaction to the lush travel writers. One is glad to have his plain facts but wishes for greater sympathy and proportion in their presentation. It is also a pity that he has not refrained from topical reflections more suited to newspaper correspondence, which will date the book almost immediately. Few subjects lend themselves better to illustration; but the pictures included are few, random, and not particularly interesting.

WHAT'S IN A NOVEL. By Helen E. Haines. Columbia University Press. $2.75.

The object of the book is to survey the content of the novel rather than to discuss styles or evaluate achievements in purely literary terms. Nevertheless, judgments are often made, upon the basis of a somewhat indiscriminating appetite. Several useful chapters deal with the European and South American novel as it has been translated into English. Miss Haines's volume might serve fairly well as a reader's guide, though the effects of her chapter on Reviewing a Novel might well be disastrous to one aiming to develop his critical insight.

MUSIC

THIS man, is he a musician—or is he a musicologist?" was the way one great musician expressed his opinion not only of a statement in a book, and of the man who had written it, but incidentally of what musicologists feel and think and find to say about music. The musicologists' own opinion of the value of their activities was expressed in Dr. Lang's statement in the American Scholar—that the public would get the guidance it needed when newspapers opened their columns to the scholars. They do not contend merely that their investigations into matters like "Dissonance in Early Polyphony up to Tinctoris" establish valuable facts in the history of musical language and style, or that their investigations into the relation of a musical style to the other human activities of its period establishes valuable facts in the history of culture; they contend instead that knowledge of such facts is indispensable for the complete experience and correct understanding of music as music. When they insist on our being aware of the relation between a piece of music and the other activities of its period it is not merely to give us correct notions about history: we are, as I understand it, to take Mozart's G minor or Beethoven's Op. 130 as a communication of the conditions, forces, tendencies of its period. Certainly it is possible to discover in a Cézanne still-life relations of its elements to what operated on Cézanne as he painted it—not only the work of other painters and their ideas about painting, but the general ideas and attitudes, the social and political conditions of his time. But it is possible also for a person with no notion of these relations to take the still-life for what it is and what it was intended to be—something exercising power on mind and emotions as an arrangement of pictorial elements. And so with one of Mozart's symphonies or Beethoven's last quartets.

Addressing a meeting of his fellows, Dr. Curt Sachs pointed out how they served music: "To music, elapsing in time and fading into oblivion, we give memory, permanence, and the dignity that history alone can yield." I have myself commented from time to time on the fact that while certain important works are played over and over again others are left unperformed; I have made this point about concertos of Mozart, sonatas, symphonies, quartets of Haydn, Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," "Childhood of Christ," "Trojans." But it is not such music that the musicologists serve. True, we are indebted to Dr. Alfred Einstein for the experience of those superb Haydn symphonies which the New Friends of Music let us hear for the first time: it was he who reconstructed the scores from various manuscripts of the parts. But Dr. Einstein, after giving us those Haydn symphonies, gave us two utterly inconsequential entr'actes from Mozart's "Thamos, King of Egypt." And the unfamiliar music of Handel promised by a public concert of the International Congress of the American Musicological Society a few years ago turned out to be mere exercises in which the youthful Handel tried his hand in styles of his period.

So with the music of earlier centuries, which Dr. Sachs probably was referring to. Musicologists are concerned about the belief of some people that nothing written before Bach is worth attention. "Music," wrote Dr. Lang in his article, "was a vital part of the culture of all ages and was affected by the same intellectual tendencies that animated the other arts and letters of the time"—the point being that the intellectual tendencies in early centuries which produced great literature and painting and architecture must have produced music as great as these other arts, and as great as the Mozart symphonies and Beethoven quartets of later centuries. But this contention is refuted by our own century, which has produced the painting of Picasso, among others, but no music of comparable magnitude: it is possible, then, for early centuries which produced great architecture or painting to have produced less great music, or music which satisfied their emotional requirements but not ours. And the contention is made not on behalf of the music of Victoria, Lassus, Palestrina, Byrd, the other English madrigalists, Monteverdi, Purcell—which many music-lovers do know and find beautiful; but on behalf of things like the inconsequential little pieces which Dr. Sachs offered us recently with the comment that "the music in this album is not 'ancient music'; stale, dusty, and at best a curio for historically minded snobs. It is no more 'ancient' than Rembrandt's painting or Gothic cathedrals."

Almost inevitably the crying up of what is remote involves a crying down of what is immediate—which, as inevitably, lessens the guiding influence and authority that Dr. Lang explicitly demands for the musicologists and that Dr. Sachs apparently resents their not getting. The newspapers have opened their columns to communications from Dr. Lang which have elaborated some of the points in his American Scholar article, and which like that article have been curiously unscholarly in their intemperateness and confusion of thought and expression and in their misrepresentation of fact to make it fit into their conceptual patterns. Like Dr. Graf's concept of the musical theater with which he flogs everything after the Greek, and Dr. Sachs's concept of the dance with which he flogs modern "phenomena of a social degeneration from the primitive typus," is Dr. Lang's concept of the "fundamental approach to an understanding of music" with which he flogs the musical life of today as he creates it to fit into his argument. This approach is "the road of intimate choral music, chamber music, piano music, and songs" performed, as they were written to be performed in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, in the home. With it he attacks the transfer of this music to "a huge auditorium," where the chamber music "began to transgress its limits and assume certain orchestral characteristics ill-befitting its nature," where the songs were "bellowed . . . by an operatic prima donna intent on bringing down the house," and where music which had been something people "literally lived with" became instead something they "face . . . as exhibition." And with it he attacks also the music for large orchestra written expressly for the large concert hall. But a man who argues that because music once was written to be performed by small groups of instruments or voices in a home composers today must not write for a large orchestra and we must not listen to quartets in Town Hall; who for this purpose misrepresents the Budapest Quartet's concerts of chamber music or Elisabeth Schumann's recitals of Lieder; who contends that we who listen to this music performed in a concert hall are affected by it less than an Esterhazy or a Lobkowitz who listened to it performed in his ballroom—such a man must be prepared to have us decline his guidance.

Letters to the Editors

Religion and Democracy

Dear Sirs: It is unfortunate that we constantly misquote the Gettysburg Address—in the sense that any passage taken out of its context and without essential qualifications is misquoted. We emphasize "government of the people, by the people, for the people" as if it were Lincoln's belief that such government is an absolute guaranty of freedom and that the "people" are immune to greed, nationalism, vindictiveness, lust for power, and the like. The passage is qualified by the hope "that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom," but this is overlooked by those who regard God as, at best, an unessential decoration, useful to beautify such things as are found to be worthy and deserving on other grounds. This was certainly not Lincoln's opinion. The two passages, read together, convey the message that government of the people is possible only under God.

While it has many implications, the principle is so easily explained that it took a highly sophisticated generation to ignore it. Since there must be established peace and order in society, man has the alternatives of submission to the power of other men and submission to objective standards which we revere as emanating from God. Either restraint by other men or restraint by the consciousness of a binding, although unverifiable, commandment—logic leaves no third possibility.

A reference to Jefferson will inevitably be opposed to the quotation from Lincoln. Jefferson believed in the saving force of human reason, as Lincoln did not do (see his Second Inaugural Address). But Jefferson, implicitly always and explicitly in several passages, believed in the reason in a man endowed with a Protestant conscience. Jefferson had little use for the living God of Christianity, but he depended on the man shaped by a belief in God, the sturdy, sober man educated by Puritanism.

It would be futile to deny that a genuine ethic can exist as an autonomous code, independent of the religion from which it was derived. But it can so exist only in individuals and for but a few generations. Such an ethic persists for a time because, though its representatives have forsworn religion, religion is still vigorous in them and keeps their eyes bright and their souls clean. It is as if the roots of a tree were drying up but the sap continued, for a while, to circulate in the trunk and twigs. It would be an error to infer that the tree could live if its roots had no sustenance, and religion is the sustenance of moral life.

The human soul is so constructed that it needs religion, needs a doctrine about the meaning and the center of life. When genuine religion is destroyed, man fills the vacuum with some inferior substitute, something that satisfies the psychological need for worship but misguides him because it is wrong. Genuine religion speaks in terms of dogma. That the world is one and demands to be organized by justice for peace is implied in the dogma of monotheism. It must be accepted or rejected, but it cannot be proved or refuted in terms of science.

In a scientific age, which insists on the tangible and verifiable, religion is discarded for science. But being the religious animal, man gradually succumbs to a pseudo-religion—a dogmatic, unverifiable belief which now informs his life and is mistaken for a scientific truth because it refers to something tangible. Intellectual progress, technics, nationalism, proletarian dictatorship, racialism—such are the new absolutes which absorb people's minds and are expected to conquer evil.

Nothing has contributed more to discrediting religion than the terrible religious wars of former centuries. As man fled from religion to escape the wars over religious dogma, he ran into wars stemming from pseudo-religions, from nationalism, and now finally from the racial horror.

Religion itself cannot be conceived with absolute clarity by man, because his mind is obstructed by prejudices and temptations. To these the representatives of organized religion are not immune. They should be the guardians of the standards of judgment, but they have been discredited by their political aspirations, culminating in the religious wars. Today, many Catholic churchmen have let themselves be swept off their feet by greedy appeasement interests, and many Protestant churchmen by a self-loving, cynical political pacifism. Both groups have been guilty of collusion with Hitlerism.

But these failings do not constitute an argument against religion any more than the abuse of science for war purposes or the nationalist fervor of professors provides an objection to scientific truth. They only prove that human minds are not clean and receptive vessels—which is precisely the assertion of Christianity. It follows that Christian democracy is not clericalism. Yet we need the churches, where the gospel is preached and the standards of judgment are preserved as a constant warning to erring men.

Religion does not make democracy safe; it only makes it possible. Religion does not make man good; he always remains liable to error and temptation, even though he knows the divine commandment. But the important thing which makes him man is that he does know the divine commandment, although he may violate it.

Christianity is not a religion for good men but for sinners. It gives them the hope that repentance will help them rise above the injustices they have committed and give them a new start, "a new birth." Christianity is the doctrine of renascence through repentance.

To say that democracy is right and totalitarianism is wrong is not convincing, for everyone realizes from his own experience that democracy today is morally weak and has failed badly. It has been unjust and indifferent enough to tolerate unemployment at home and chaos in the small states of Southeastern Europe which it established. It left it to Hitler to abolish unemployment by building his huge military machine and to give those small states a function within the German economic orbit. It thus made Hitler great. And it did not oppose him when there was time to do it. Appeasers, pacifists, and Communists, although fighting one another, co-operated in preventing resistance to the monster.

In short, democracy, originating in the founding of the Swiss Confederacy, the great discussions in the Cromwellian army, and the emigration of Roger Williams from Massachusetts, has been sadly sagging of late in spirit and virtue. It used to know that it could exist only on a foundation of democratic virtue. Today we do not teach virtue because we pretend to believe that it is a by-product of knowledge. A morally disintegrating democratic world disintegrates politically too and is visited by Hitlerism, its own product.

Now at last we come to realize, with a shock, the implications and consequences of our misdeeds, and this is our hope. If democracy is really shocked out of its moral laziness, it may become ripe for, and capable of, the repentance which will bring it, under God, a new birth of freedom.

Neither Hitler nor Hapsburg

Dear Sirs: The clear statement in Miss Kirchwey's article on Hapsburg Hopes, in The Nation of October 24, that support for the idea of a Hapsburg restoration "would be taken as an unfriendly act and would seriously injure our relations with our allies in exile" is undoubtedly right. Let me add that support of the Hapsburgs would be felt as an unfriendly act not only by the Czechs, Poles, and Yugoslavs, but also by the great majority of the Austrian people. This fact is easily proved. The dethronement of the Hapsburgs and the confiscation of their property were voted unanimously by the Austrian Parliament. Since 1918 the Monarchists have not been able to obtain a single seat in the Austrian Parliament of 165 members, in any election.

It is true that during the dark times of semi-fascism, from 1934 to 1938, Otto Hapsburg was made an honorary citizen of many communities, but this was done by the mayors, who were not elected by the people but appointed by the dictator. Not one of the freely elected municipal councils of Austria voted to make Otto an honorary citizen.

There is not the slightest indication that these anti-monarchist convictions of the Austrians have changed. It is clear rather that monarchism is but the plaything of a handful of refugees, not the serious concern of the people.

It is not true that Hapsburg propaganda interferes with Hitler's policy. On the contrary, Hapsburg propaganda splits the anti-fascist front in Austria and paralyzes its most active section, the workers. The Austrian people have been strongly impressed by the fact that one of the relatives of Otto, the Archduke Albrecht, is at present fighting shoulder to shoulder with the Nazis against the Yugoslavs.

It is now very important to convince the Austrian people, especially the workers, that the Atlantic Charter is really the basis of the policy of the United Nations, that after the war every nation will have the right to decide its own destiny. If some "salons" in Washington and New York are playing at "Imperial Court" it is of course their private business; they probably do not realize that their play provides support for Goebbels's propaganda.

That is why I am taking the liberty of sending you these lines: to add my warning to yours, to point out clearly the danger in the Hapsburg aspirations. The only possible slogan for the whole of Central Europe is: "Neither Hitler nor Hapsburg." JULIUS DEUTSCH

Former Secretary of War in Austria

The Broadcasters and the Cooperatives

Dear Sirs: I write to express my appreciation for the editorial in your issue of October 17 criticizing N. B. C. and C. B. S. for their ban on the proposed broadcasts of the Cooperative League of the United States. In my opinion, no clearer case has ever existed of the power of big business to control and decide what the public can listen to. Freedom of speech and expression is meaningless unless those of us working day in and out to establish economic democracy have the opportunity to state the facts and let the people of this country voluntarily choose for themselves the type of business enterprise they want to support or own. I urge all Nation readers to write N. B. C. and C. B. S. protesting against the ban.

BENJAMIN B. NAUMOFF,

President, Eastern Cooperative League
Schenectady, N. Y., October 26

Dear Sirs: The reason given by the Columbia Broadcasting System for its refusal of time to the Cooperative League, namely, that the code of the National Association of Broadcasters prohibits the sale of time for programs devoted to "public controversial issues," is quibbling.

What about the Town Hall programs, those fine weekly events which show that the radio can give us something better than jazz, wisecracks, and soap dramas? Many of its discussions are about nothing but controversial issues. One has only to recall the argument on the poll tax on October 22 or the famous Ickes-Gannett fracas!

Training for Pacifists

Dear Sirs: A recent issue of The Nation referred to the fact that a number of conscientious objectors were taking courses to prepare to serve as administrative officials in relief and reconstruction agencies in occupied countries. You went on to say "the pacifists will be trained as civilian aides to the military men."

It is not correct that the pacifists are being trained as civilian aides to the military men. The pacifists, who were selected from Civilian Public Service Camps throughout the country, have no obligation whatever to the army or navy or any other government agency. They will work for such organizations as the American Friends Service Committee as opportunity opens after the war.

The Shape of Things

IF JOSEF GOEBBELS KNOWS THE ART OF propaganda as well as he is supposed to, he must surely be longing to clamp a censor's hand over the mouth of his Führer. After all, this is no time for the victorious leader of a Herrenvolk to lose his nerve and dwell darkly on the fate of the late Kaiser. What can the master race think when, with the first strong gusts of adversity, their demigod tells them that "even in critical times" he won't "go abroad" like his royal predecessor? In the same speech there is the coy reference to Stalingrad, suddenly "not worth a second Verdun." And, finally, the whining complaint about the havoc wrought by the R. A. F.: "Do not think that my heart does not break when I hear of those air attacks. You know that I have not done anything like that. . . . I did not allow a single bomb on Paris. Before we attacked Warsaw I requested five times that the city surrender." Has Adolf forgotten Rotterdam—miles of streets leveled to the ground in a few flaming hours? And Belgrade, and Coventry, and London, and many lesser hells from Narvik to Athens? No, Adolf, you probably won't "go abroad." After all, where could you go? *

THE VICTORY IN EGYPT APPEARS TO GROW in extent and significance with each passing day. At the beginning of General Montgomery's offensive the Axis had ten divisions in Egypt—six Italian and four German. The six Italian divisions were abandoned by the Germans as soon as the retreat began and have apparently fallen almost intact into British hands. The German panzer divisions have lost the greater part of their strength, and the German 164th infantry division appears to have been badly mauled. Perhaps the most striking aspect of the victory was the perfect coordination between Allied air, sea, and ground forces. For the first time in the war the United Nations forces moved with the clock-like efficiency which the Germans displayed in 1939 and 1940. For the first time our side had the better equipment and the sounder leadership. The campaign also provided striking confirmation of the general belief that the Italian end of the Axis has completely broken down. Rommel's abandonment of his Italian allies is not likely to make the Germans any better liked in Italy. And the alacrity with which the Black Shirts surrendered indicates that they are fed up not only with the war but, perhaps to an even greater extent, with Hitler and the Nazis.

NOBODY KNOWS HOW MANY REFUGEES were shipped to North Africa by the Vichy government. Estimates have run as high as a hundred thousand though the number is probably less. Some thousands are in concentration camps; other thousands were put to work, in miserable conditions and under military discipline, on various operations for which free labor could not be found—or paid. The greatest number have been employed on the new trans-Saharan railway under construction between Morocco and West Africa territories—a project supposed to have been directed and financed by the Nazis. Now that Morocco seems certain to fall into American hands, the trans-Saharan railway will happily serve other ends than those for which it was designed. By the same token the refugee laborers and those still in concentration camps can also be promptly released for a different fate. Many thousands of these men are good soldiers, Spanish Republican troops and former members of the French Foreign Legion. Those who are physically fit should, of course, be given a chance to join the American army of liberation. Civilians and persons who have lost their health during years of confinement or forced labor in the African desert should be freed and cared for. As soon as possible those who please should be permitted to emigrate. The arrival of the Americans must mean that people as well as territories are to be freed from Vichy-Nazi control.

THE AMERICAN POSITION IN THE SOLOMONS has been somewhat improved by a series of small advances to the east and west of Henderson Field on Guadalcanal. None of the operations in the past week appear to have involved heavy fighting, but the navy's report that more than five thousand Japanese have been killed in the Solomons since August suggests that the fighting has been on a larger scale than had been supposed. The precise results of the numerous air and sea clashes in the Solomons area are far from clear, but the failure of the Japanese to press their attack on Guadalcanal indicates that their losses may have been even greater than the official communiqués have revealed. There remains, of course, a strong possibility, as Secretary Knox suggests, that the Japanese will return in greater strength than before. But this may depend on developments on other fronts, particularly in Burma. United Nations strength in the Pacific is fast reaching the point where we rather than the Japanese will determine where the coming battles will be fought.

THE CAMPAIGN IN NEW GUINEA, IN WHICH forces under General MacArthur's command have not only stopped a dangerous Japanese advance but taken the offensive to good purpose, has been somewhat overshadowed by the more spectacular battles in the Solomons. Actually developments in these two Pacific theaters have been closely connected. The retreat of the Japanese after they had crossed the Owen Stanley Range to come within thirty-two miles of Port Moresby may have been influenced by the necessity for reinforcing their army and air force in the Solomons. At the same time the United Nations' air base at Port Moresby, from which so many long-range raids have been made against the enemy's fleet and supply depots in the northern Solomons, has been a prime factor in enabling us to maintain our grip on Guadalcanal. In late September, after Japanese communications had been shattered by the American fliers, the Australian infantry, adapting themselves with great ability to jungle warfare, began to push the enemy back over the mountains. Now they are approaching the Japanese base at Buna, which is also threatened by an American force driving along the north coast from the east after being transported by air from Australia in mid-October. Coincident with the announcement of this new expedition comes the news of the occupation by American troops of Goodenough Island, north of the Papuan Peninsula. This position guards the sea approaches by which Buna will have to be supplied if the Allied forces succeed in capturing it. Buna itself offers a possible base for a flanking attack against Japanese positions in the northern Solomons. Thus the two campaigns in the southern Pacific are becoming increasingly complementary although they are still under separate commands.

MARSHAL PETAIN'S PECULIAR CONCEPTION of French "honor" was further illustrated last week when the Bank of France admitted through its attorneys here that $200,000,000 of Belgian gold intrusted to its custody for safekeeping had been turned over to Germany by order of the aged Marshal. Because of this "compulsion," the Bank of France contends that it has been relieved of any obligation to return the gold to the National Bank of Belgium. It appears that the gold was originally shipped to Dakar instead of to London as the Belgians had requested. From there it was transferred to the Reichsbank as a result of an order issued at Vichy three days before the end of Laval's first term in office. The Bank of France argues through its attorneys, Coudert Brothers, that because of the rule of force majeure the Belgian government-in-exile has no claim on the French bank's assets in this country. The logic behind this argument is so reminiscent of many pages of "Mein Kampf" that we cannot believe it originated with the Bank of France.

PHILIP MURRAY CHARGED THE OTHER DAY that employers are deliberately flooding the War Labor Board with minor disputes, thereby hampering effective operation of the board and undermining union contracts with workers who no longer have recourse to the strike. Organized workers throughout the country, Mr. Murray said, "feel a growing sense of frustration" over management's refusal to settle plant grievances on the spot—and a sense of frustration is no aid to the morale of production. The C. I. O. intends to ask the WLB to issue a directive ordering all companies and unions to insert in present or future agreements a clause providing for compulsory arbitration of all disputes arising out of the contracts. It is curious to have labor suggesting compulsory arbitration even on this limited scale; but certainly the Labor Board should find a way of countering this new attack on collective bargaining and of protecting itself from loud charges of inefficiency by the very groups who are quietly swamping it with cases that should never be referred to it.

MR. MURRAY ISSUED HIS STATEMENT AT Boston, where the C. I. O convention is now in session. Unity between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. is scheduled to be one of the big issues, with Sidney Hillman heading the movement for reconciliation. One of his principal arguments is the dismal fact that division in the union forces has led, in two major cases, to the appointment to positions carrying vast authority over labor of men in whom labor, with reason, has little confidence. In Mr. Hillman's view, it was because the two great labor organizations could not agree on candidates that Paul V. McNutt and Wendell Lund were put in charge, respectively, of the War Manpower Commission and the Labor Division of the War Production Board. Whatever the difficulties involved in reconciliation—and they are admittedly great—division in the ranks has become a luxury which labor can no longer afford.

REACTIONARY DEMOCRATS IN CONGRESS ARE looking forward to joining hands with the newly enlarged Republican delegation in an all-out attack on New Deal labor legislation—an attack naturally camouflaged by the plea of war necessity. On page 513 of this issue Keith Hutchison discusses one phase of this campaign—the drive against the forty-hour week—and shows the misleading use which is being made of British figures. There are now signs that the whole offensive against labor may blow up under the pressure of its own extravagance. Senator O'Daniel's proposal to suspend the wages-and-hours law and legalize a seventy-two-hour week and Representative Rankin's demand for repeal of the Wagner Act have alarmed such newspapers as the New York Times and Herald Tribune, which realize that their own more moderate program of "reform" will be endangered by the anti-labor fanatics. If the correction of the Administration's labor policy, says the Herald Tribune, "is not to do far more harm than good, it must be undertaken with restraint and patience." Following the same line, the Times asks for "amendment" of the Wagner Act and suspension of the Wage-Hour Act so that overtime rates becomes legally obligatory only after forty-eight hours. But neither paper seems to realize the damage that can be done to morale by legislation directed solely against labor.

THE MEDICAL SERVICE LEAGUE OF BERKELEY, California, a small but useful organization for distributing the costs of medical care, has been forced to disband because it was branded as "unethical" by the Alameda County Medical Association. Although the opposition of the A. M. A. to what it chooses to call "socialized medicine" is notorious, the local medical association seems to have gone far beyond the parent organization in attacking the Medical Service League. The league did not attempt to pool the costs of medical care or to provide sickness insurance. Each member paid for his own medical service, and the cooperating physicians were paid on a fee basis. Some reduction in fees was made possible, however, by the fact that the Medical Service League assumed responsibility for all administrative details, such as keeping records and making collections. Strangely enough, the attack on the league came after it had been in operation for four years. This suggests that war-time prosperity may be reversing the previous trend toward acceptance of cooperative plans that provide an assured if not large income for participating physicians.

To the Shores of Tripoli

ADDED to the thrill which action brings, we have the satisfaction of knowing that our first offensive against Hitler has been launched with brilliant efficiency. The strategic conception underlying our descent on North Africa is a broad one, promising large rewards, and it has been implemented on a commensurate scale. Moreover, close cooperation between the British and American commands has made possible an almost miraculous accuracy in the timing of operations.

Military expeditions of the kind we have undertaken in North Africa cannot be improvised. Plans must have been laid months back, for the necessary preparations were tremendous. The British Eighth Army, which had barely held Rommel's drive on Alexandria in the summer, had to be reinforced, reorganized, and reequipped so that it was ready to take the counter-offensive. When General Montgomery began his devastating preliminary bombardment of the Axis positions on the Alamein line, our expeditionary force must have been assembling at embarkation ports. By the time Rommel's army had been cracked, the Anglo-American fleet and transports were concentrated at Gibraltar and creating a wave of jittery speculation in every Axis center. And now as the broken Afrika Korps flees westward, closely pursued by British tanks and planes, our troops are pressing toward Tunisia and "the shores of Tripoli," where once before the United States cleaned out a nest of pirates.

With the unexpectedly rapid fall of Algiers and the successful establishment of beachheads at several strategic points, there is reason to hope that the whole of North Africa can be taken over at a comparatively low cost in American and French lives. As we write, there appears to have been little more than token resistance. The total forces under Vichy orders are not large, and they are widely scattered, with probably the heaviest concentration at Dakar, where they are now isolated. Moreover, these troops have no modern planes or mechanized equipment, and their fuel supplies are believed to be very limited. The biggest danger is the French navy, but that may prove to have more nuisance value than fighting power. Its chief elements are divided between Dakar and Toulon, and even united could hardly match the Anglo-American fleet now in the Mediterranean, especially as the French have no carriers.

Assuming that Rommel is forced to evacuate the remnants of his army and that the United Nations take control of the whole North African coast, how much nearer will the Allies be to establishing a second front and relieving the pressure on Russia? We believe the Soviets will not have long to wait before feeling the beneficial effects of the Mediterranean offensive. Hitler's chronic man-power crisis now threatens to become acute. The major part of his army is concentrated in the east; most of the remainder is occupied in guarding and fortifying the coast from the Arctic to the Spanish frontier. Watch over the equally long Mediterranean coast has been left to the Italians, assisted by a small stiffening of German panzer and Luftwaffe units. But now the United Nations are getting in position to strike at the weakest flank of Axis Europe in many spots. Sardinia and Sicily are less than one hundred miles from Tunisia, and from these large islands both the Italian mainland and unoccupied France could be attacked. Again, with the threat to Suez removed, the British army in the Near East will be free to turn its attention to the Balkans, giving the Yugoslavian guerrilla front greater importance.

Undoubtedly Hitler will be forced to divert many divisions to the shores of the Mediterranean. Probably he will be driven to occupy the whole of France; perhaps he will try to bring Spain into the conflict so as to be able to attack our base at Gibraltar and use the Spanish army in Morocco against us. But he will not dare to strip his northern coastal defenses, for a large army remains in Britain, and the opening of the Mediterranean will tremendously increase the transatlantic flow of men and materials. Where, then, is Hitler going to find the divisions he must send south without weakening his almost stalled army in Russia?

Our North African venture, then, promises both quick relief to Russia and the bases for a second front this winter under ideal climatic conditions. But if we are to make the best of this opportunity, it will be necessary to link political strategy to military strategy, and we confess that the Administration's first moves on the diplomatic front fill us with misgivings. For while the President proclaims on the one hand our intention to liberate France from "the Axis yoke," on the other he addresses honeyed words of "sincere friendship" to Franco, installed by the Axis to be jailer of the Spanish people. Are we to end the appeasement of Vichy only to intensify the appeasement of fascist Spain?

Of course, Mr. Hull has just explained that his policy toward Vichy was not appeasement but was designed "to pave the way . . . for the planning and sending of the military expedition into the western Mediterranean." This assumption of the mantle of Machiavelli by our Secretary of State strikes us as a trifle disingenuous. Does he really mean he was anticipating the North African landing as long ago as 1940, when the appeasement of Vichy began? And is he really suggesting that the State Department has been stringing Pétain and Laval along, purposely lulling their fears of American action? If so, he ought to be grateful for the attacks on his policy, which helped him to maintain his appeasement disguise.

Mr. Hull also claims that American policy toward Vichy was designed to keep alive "the basic concepts of freedom of the French people." This purpose seems to have been successfully concealed from those it was intended to encourage. All the evidence we have received from inside France suggests that our snubbing of the De Gaullist movement and the fraternization of our representatives with Vichy officials, served merely to confuse the French people and hinder the organization of opposition. The rapid growth of the underground movement and the increasing extent to which it has rallied around De Gaulle owe little to the State Department.

We hope, now that relations with Vichy have ended, that the Administration will attempt to make amends by full recognition of the De Gaullist movement. We believe that the exclusion of the Fighting French from the North African expedition was a mistake. After all, we are, in effect, asking the French garrisons in Africa to repudiate their allegiance to Vichy, and the Fighting French offer the only organized focus for such disaffection. Why, then, should we thrust them into the background? We ought rather to bring them forward and seek their cooperation in the civil administration of the occupied territory. It would be a fatal mistake to rely for this purpose on officials appointed by Vichy because of their willingness to collaborate with the Axis. In this connection, an unofficial London report to the effect that Admiral Darlan is being "entertained in Algiers with all the respect and dignity due to his rank and record" is definitely disturbing. We hope this report proves untrue, for there is no reason to think that Darlan is any less of a traitor than Laval, and his anti-British bias is notorious.

Against this must be set the recognition by General Eisenhower of General Henri Giraud as responsible for military and civil affairs in French North Africa. General Giraud is a first-class soldier, whose escape from a German prison camp thrilled all France. And he has since then steadily refused to bow the knee to Vichy. On the other hand, his appointment to leadership in North Africa, apparently without any consultation with the Fighting French organization, looks like another attempt to sidetrack the men who have kept the flag of Free France flying. It is not our business to pre-select the leadership of our allies.

More than ever in the new stage of the war that is opening we need to use our political weapons effectively. If we are to gather strength inside France and recruit support inside Italy and Spain, we must convince Frenchmen and Italians and Spaniards that we are coming to liberate them not merely from the yoke of Hitler but from the grip of those who, because of their hatred and fear of democracy, have prostituted themselves for Hitler's ends.

Dunderhead Election

BY ROBERT BENDINER

GEORGE NORRIS, weary and bewildered, reflected on his first election defeat in nearly forty years. "The more I think of it," said the greatest Senator of our day, "the more bewildered I get. I can't understand it. . . . I went down to defeat for reasons that even my enemies cannot explain." Senator Norris might as well have been speaking of the election as a whole, for the myopia which without rhyme or reason had suddenly brought his magnificent political career to an end was not confined to the voters of Nebraska. Taken as a whole, the election showed the same shortsightedness throughout the country, the same preoccupation with the petty, the local, and the immediate, the same failure to rise to the greatness of the times. An election that might have proved much proved little, notwithstanding the effort to fit the results into preconceived patterns by experts who affect to see in them variously a rebuke to the New Deal and a demand for a stronger New Deal, an expression of concealed isolationism and a clarion for a more vigorous prosecution of the war.

In reality what emerged from the vote was hardly more than a long series of ballot totals reflecting dissatisfaction here, political ineptitude there—the revenge of farmers for the Administration's curb on food prices, the gratitude of villagers for the personal services of a Congressional appeaser, a general failure in all but a few key spots to concentrate on issues that go beyond the moment or the Congressional district. A resurgence of militant isolationism is hardly indicated by the victories of such interventionist Republicans as Governor Stassen and Senator Ball in Colonel Lindbergh's own Minnesota or of Clare Boothe in Connecticut; or by the defeats of Representatives Hill of Washington and Shanley of Connecticut, both former New Dealers who broke with the President specifically on foreign policy. On the other hand, it is straining things excessively to see a people's mandate for a more vigorous prosecution of the war in the reelection of such pernicious isolationists as Senator Brooks and Representatives Fish, Hoffman, and Day. It is tragic that so little attention was paid to pre-Pearl Harbor records and that as a result we shall be saddled with a Congress of little minds at the peace, should the war end before 1945. Despite exposures of the Dunderheads, it is plain that in most localities the voters simply refused to make foreign policy an issue.

It is important to recognize that fact because the only thing worse than the incoherence of the election results is the attempt to read into them meanings which are not there. What can be demonstrated, however, is that the vote followed the immemorial trend of mid-term elections to run against the party in power, whatever the issues of the day. This quadrennial ebbing of the tide is not necessarily prophetic with regard to the succeeding Presidential election, despite the war whoops of G. O. P. officials who profess to see Wilson's 1918 in Roosevelt's 1942. The fact is that, with the exception of 1934, every mid-term election for the past thirty-six years has witnessed a loss for the party in power, and the average loss, counting both houses, has been fifty-one seats. In five of those eight instances the losing party has gone on to win in the next Presidential election. The last example was in 1938, when the Democrats lost a total of seventy-seven seats, only to bring in a smashing victory for Roosevelt two years later. This time they have lost a total of fifty-two seats in both houses, with three Congressional contests still in doubt. Considering the military losses we have suffered, the bitter division of the country during and after the last election, the unprecedented fact of a third term, and the plunging of a relatively comfortable people into the sudden experiences of the military draft, battle casualties, loss of cars, quadrupled taxes, food rationing, and all the other necessary war-time interferences with private existence, it is astonishing that the Democratic Party was able to resist the normal mid-term tide as well as it did.

In so sprawling and formless an election it is natural that the good and the bad should be inextricably tangled. On the whole there was more bad than good. Aside from the peerless Norris, the Administration lost the support of such Senatorial stalwarts as Brown of Michigan, Lee of Oklahoma, Schwartz of Wyoming, and Herring of Iowa. Murray of Montana, knifed by Senator Wheeler, won by the narrowest margin. In addition to its serious numerical losses in the House—enough to give control to an inevitable coalition of Republicans and anti-New Deal Democrats—the Administration, not to mention the country, will have to endure the dreadful antics of its worst Representatives. The Michigan Republican delegation, one of the most intemperate reactionary cliques that ever disgraced Congress, has been returned intact. Hamilton Fish, notwithstanding his shady activities, has managed to squeak through, his victory already noted with pleasure in Berlin. Stephen A. Day, the Flanders Hall author who branded the Atlantic Charter "the most discouraging statement of principles since the birth of Christ," is back again. So are Barry and Taber of New York, Vorys of Ohio, Dewey Short of Missouri, and ninety-three other Dunderheads who did what they could to leave the country unprepared for the struggle that engulfed it on December 7. On the red side of the ledger must also be recorded the reelection of Senators Brooks and Lodge, to a lesser degree the victory of Clare Luce over a capable New Dealer with a good voting record, and the shameful defeat, at the hands of the Catholic church, of the proposed amendment whereby Massachusetts physicians would have been permitted to give married women contraceptive advice in cases warranted by the health of the patient.

A few scattered gains are recorded for liberalism in the Congressional elections, notably the victory of Lieutenant Will Rogers, Jr., over the labor-baiting Leland Ford of California, and the surprising comeback of the Progressive Party in Wisconsin, where Governor Julius P. Heil went down to defeat at the hands of the comparatively unknown Orland S. Loomis.

For such genuine encouragement as is to be had from this election, however, one must turn, paradoxically, to the New York State campaign, where the Republicans scored their greatest triumph. Here two events occurred which offer enough hope for 1944 to offset the dismal news elsewhere. First the Democratic Party has in all likelihood been saved for the New Deal. In any event it has not been lost. Had John J. Bennett defeated Thomas E. Dewey for governor, or even made a close race of the election, control of the party would have passed to James A. Farley. In that case the country would have faced a choice in 1944 between a Republican and an anti-New Deal Democrat; 1920 would be here again, with a new Harding to bury the people's peace for which a people's war is being fought. The smashing defeat of the Democrats in New York, the worst in twenty years, would seem to eliminate the Farley threat and leave hope for a New Deal candidate to succeed Franklin D. Roosevelt.

For the preservation of this hope, the country has the American Labor Party to thank. Its leaders saw the problem clearly and had the courage to persist in the face of tremendous pressure, including the indorsement of Bennett which party regularity demanded of the President. Behind Dean Alfange, who conducted an extremely able and informative campaign, the A. L. P. operated for the first time completely on its own power. The party which Farley had suggested might hold its convention in a telephone booth polled 409,000 votes for Alfange and considerably more for Lieutenant Governor Poletti. In a year in which the reactionary tide is supposed to be running high it polled 10.1 per cent of the total vote, as compared with its previous high of 8.8 per cent in the Lehman victory four years ago. Mr. Farley's miscalculation should not only cost him his political head but demonstrate to future campaigners that the American Labor Party is a major independent force in New York, with a core of followers who place allegiance to the principles of the New Deal above loyalty to any individual or machine.

No one or two explanations can account for the diverse results of so complex a campaign, but several factors in the Republican gain, aside from those already touched on, are worth mentioning. The Democratic Party has always drawn heavily on industrial workers and on young voters, precisely the two classes which lost strength at the polls because of military service and the geographical shifting of labor forces in war industries. Labor leadership itself, particularly outside New York, was unusually inept, the head of the American Federation of Labor going to the length of indorsing such obstructors of the war effort as Engel of Michigan and even Day of Illinois, merely because they had voted right on certain test labor issues. Finally, the leadership of the Democratic Party itself was lackadaisical. The campaign in behalf of Congressional candidates who sought to unseat the most notorious isolationists was a disgrace. Practically no money was spent to aid them in presenting their case to the voters, and if it had not been for the Union for Democratic Action they would have been left without campaign literature of any kind. From above came none of the fighting spirit or social imagination that had fired the enthusiasm of the country in previous campaigns. Let 1942, particularly the showing of the American Labor Party, be a warning: unless the Democratic Party is prepared to proclaim the New Deal instead of apologizing for it, it will lose its appeal. When the voters of this country want reaction, they know where they can get it in a purer form.

Washington and the Offensive

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, November 9

WASHINGTON, official and unofficial, is as cheered as occupied Europe by the news that our troops are on the march in North Africa. There is a feeling of pleasure that this time we have taken the initiative, that it is the enemy's turn to be surprised, that we have gone into action in the west at last. Not the least of the advantages of the offensive is its tonic effect on morale, and there will be a good deal less bickering as long as we go forward. Other issues suddenly seem to fade into the background beside this new enterprise.

The landings and their propaganda accompaniment were staged with a sense of history. Who could fail to be moved by General Eisenhower's proclamation to the French of North Africa, "The war has entered the phase of liberation"? One imagines the feelings of a listener at a radio in some lonely attic in France who suddenly heard that voice say, "My friends . . ."

The advocates of a second front have been so accustomed to think in terms of a frontal attack upon the French coast that the direction of the new offensive has left some of them uncertain. But there seems to be general agreement among those in touch with the military that though this is not yet a second front it may soon become one, if only because Hitler must make a major reply. If Anglo-American forces succeed in obtaining control of the western Mediterranean, the way is opened for an attack on Italy or southern France, operations regarded as much easier than an attempt to establish a bridgehead on French Atlantic or Channel beaches bristling with German guns. With this threat at his rear, Hitler can no longer concentrate on the eastern front. It is expected here that the combination of the Anglo-American offensive in North Africa and unrest in France may force Hitler to occupy the rest of that country and that strategic necessities may soon compel him to send troops into Spain.

Provided we follow through with additional forces, North Africa should become a major front. Some eighteen months ago a proposal for a North African campaign, designed to clear the way for an offensive against Italy, was made by General José Asensio, last military attaché in Washington of the Spanish Republic. It was presented to our own government through unofficial channels, but there is no indication that it obtained much response. The General and several other exiled Loyalist officers felt that Spain itself would make a poor bridgehead for a Continental invasion because of the ease with which small German forces could hold the few passes through and around the Pyrenees. But they did envisage action against Spanish territory to safeguard the supply lines of a North African advance, and their ideas are useful background against which to form an understanding of coming events.

They felt that the first step should be the occupation of the Canaries, from which German submarines and planes could attack shipping to North Africa, and the second, the envelopment and seizure of Spanish Morocco, which threatens not only water but land communications between the North African Atlantic coast and Algeria. The American forces, by landing on both sides of Spanish Morocco would seem to be in a good position to take it over before the Germans can strike south through Spain. The Spanish troops in Morocco, traditionally reactionary and traditionally pro-German, recruited from adventurers and native mercenaries, are believed to be the only Spanish troops on which Hitler can depend if he moves into Spain. Spanish Morocco is full of German "technicians" who have been preparing since 1936 to neutralize Gibraltar and close the Straits, and it is believed that they can do so easily unless we beat them to the punch. Less well known is the fact that troops from Spanish Morocco, striking south to the valley of the Tazza between the Moroccan border and the Atlas Mountains, could also cut the principal, if not the only practical, land highway between the Atlantic and Algeria. In dealing with this potential threat from the Canaries, Spanish Morocco, and Spain, it is hoped that the actions of our armed forces will be governed by strategic necessities rather than by the illusions which some officials in the British Foreign Office and the State Department still seem to cherish about Franco.

There are several possible explanations of why we have not already moved against any of these territories. It may have been thought best to land first in French North Africa, establishing an easy base from which to attack the Canaries and encircling Spanish Morocco. It may have been felt that, in order not to antagonize Catholic opinion at home and in Latin America, it was better to leave the initiative with Hitler and let him attack Spain first. There are also those in London and Washington who think Franco independent enough to be dickered with and to be trusted, people who think Franco can be won over to our side. These illusions may be useful to Hitler if he prefers to keep out of Spain for the time being. Spain is thus the exposed flank of our political thinking, as it is of our military advance. Anti-Loyalist antipathies and pro-Franco leanings interfere with the full utilization of the knowledge and experience of Spanish military exiles familiar with the North African terrain and anxious to help. Officers and men are available here and in Mexico for two full divisions of Loyalists. Pro-Franco leanings account in part for maneuvers which leave the initiative in Spain with Hitler. There are forces in the State Department which would like somehow to defeat Hitler while leaving Franco to control Spain, and the twin forces of church and monarchy to rule Italy. They are trying to keep the war as little as possible a democratic crusade, to direct it and the post-war world as far as they can into Metternichian molds.

It is this background of anti-democratic tendencies which makes Secretary Hull's elaborate explanations of past pro-Vichy policy unconvincing. The test of the State Department's sincerity is a new attitude toward the Fighting French. But such an attitude has yet to appear. Fighting French headquarters here last night were a gloomy place, when they should have been jubilant. The Fighting French felt left out of the picture and unwanted; their forces took no part in the landing, and their information from London was that De Gaulle was neither consulted nor informed in advance. While the State Department still looks back with pride on the period when it was collaborating with Weygand, the Fighting French blame the Murphy-Weygand negotiations for the lack of an organized underground in North Africa. De Gaullist work was discouraged by American friendship for Weygand, and the potential opposition was organized around Weygand in the open, where the Germans had no difficulty in smashing it as soon as he was recalled to France. Some State Department officials still put their hope in a "third France" which is neither De Gaullist nor collaborationist, but Frenchmen too milk-and-watery to choose sides in so critical an hour would hardly seem to be very energetic or trustworthy allies.

These unwholesome tendencies in our State Department were never more dangerous than now, when the war has entered a new stage.

A British Reply to Louis Fischer

BY GRAHAM SPRY

London, October 29

THE thesis of Louis Fischer's two articles, Why Cripps Failed, is that Sir Stafford promised the Indian leaders a National Government functioning as a Cabinet, subject to no overriding powers by the Viceroy, and that on April 9 instructions from London compelled Sir Stafford to withdraw his promise. That is Fischer's thesis. It is a simple thesis, but it is a wholly false one.

Its falsity is established by published documents of the negotiations, by the course of the negotiations, and by admissions in Fischer's own articles. Fischer arrived in Delhi after the mission had returned to London, was not present during the negotiations, and had no access to the records of the mission. His evidence in support of his thesis is drawn solely from conversations with officials and party leaders, from newspaper editorials, and from hearsay.

I do not wish to establish the falsity of Fischer's thesis merely from my own knowledge. But it must be said that I was present with Sir Stafford and working in his house throughout the entire negotiations. I was in his intimate confidence and knew at any moment what instructions Sir Stafford received and what stage the negotiations had reached. With the full knowledge, then, of every document, telegram, and discussion, I state with all definiteness that Cripps did not make, did not seek to make, to Indian political leaders any promise of National or Cabinet government with full powers in the war period, and received no instructions from London to withdraw such promise or concession. There was no such promise and no such instruction.

Documents published by both the British government and the National Congress Party support my own knowledge and wholly contradict Fischer. According to Fischer, Sir Stafford made this supposed promise of "National Government with full powers" at the "beginning" of the negotiations. He quotes only one document to support this assertion. It is a letter, dated April 11, in which the president of the Congress, Maulana Abdul Azad, alleges that in "our first talk," Sir Stafford said, "there would be a National Government which would function as a Cabinet." The "first talk" Sir Stafford had with any Congress Party leader was on the afternoon of March 25. That afternoon Maulana Azad was the only negotiator for Congress, and he brought his own interpreter, Mr. Asaf Ali. Azad was given a copy of the proposals of Sir Stafford, and through the interpreter he asked and received explanations.

There follows a series of conversations and letters.

These letters have all been published. In no letter written by a leader of the Congress Party is there a single reference to any promise of National Government with full powers; on the contrary, every reference is that it has not been made. Only after the negotiations ended did Maulana Azad, in letters of April 10 and 11, refer to any promise or suggestion of a National Government with full powers. If Sir Stafford, as Fischer alleges, made such a promise, why did the Congress leaders fail to refer to it in any letter until after they had broken off negotiations?

On March 27, at 2:15 p.m., Gandhi by invitation called at 3 Queen Victoria Road to meet Sir Stafford. He left at 4:25 p.m. He had stated at length the reasons why he considered Congress would reject the proposals. On March 29 Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru arrived in Delhi and for the first time entered the negotiations. On April 1 the Working Committee of the Congress Party drafted a resolution of the rejection, and on April 3 this reached us at 3 Queen Victoria Road.

As we knew in Delhi at the time, and as Fischer himself wrote in his first article, all parties had rejected the proposals by March 29. In fact, Gandhi, the decisive influence in the Congress Party, had rejected the proposals on March 27. Is Azad, then, the only person to whom Fischer alleges such a promise was made? If Fischer's thesis has any truth in it at all, then this resolution of the Congress Party, handed by Congress leaders to Cripps on April 3 (but not published until April 11), might be expected to quote Sir Stafford's promise.

In this long resolution of the Congress Party there is no reference to any such promise. This is itself conclusive that no promise was made at the beginning of negotiations: if a promise had been made, it is incredible that such skilful negotiators as the leaders of Congress would have left it out of the record. It is not in the record, and it is not in the record because no promise was made.

Only two paragraphs in this resolution discuss the war period, which alone is relevant to any promise of immediate National Government with full powers. In these two paragraphs there is no reference to any promise of such a form of government, no reference to Cabinet government, no reference to any removal of the overriding powers of the Viceroy; the statements of the Congress resolution quite specifically deny Fischer's thesis. They read: "British War Cabinet proposals are vague, altogether incomplete, and there would appear to be no vital changes in the present structure contemplated. It has been made clear that the defense of India will, in any event, remain under British control."

On the clear evidence of Congress's own statement that "no vital changes" were contemplated, the promise that Fischer alleges was made had not been made by April 3.

Perhaps, however, Fischer means it was made toward the end of the negotiations. Seven days remained between April 3 and April 9, when the second and final Congress rejection was received.

These days were devoted almost exclusively to the discussion of an interim government in India before the establishment of an Indian constitution-making body and the drafting of a new constitution. The purpose of the discussion was to find the form of words which, while preserving final British control of defense policy, would yet insure Indian party leaders in the Viceroy's Executive Council a sense of full participation, both in the government and in the organization of the Indian war effort. Sir Stafford offered the Indian leaders not merely "canteens" and "stationery," as Fischer inaccurately protests, but the control of the vital Departments of State, of Finance, of Labor and Man-Power, of Supply and Economic Warfare, of Commerce, Information, Legislation, and Police. With the exception of the control of the organization of the armed forces, these departments covered the whole sphere of all-Indian government. The single exception was specifically stated in Clause E of the Cripps proposals and was never altered one iota in principle in any letter or formula.

The problem at this state of the negotiations was, then, to find a formula within the terms of Clause E which would both insure that control of the defense of India remained with the British government and enable the Indian leaders to appeal to their followers on the ground that they, the leaders, were fully sharing in the direction of the war effort as a whole.

That was the endeavor in the numerous formulas drafted by Sir Stafford and staff, by the Viceroy and staff, and, as Fischer's article indicates, by Congress Party leaders. Some of these formulas were discussed with the Commander-in-chief and his senior officers. On April 7 Colonel Louis Johnson, personal representative of the President of the United States, on the invitation of Pandit Nehru and after consultation with the Viceroy, appeared in the discussions, and in his personal, not official, capacity performed his admirable service as intermediary between Sir Stafford and the Congress Party leaders.

The most important of the formulas have been published. They define in precise terms the exact content of the discussions. Neither in formulas nor correspondence about them is there any evidence that a promise of full Cabinet government had been made. Such evidence as there is points the other way. The very existence of the formulas is itself a denial of any promise, for if full powers had been promised, the Congress leaders would have had no need to discuss their division. The fact that the Congress leaders discussed the drafted formulas establishes fully that they recognized that complete war-time powers had not been promised.

There is other positive proof in these documents that no such promise was made, and there is the proof Fischer's own articles supply that Sir Stafford was at some pains to make clear to Congress leaders that Cabinet or National Government with full powers was not under discussion.

On April 7 Sir Stafford wrote Maulana Azad that he had consulted the Viceroy and the War Cabinet and that a new formula had been approved. In this letter Sir Stafford uses the term "National Government." What does he mean by that term—Cabinet government with full powers, subject to no overriding power by the Viceroy? No; Sir Stafford made it abundantly plain that "it is impossible to make any change in the existing constitution," and that the commander-in-chief "retains full control over all war activities, subject to the control of His Majesty's Government." The statement could not be clearer.

Fischer's second article quotes the use of the word "Cabinet" in a single formula. This formula was drafted by the Congress Party amending a draft without any reference to the term "Cabinet" submitted to them by Sir Stafford. According to Fischer, the Congress Party changed Sir Stafford's draft and inserted the words "National Cabinet." What did Sir Stafford do to the Congress draft? He deleted the term "National Cabinet" and made his own position once again clear beyond any possible doubt by inserting the words "Executive Council," that is, the Executive Council of the Viceroy. These changes, according to Fischer's own admission, were made on April 8.

This formula was discussed by correspondence with Colonel Johnson as intermediary between Sir Stafford and Pandit Nehru. It underwent a number of small changes to meet the wishes of Pandit Nehru, but the term "National Cabinet" does not reappear. The fact that it does not reappear establishes once again that the Congress leaders recognized that it was not promised. Late that day the formula which it was believed the Congress Party would accept was left with Pandit Nehru by Colonel Louis Johnson. That formula has been published. It makes no mention of a Cabinet or National Government with full powers and scrupulously emphasizes that the commander-in-chief will retain "the control of the armed forces" and "the conduct of the war."

What Fischer does not mention is that the Congress Party Working Committee accepted this formula. Throughout April 8 the staff of the mission at 3 Queen Victoria Road grew more and more optimistic that a settlement would be reached. Reports from officials and from journalists who had called at Birla House, where the Congress Working Committee was meeting, stated that the proposals would be accepted. At 2:45 p.m. a senior Indian official called and said that a member of the Congress Working Committee, whom he named, had announced to the press at Birla House that the defense formula had been agreed upon by the committee and "there would be no going back." Throughout the next day similar reports poured in. A leading Congress member who had been closely associated with negotiations in Delhi telephoned from Calcutta and congratulated Sir Stafford on the decision of Congress to accept the scheme.

From Congress Party sources the report had gone forth from Delhi to Calcutta, to Bombay, to Madras that a settlement had been reached and that the Cripps mission had been successful.

At 5:35 p.m., April 9, Maulana Azad and Pandit Nehru arrived; they remained until 8:05 p.m. They discussed with Sir Stafford the defense formula and raised no objections to it. This formula had been originally drafted by the Viceroy and approved by the War Cabinet. Congress made no objection to what the Viceroy and Cabinet had approved, and the Viceroy and War Cabinet accepted the formula that Congress did not reject. How, then, could there arise any occasion for an intervention by cable, on April 9? On the only issue under discussion there was no disagreement. There was, then, no fateful cable sent from London by "reactionary imperialists" calling Sir Stafford to heel. There was no promise, as Fischer alleges, and there was no telegram.

But Azad and Nehru had more to convey than the acceptance of the defense formula. In this long interview they raised the whole issue of the powers of the Viceroy and insisted that the Viceroy should act as constitutional monarch only. Azad and Nehru called, in fact, to put an end to the negotiations.

On April 10 Azad wrote a long letter. For the first time he wrote that Sir Stafford had referred to a "National Government and a Cabinet consisting of Ministers," but that "they [Congress] were informed that nothing could be said at this stage about the conventions that should govern the new government and Viceroy."

Sir Stafford replied the same day, and in this letter explained why the Congress Party demand for "Cabinet government with full power" was quite impossible. He wrote, "Were such a system introduced by the convention under existing circumstances, the nominated Cabinet [nominated presumably by major political organizations], responsible to no one but itself, could not be removed and would, in fact, constitute an absolute dictatorship of the majority," that is, a Congress or Hindu majority in the Cabinet.

It is essential, if any fair judgment of British policy at this juncture is to be formed, that the real nature of this Congress Party demand be understood. Congress demanded a Cabinet, not of elected members of a legislature, but of members of party organizations, a Cabinet composed of party members responsible neither to a legislature, and through a legislature to an electorate, nor to the Viceroy. In fact, it proposed a self-perpetuating autocracy which could be voted out of office by no legislature, dismissed from office by no overriding powers of the Viceroy. No other political or communal group in India would tolerate such a government for an instant; it would have subjected those other groups to a Congress or Hindu majority in that dictatorship.

That is what Sir Stafford's letter, in diplomatic terms, replied to Azad. But there was an even more crucial aspect which Sir Stafford, for sound reasons, avoided stating. It was this: the decisive influence upon the Congress Party is Gandhi; Gandhi is a sincere proponent of the philosophy of non-violence, or pacifism.

The Congress Party demanded an autocratic Cabinet with full powers. On any proportionate basis of representation the Congress Party, or that party plus Hindus from other parties, would form the majority in the Cabinet. Could Sir Stafford, could any government—British, American, Russian, Chinese—agree to set up an irremovable Cabinet responsible to and dismissible by no higher authority or no legislature, and in time of war face the risk that the defense of India would become subject to a philosophy of pacifism? Nehru, Azad, and many other important leaders of the Congress Party believe in active resistance, are vigorous anti-fascists. The greater part of the rest of the Congress Party supports resistance to the Japanese. But resistance by what means? They have usually defined resistance as non-violent resistance. On May 2 the All-India Congress Committee voted 176 to 4 in favor of non-violence (it rejected at the same time Rajagopalachari's proposal for cooperation with the Moslems). Let me be perfectly blunt—the risk of interference in the defense of India by believers in non-violence could not be taken with Japanese troops on the borders of India and the Japanese navy in the Bay of Bengal.

On April 11 Azad replied in stronger terms, asserting that Sir Stafford had promised Cabinet government in "our very first talk." This letter Fischer quotes at the beginning of his articles and goes on to say that Sir Stafford never denied the assertion. This point, which has already been answered, is, of course, the purpose of Sir Stafford's most important letter, of April 10, which Fischer himself quotes.

There is a denial in Fischer's own article, the denial made clear by Sir Stafford's deletion of the term "National Cabinet" from the Congress formula. There is a denial in the broadcast which Sir Stafford made to India and the world on April 11.

Fischer's thesis, then, falls bleakly to the ground, unproved and disproved. His own statements prove nothing. Every statement of the Congress leaders throughout the negotiation up to the final rejection confirms that there is no basis for Fischer's suspicions, none at all.

On April 12 and April 13 the hounds of propaganda were unleashed. It was impossible to besmirch Sir Stafford's sincerity or to deny the long-term offer of full dominion status, as full as Britain's or Canada's. The story of the "sabotaging" of the Cripps mission took shape, and it has been barked around India, around the world. I personally heard the story in its first forms from Congress supporters before I left India; it was repeated to me in various guises from New York to San Francisco in my ten weeks' visit in America immediately after the mission. Fischer and The Nation have elaborated it into its classic mold.

"Why did Cripps fail?" asked Fischer, and proceeded to give only the answer of the Congress Party.

The answer of history is to be found not in telegrams from London nor in events presumed to have occurred in London or in the Viceroy's house or in Sir Stafford's headquarters, but inside the Congress Party itself. The success of the mission was possible; if the Congress Party had stood by its own acceptance of the final form of the proposals, the other parties in India would have readily accepted them. There would have come into being a government of the principal Indian political leaders controlling through the Executive Council the great Departments of State. This Executive Council would have ruled India by its own majority decisions, for that is the law of the existing constitution. It would have been subject to no use or exercise of the Viceroy's overriding powers so long as the Hindu majority did not impose its views on Moslem or other minorities and so long as the organization of the defense of India was not impeded. It would have represented the power and will of the great political parties of all India. In practice that Executive Council would have been the supreme government of India; so long as it resisted the pacifist wing of the Congress Party and cooperated fully in waging war in every sphere of its activities, there would not have been interference. The tragic disorders that inevitably followed when Gandhi and Congress attempted last August to stimulate a campaign of mass civil disobedience would not have occurred.

As M. N. Roy, former leader of the Congress Party and former member of the Third International, wrote in the Statesman of Delhi, April 12, "Britain's offer visualized the real transfer of the power to wage war for the defense of the country. Only the power to make peace with the invader, instead of resisting him, was withheld."

Can Volstead Stage a Comeback?

BY WILL CHASAN

UNDISTURBED by scoffers and critics, prohibitionist leaders are calmly predicting that national prohibition is coming back, "this time for good." The growth of dry sentiment during the last war, which caused the New York Times in 1919 to announce that "prohibition seems to be the fashion, just as drinking once was," is one source of the prohibitionists' present optimism. A more immediate one is the Gallup poll's revelation that 55 per cent of the people want more stringent regulation of the liquor industry, and that 36 per cent want it abolished. The Gallup poll, say the prohibitionists, reveals "the rising tide that will soon sweep the liquor traffic off the map."

The war obviously has provided the prohibitionists with a superlative opportunity. There is a general notion that alcohol "menaces the fighting efficiency of a nation"; and parents whose sons are in the army are easily worked up by talk of drunkenness in the camps. Both of these facts were nicely exploited by the Anti-Saloon League and the Women's Christian Temperance Union during the last war, and the country is now being subjected to a repeat performance.

The propaganda for a war-time ban on drinking now descending on the country is cunningly simple. Its main theme is the unpleasant one that we are tipping our way to military disaster. By a rather ingenious interpretation of history the prohibitionists show that "of the seven great nations that passed across the face of history in Bible times, at least five—Israel, Assyria, Babylon, Greece, and Rome—owed their downfall largely to drink." In the more recent past they point to France, "whose collapse in 1940 was largely due to alcoholism." Their authority for this version of the French débâcle is Marshal Pétain, whom they quote as saying, "Our men were drunk and could not fight." Some other examples of the iniquitous effect of drink, according to the prohibitionists, are Hongkong, Singapore, and Pearl Harbor. The charge that the Japanese surprise attack at Pearl Harbor was made possible by widespread drunkenness has been circulated persistently by the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the Anti-Saloon League, and other prohibitionist groups, despite a formal refutation of it by the Roberts report. Though it isn't true, the charge is effective propaganda for the thesis that we must turn to teetotalism to vanquish totalitarianism.

The prohibitionist attack, as harassed spokesmen for the liquor industry will attest, is an awkward one to meet. Often it relies on such clever and irrefutable im-provisations as the statement by a Shreveport, Louisiana, minister that "Hitler has forbidden his air force to destroy or bomb any distilleries on the British Isles because these distilleries are his greatest allies." It blandly attributes German military prowess to Hitler's drastic limitation of alcohol consumption, blames all industrial accidents on drunkenness, and routs opponents with the question, "Would you like your boy to ride across the Atlantic on a boat captained by a drunkard?"

Repeal Review, a publication of the liquor lobby at Washington, asserts that the current prohibition drive is inspired from Germany, and that it is a subtle effort to create disunity. The argument has a strongly partisan ring, but it has some merit. The evidence of Nazi inspiration boils down to three facts, which may or may not be highly significant. The first is that articles by one Dr. Robert Hercod, secretary of the International Temperance Union at Geneva, an organization which receives a yearly subsidy from Germany, have been appearing regularly in official publications of the Women's Christian Temperance Union and the Anti-Saloon League. Hercod's articles are not political but usually praise the National Socialist regime's "benevolent" attitude toward the temperance movement. The second fact, uncovered by the Boston Rumor Clinic, is that the German short-wave radio has broadcast lurid accounts of drunkenness in army camps and has urged mothers to demand prohibition for men in the services. The third fact is that many American fascists have become ardent prohibitionists. Captain Edward P. Gaston, who several years ago launched the Patriotic Guards of America for the announced purpose of establishing "a military dictatorship" in the United States, recently turned up as a director of the World Prohibition Foundation. Gerald B. Winrod's Defender, America in Danger, Publicity, and other pro-fascist publications, when last heard from, were on the prohibition bandwagon, and tugging the reins in their own peculiar direction. Early this year Publicity, which is published in Wichita, Kansas, asked its readers, "How complete is the control of Sedgewick County night life by foreign Jews and wops?"

Despite such evidence, the charge that the Nazis set off the present prohibition drive is essentially implausible. For one thing, the Anti-Saloon League and the ladies of the W. C. T. U. were quite capable of doing the job themselves, prompted by nothing more seditious than their familiar passion for regulating other people's habits. Moreover, there is no evidence to show that Nazi influence has got beyond the periphery of the movement. The Nazis apparently have seized upon prohibition as a divisive issue, and they are trying to exploit it, but the dubious distinction of having revived the issue still belongs to the simon-pure prohibitionists.

In their strategy, as in their propaganda, the prohibitionists, who hardly believe in innovation for its own sake, are following the line which brought success in World War I. Their strategy now is the old one of the "entering wedge." Instead of urging immediate enactment of a national prohibition law, they are pressing only for a measure to ban the sale of spirits in areas surrounding army camps, and they are continuing to fight isolated local-option battles. With a growing number of male voters going into the army, their chances of swiftly extending the country's dry area through local-option elections are naturally enhanced.

Actually, our dry area now is much larger than most people suspect. The Christian Science Monitor recently estimated that some 23,000,000 Americans live in communities into which Demon Rum cannot legally enter. The states of Kansas, Oklahoma, and Mississippi are entirely dry, if one for a moment overlooks the bootleg industry which thrives in all three, and numerous towns and counties in other states have accepted prohibition laws of one sort or another. Of the 158 local-option elections which resulted in changes last year, 131 were won by the prohibitionists. In the first nine months of this year local-option elections turned twelve more counties dry, and the total will probably be higher when the year ends.

The present dry area, although its dimensions are imposing, is smaller than our dry area when we entered the last war. At that time twenty-three states had prohibition laws, in addition to many counties in other states. This would provide some solace to the liquor industry were it not for the fact that prohibition sentiment, as the Gallup poll shows, is rising swiftly.

The liquor industry, in addition to shaking its head ruefully over the progress of the prohibitionists, has naturally been doing everything possible to head them off. Directly or indirectly, it has backed the repeal forces in local-option elections, and it has labored heroically to impress the country with the vast benefits it confers upon the people as a whole. Most important of all, the various liquor associations and unions have been trying systematically to end those abuses which most easily incite the public against drinking. Early this month the New York Metropolitan Package Store Association called upon retailers and bar operators "to thwart the menace of prohibition" by encouraging temperance. On the same day an American Federation of Labor bartenders' union in New York pledged that its members would "not sell to persons who are intoxicated or to minors," and its president, a Jack Townsend, declared,

"It is nothing but sabotage for sailors, soldiers, and defense workers to be intoxicated." But representatives of the liquor industry doubt that this high moral tone will placate the prohibitionists, and the Beverage Times has told its readers, in a we-must-fight-to-the-last-ditch spirit, that "whatever contingency arises, the distilled-spirits industry must be prepared to meet it."

The contingencies may be expected to develop without much delay. Senator Josh Lee's proposed rider to the 'teen-age draft bill, which would have prohibited liquor sales in army-camp areas, was shunted to the Senate Military Committee by a vote of forty-nine to twenty-five only after what liquor lobbyists themselves described as a nip-and-tuck battle. But probably an effort now will be made to force it out. Should the Lee rider be buried, as the Senator himself was in the recent election, the prohibitionists probably will have a series of new bills ready for introduction in January, immediately after the Seventy-eighth Congress convenes. With a fairly large bloc of drys in Congress the prohibitionists will have no difficulty in getting their bills introduced.

The dry forces, led by a highly resourceful lobby, have been skilfully softening up Congress for their impending drive. Individual Congressmen have been deluged with letters and petitions from civic and church groups. Senator Bilbo said this summer that he had "received more letters of complaint on this particular subject than [letters] complaining about strikes and Congressional pensions." Obviously some sort of record. The large number of Prohibition Party candidates for Congress in the last election—twenty-six for the House and eight for the Senate—probably will inspire a sympathetic interest in prohibition among Congressmen in districts where dry sentiment is strong. Another factor that will undoubtedly influence Congress is the almost united front which church groups have now mustered for war-time liquor restrictions. In recent months more than a dozen religious bodies have either announced or reiterated their desire for war-time prohibition. The campaign by religious organizations was begun by Bishop Cushman, president of the Anti-Saloon League, and the publication of the Board of Temperance of the Methodist Church indicates that intensive action is planned both nationally and locally.

"Brethren," wrote the editor of a prohibitionist weekly this summer, "the time has come for the Christian forces of this nation to lay aside timidity, expediency, and fear of misunderstanding, and rise up in righteous wrath such as this country has never known before." Religious fervor has in the past carried to victory causes which had little to do with religion itself, and it may do equally well for prohibition. If it does, the American people will again be in a position where, as Clarence Darrow once put it, they will have "to drink their way to liberty."

The South American Trojan Horse

BY MANUEL A. SEOANE

I THINK it a mistake to underestimate the importance of the role that South America's natural resources and geographic location play in this war. I consider it a danger to forget or ignore the fact that certain of the South American governments, in spite of their avowed alignment with the United Nations, have actually a fundamental affinity with totalitarianism, and that they therefore constitute "Trojan horses" inside the democratic lines. I deem it misguided policy to forgo action, adhering to a non-intervention which aids the dictators, rather than to create some sort of legal machinery which, without impairing national sovereignties, would serve to establish democracy as the common rule in both Americas. Finally, I maintain that only genuinely democratic regimes can in the long run efficiently cooperate in the defense of the hemisphere.

I shall try to prove these contentions.

According to recently published statistics, Japanese occupation of British and Dutch possessions has lost to the United Nations 65 per cent of their tin imports, 90 per cent of their rubber, 20 per cent of their tungsten, 16 per cent of their oil, and 100 per cent of their quinine. These figures of themselves point to the importance of Latin America in supplying the needs of war production. If we examine only actual production—potential development is almost limitless—we find that the combined oil production of Venezuela, Mexico, Colombia, and Peru reached, in 1940, 268,000,000 barrels. (Argentina consumes all its own oil.) In 1941 Chile produced 405,000 tons of copper bars and nearly one million tons of nitrates. Bolivia is today the chief source of tin for the United Nations. In the valley of the Amazon and in Mexico the cultivation of rubber had already in 1940 reached 20,000 tons, and can be much extended. If we add to this vanadium, tungsten, iron, manganese, molybdenum, cotton, sugar, cereals, and meats, we have a pretty fair picture of what Latin America can do for the United Nations.

But if Latin America is vital to the war economy, its geographic location makes it an object of major military strategy. In view of the heavy fortification of the North American coasts, and after the repulses at Midway and the Aleutians, it is safe to assume that the Axis will not attempt to approach by way of any of these zones. When it wishes to attack America it is likely to strike at the points most poorly defended. Latin America is the weak frontier of the United States—and the logical place to establish a bridgehead in the New World.

One of the most vulnerable spots is the South Pacific. Chile's copper and nitrates are exported to the United States. From the Peruvian coast oil is shipped to Australia. And when one looks at Ecuador one notes its proximity to the Panama Canal. Now Ecuador is a weak country with an annual budget of $8,000,000. Peru and Chile together own one battleship, five cruisers, ten destroyers, and thirteen submarines; their joint navies number 40,000 men, and their armies 30,000.

These facts lead to two conclusions: first, the Latin American countries must be helped to strengthen their defenses; second, it is absolutely essential that the regimes receiving help be truly anti-totalitarian in order to avoid the risk of this new strength being used as an instrument of rivalry between the various states, or in any way contrary to the purpose for which it was provided.

The first point is not within my competence to discuss. But in any case it is the second which appears to me the most fundamental. All but two of the Latin American countries have formally aligned themselves with the cause of the United Nations. However, this alignment is in many cases the fruit of convenience rather than of deep-seated anti-totalitarian sentiment. The United States is now the country that buys most of their raw materials and sells them most of their manufactured goods; it is the only one that grants them loans. It is therefore quite logical that the governments of Latin America should proclaim their sympathy with their chief benefactor.

But does this solidarity with the United States really mean solidarity with democratic ideals? And more specifically, does it mean a determined rejection of Nazi fascism? The fact is that in Latin America there are only three or four truly democratic governments, and one of these is Chile, which has not yet defined its position. In some countries there are regimes which may be considered semi-democratic; others are real dictatorships whose rulers—like Hitler—suppress civil liberties, persecute and imprison the opposition, and function without any curb by public opinion. They represent minorities who remain in power only by force, and their fundamental political interest inclines them toward the Axis. The South American dictators are in fact precursors or imitators of Hitler and Mussolini. They are the flowering of a conservative reaction that does not forget that Germany and Japan are fighting the Soviet Union. Though for the time being they are glad to buy and sell and negotiate loans where they can, they dread a Russian victory, they fear the penetration of the Labor Party in the government of Great Britain, and they do not care for the New Deal. In their heart of hearts they hope for the victory of a political system that would legitimize their own authoritarianism.

Is it foresighted and intelligent to accept the status quo? A benighted realism that looks no farther than tomorrow will answer yes. But who can state with any certainty that tomorrow will not produce in Latin America another Hungary and Rumania, which will deliver themselves to the Axis without a fight? And in any case, to bow before the status quo is to forget that there are real anti-totalitarian forces in Latin America, ready to take up the battle for democracy.

But how act without running counter to the principle of non-intervention, which is the cornerstone of the Good Neighbor policy? Let us speak frankly. To begin with, absolute non-intervention is more a theory than a fact. Once you have recognized an illegitimate government, have granted it loans and provided it with arms, have officially entertained its chief, then, whether you like it or not, there has been intervention. And this curious, concealed intervention aids and abets a dictator, who uses such backing to further his suppression of the democratic groups in his own country.

In the second place, this so-called non-intervention facilitates real intervention by the Axis, whose financing of the fascists in all countries places them in a privileged position with respect to the real democratic elements. This is preeminently the case in Argentina, where 80 per cent of the people are pro-Ally but are without any means of making a stand against the wealthy Axis-supported pro-totalitarian organizations.

Finally, in time of war, when the very existence of nations is at stake, abstract principles are invoked only if they do not jeopardize victory. Nobody was surprised to see the United Nations "intervene" in France against Laval's policy of capitulation. Intervention is like a knife. It stabs when handled by an aggressor; it saves when it is a surgeon who wields it. The interventions of the past were repudiated by the peoples of both Americas because they were undertaken in favor of private interests. The non-intervention of the present, born of an honest intention to cooperate, runs the risk of frustrating the development of democracy. More immediately it exposes to the danger of widespread sabotage and possible attack the resources of Latin America, now so indispensable to the Allied war effort. The combination of great natural wealth, undefended coastlines, and unreliable governments is not one which offers much security to the anti-Axis coalition.

This does not mean that positive, active intervention is necessary. The democratic elements in Latin America know that they must fight their own battle. All that the liberals ask is that the democracies of the United Nations cease to help the enemies of democracy in Latin America, and that they begin to understand the Latin American liberals and regard them as their real allies.

A truly democratic program will also check the effectiveness of German propaganda, which now finds fertile soil in Latin America. The Nazis keep asking, "What kind of democracy are the United Nations fighting for? What is this democracy that accepts dictators as allies?" The psychological battle is complex and hazardous. It can never be won in Latin America without an intelligent and realistic program of political war.

Our Korean Allies

BY SELDEN C. MENEFFEE

AFTER thirty-eight years of Japanese occupation millions of Koreans are still ready to take up arms against their oppressors. Whether they will be able to do so depends in large part on whether the United States gives them recognition, encouragement, and supplies.

At least 35,000 Koreans are already under arms in China. Several thousand of them are organized in the Korean Independent Army, which is fighting with the forces of Free China. This group includes the former Korean Volunteer Corps, which was organized by left-wing Koreans in 1938. Its size is severely limited by sheer lack of rice, guns, and ammunition. (These were presumably the Korean troops which inflicted damage upon the Japanese at Canton on September 27.) Other Koreans are fighting with the Eighth Route Army in northern China and with the guerrilla forces in Manchuria. Some 50,000 have also joined the Russian army in Siberia, according to Korean sources in Washington.

The Korean Peninsula is of immense strategic value to the Japanese, since a substantial part of Japan's war industry is located near Korea's rich mineral resources and great hydroelectric power installations. Geographically it is more of a "dagger pointing at the heart of Japan" than is eastern Siberia. It is separated from Japan's principal island—Honshu—by only a hundred miles of water. Its 23,000,000 people have long been kept in utter subjugation, but last June a force of 2,000 patriots showed enough fight to attack Japanese airports, oil depots, and dockyards in Korea. If United Nations forces land in Korea they will have the support of virtually the entire population.

In Japan itself are nearly a million Korean laborers—a sizable fifth column. More than a hundred thousand are working in war industries; many obtained their jobs by volunteering as "absentee wage-earners," workers who take the jobs of drafted men at half pay so that the remainder of the Japanese worker's wage can be given to his family in Japan. A few Koreans are in labor battalions of the Japanese army, but they are not armed—because of the high mortality rate among Japanese officers of Korean troops during the early years of the war in China. Many Koreans in Japan have taken Japanese names and speak the Japanese language. This should make them doubly useful to us when the time comes for an invasion of Japan proper.

In spite of its strategic potentialities Korea is virtually a forgotten nation for this country. We have a long and dismal history of ignoring it. In 1882 Korea agreed to open its ports to American shipping, but only after we signed a treaty promising to give it a helping hand in case of trouble. Yet when Japanese troops occupied the country in 1904 we looked the other way; and we were still looking the other way when Japan annexed Korea in 1910. In 1919, inspired by Wilson's doctrine of self-determination for minority peoples, Korean patriots adopted a Declaration of Independence and staged nation-wide demonstrations, only to be mowed down by Japanese guns with the tacit consent of Japan's allies.

Nevertheless, the Korean provisional government, formed in 1919, has persisted in exile. Dr. Syngman Rhee, first President of the (provisional) Korean Republic, now represents that government in Washington.

Pearl Harbor brought the Koreans new hope of political support. But disillusionment soon followed. Our State Department continued to ignore Korea, and one of its officials actually voiced the belief that the country had lost its national identity. The department has steadfastly refused to recognize the Korean provisional government. It failed even to acknowledge a communication from Dr. Rhee asking whether the existence of the United States-Korean treaty of 1882 (which has never been denounced) might at least be noted, now that America has somewhat belatedly followed Korea in warring against the Japanese. The Korean provisional government was refused the privilege of signing the United Nations pact. When the Office of War Information wanted to put Dr. Rhee on the air early this year to speak to Koreans abroad in their own language, the State Department delayed the project for five months by withholding permission. The only signs of friendliness that have been given by our government were one sympathetic reference to Korea by President Roosevelt in a speech early this year and the fact that Koreans are not required to register as enemy aliens.

Chungking, in helping to finance the Korean Independent Army, has given the provisional government what amounts to de facto recognition. But when Chinese representatives in Washington proposed to initiate more formal relations with the provisional government, our State Department, presumably after consulting with Britain and Russia, advised them that we could not join in such a move. China has made no further overtures.

Recognition of Korea as a nation, which would imply its independence after Japan's defeat, would make a tremendous political and psychological impression not only on the Koreans but on all of Asia.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

FEW Americans have ever heard of a prominent fellow-citizen named Kaufmann or know that he is one of President Roosevelt's most intimate friends and advisers. In Germany every child has known of him for a long time. Germans are so well informed about Mr. Kaufmann that the mere mention of his name recalls what he stands for. In one of his recent articles Dr. Goebbels wrote, "Thanks to the Jew Kaufmann, we Germans know only too well what to expect in case of defeat." He did not have to amplify this. He reminded his public of something that he was sure was engraved on their memories.

Three years ago an American named Kaufmann, an obscure business man, wrote a pamphlet called "Germany Must Perish." In it he described in great detail what should be done to Germans after the war. Through a little operation, not a very painful one, they must all be sterilized, made into eunuchs. Only by such action, he said, could the world make sure that Germany would perish and the other nations be left in peace.

Mr. Kaufmann's idea was still-born in America—but not in Germany. In 1940 Goebbels received a copy of his book, and welcomed it as a gift from heaven. Here at last was documentary proof of the fate in store for Germany if it should lose the war. The government had the book translated, printed an enormous edition of it, and pumped it into every German household. Everyone who applied for a food-rationing card received at the same time, pressed into his hand free, a copy of "Germany Must Perish."

All that is now an old story. But it has recently had a sequel which will revive and reinforce it.

The writer of this column confesses that he is not among those who favor easy peace terms for Germany. Moreover, he believes that an overwhelming proportion of Germans would regard a severe peace as normal and understandable, and that there is little prospect of arousing better expectations in them. The situation is bad enough as it is. Must it be made more difficult by fantastic proposals with no basis in reality?

The question is asked because Mr. Kaufmann has had a successor—and one of much greater weight. In the introduction to his anthology "Men at War" Ernest Hemingway again suggests that after the war all Germans should be sterilized. One can easily foresee what stimulation Goebbels will derive in coming weeks from this un hoped for bit of manna. For Hemingway happens to be extremely popular in Germany. Since the appearance of his "Farewell to Arms" he has been regarded as one of the most enlightened spirits in the United States. One can imagine how Goebbels will build that up:

War Americana

Notice in the bathroom of a Missouri hotel: "Remember Pearl Harbor and spare the towels."

I told a Missouri audience that after the war we would have to practice more internationalism and eliminate our high tariffs. A lady asked, "What will we do with our patriotism if we lower the tariff?"

I asked a superintendent of schools in a Pennsylvania county seat how people felt about the war. He said they want a second front. A workingman in Orrville, Ohio, told me, on his own initiative, that the Russians had saved us. I heard the same sentiment expressed by the taxi driver who took me from Orrville to Canton. He was an old fellow, a Mark Hanna Republican named Bricker. "No relation of the Governor," he assured me.

At every meeting I address, someone asks when this war will end. After a lecture at a state teachers' convention in Nebraska, forty-three written questions were sent up to the platform. Five asked when the war would end. My usual reply is, "The war will end on October 17, 1943, at 4:30 p. m., just in time for cocktails."

October 31, Chicago: My Irish taxi driver says he will vote for Senator Brooks. He is very vehement. "We shouldn't have gone to war, anyway," he says. "Pearl Harbor was our fault. Why did we send the scrap to Japan? They're murdering our boys in the Solomons, and we ship thousands of men to England just to sit around and drink beer."

LOUIS FISCHER

"Now you see what plans for you are being cooked up by the most intelligent elements in America."

Probably Mr. Hemingway did not mean to have his proposal taken literally. He cannot possibly have believed that it could be carried out. If anything is certain, it is that the United Nations will never sterilize any people. Not to mention the many humanitarian and political considerations that would forbid it, there is the Catholic church, which is known to condemn sterilization, always and irrespective of motives, as a deadly sin. Five minutes' reflection is enough to show one that the idea is absolutely impracticable. It was quite unnecessary therefore to make Herr Goebbels a present that would prove so profitable to him. We have no means of preventing him from twisting to his own purposes the serious suggestions—good and bad—which are published here. But by loose talk about preposterous proposals we make it much too easy for him to whip up the spirit of his people.

Spain and North Africa

ON NOVEMBER 8 President Roosevelt addressed a letter to General Franco, the Spanish dictator, announcing that American forces had landed in French possessions in North Africa "with the sole purpose of preventing occupation by Germany and Italy." The concluding sentences of the letter read:

I hope you will accept my full assurance that these moves are in no shape, manner, or form directed against the government or people of Spain or Spanish territory, metropolitan or overseas.

I believe that the Spanish government and the Spanish people wish to maintain neutrality and to remain outside the war. Spain has nothing to fear from the United Nations.

The President may well be right in believing that Spain would like to maintain its present shadowy neutrality. The more pertinent questions, however, are, first, whether Hitler can afford to permit it to do so; and, second, whether Franco can oblige the President by resisting if Hitler decides to take over strategic points in Spain, the Spanish islands, and Spanish Morocco.

Even before Franco came to power it was well understood that the outcome of the Spanish war would profoundly influence the future of the Mediterranean and of Europe as a whole. A cursory examination of the geography of Spain makes this easy to understand. Let us look first at the Balearic Islands, object of innumerable struggles from the days of the Phoenicians to those of the fascists. An able writer on the Mediterranean, Margaret Boveri, discussing the relations between the powers since 1918, says of these strategic bits of land:

One thing remains constant, and that is that facing the French island of Corsica and the Italian island of Sardinia is the neutral group of the Balearic Islands, just where the most important French and British sea routes and an important Italian sea route cross. Hence the struggle to tinge Spanish neutrality with one shade or another, and the tremendous anxiety with which the development of the civil war is being followed in London, Paris, and Rome.

Apparently, however, the anxiety in London and Paris was not great enough to induce those governments to end the intervention in Spain which had resulted in the early establishment of an Italian regime in Majorca.

Another interesting reference to the strategic value of these Spanish islands occurred in a lecture delivered by General Ettore Grasetti in 1938 in a military course given at Milan University. Said the Italian General:

The western coasts of Sardinia and Sicily constitute, with the Balearic Islands, a system that, once under our control, will neutralize the British artery of Gibraltar-

Malta. Thus with Italian influence in Palma de Majorca and German influence in Melilla and Ceuta, the Rome-Berlin Axis extends to the western Mediterranean (Majorca-Cagliari-Trapani), can sever the great British artery at its western source in Gibraltar, and can wield decisive influence in an easterly direction toward the island of Pantelleria. As far as France is concerned, the Italian Balearic-Sardinia line will cut the French lines between Marseilles, Casablanca, and Oran in the west, between Algiers and Philippeville in the center, and between Tunis and Suez in the east. In short, the whole French arterial system between the home country and French North Africa, the basis of French general mobilization, can be severed.

How directly these words bear upon the problem of an invasion of the Continent from North Africa is obvious.

The strategic importance of Spanish Morocco and Tangier is second only to that of the Balearics since these territories face—and threaten—Gibraltar. Could Gibraltar be defended if Spain should join, or be used by, the Axis powers? In the German "Naval Annual" of 1938 Admiral Gadow discussed this question.

The air arm gives a negative reply. Long-distance batteries would consign the fortress and its fleet to a terrible fate. On the other side of the strait, and facing Gibraltar, is the Spanish base of Ceuta, with powerful fortifications which can be made even more powerful. Would a Nationalist Spain, emancipated and conscious of her own destiny, decide to revive the old claim for a Spanish Gibraltar? Would she make use of the privileged position of those sentinels of the strait, Cartagena and Cadiz, and so jeopardize the two-hundred-year-old British policy built on the strategy of naval bases?

In the present situation the ports of Spain, particularly those of southern Spain and Spanish Morocco, also demand attention. Cadiz, Arzila, and Larache, all offer points from which offensive action could be taken against shipping and against French African ports on the Atlantic, now under American attack. It is also to be noted that the roads and the railway from Oran which join those Atlantic ports to Algiers and Tunis pass, for a distance of nearly 250 miles, close to the Spanish Moroccan border; so that in addition to the dangers threatening the Allied sea routes there is also a chance of attack by land.

If the American forces with the support of British naval units make good their advances into French Africa, they will surround the area controlled by Spain. But unless they are able to prevent the use of that territory, particularly the fortified port of Ceuta, by Germany, their situation will remain precarious. And if Hitler takes possession of Spain's southern Atlantic and Mediterranean ports, or establishes a base in the Balearics, the dangers facing an Allied invasion of the Continent will be multiplied.

Ersatz Life in France

[The following extract is from a letter received by a reader of The Nation. For obvious reasons the name of the writer and his location cannot be revealed.]

IT WILL soon be three years since I have sent any news of myself. You must have thought me dead. The last letter I received from you was sent by Atlantic Clipper, on one of the first crossings. The speed of modern transportation—it reached me four or five months later, in the little Alsatian village where my regiment was billeted for the winter during the demoralizing idleness of that guerre pourrie which followed the guerre blanche! I wanted to write to you then, but all the intellectual activity I could muster in that stupefying period was used in recopying and polishing the manuscript of my history, which I had begun to prepare, with fine appropriateness, on the fifteenth of August, 1939. On the ninth of May, 1940, I put the final period to the third section. On the tenth, as you know, the real war began for us. It took me from Alsace to the Somme. We experienced the terrible shock of June 5. On June 10 we were the last soldiers to see, receding in the distance behind us, the Eiffel Tower, where for a few hours longer the tricolor still floated. In July I found myself demobilized, in an old blue linen suit, with two shirts and a toothbrush, without money or friends, but holding on to the manuscript of my history, which had filled the kit bag on which for two months I had been sleeping. I was free and in what we call the free zone. I had the luck to find here a small office job, and here I live, waiting.

Your friend Henri did not have my good luck. He was at Metz and was made prisoner in the Vosges with the troops that had evacuated the Maginot Line. He has been in Germany two years now. He has done everything, twenty-three jobs in all—hotel porter, workman, plowman, and so on. He escaped twice and was twice recaptured. At the moment he is crushing stone. He has shaved his head, and his comrades call him "Gandhi," which makes me think he must be very thin. In spite of everything he has gone through, he maintains a staggering morale.

Whether I shall ever be able to finish and perfect my history I have no idea, so great, in present circumstances, is the uncertainty of tomorrow. Every day I am astounded that the day before was at least for me relatively peaceful and relatively free. To go on, as I am doing, with a long historical work is a gamble. It is doubtful, moreover, whether I shall ever be able to publish the fruit of my labor, since the paper crisis is total.

What shall I tell you further of the life we all lead?

People outside are apt to picture it in a way that does not at all correspond to reality. Recall, for example, the restrictions which for several years before the war existed in Central Europe. The French, who then lived in liberty and plenty, imagined that such a life must be terrible, and not only for intellectuals but for the man in the street as well. That is not at all the way you must visualize it. Obviously it isn't at all amusing to spend two hours in a queue waiting to buy cherries and then not be able to buy cherries, especially on a day when there is nothing else for sale at the market. But life does not stop because of this; famine does not slay you and all those around you. In spite of everything, life goes on, with whatever it carries of passion and hope, and work goes on as well. And with some good humor you can even find amusing things in this Ersatz life. It is funny, you must admit, to see in a showcase a roll of straw braid, the sort of braid which modistes used to make hats of, and underneath it the notice, "Make your shoes yourself." Again, you have to laugh when you hear that a Horsemen's Association in Limousin has sent this appeal to the Vichy government: "In view of the fact that the future belongs to the horse, and that the horse suffers from asphalted roads, we demand the immediate de-asphalting of the roads." However, it may be foolish to laugh, for the automobile, even with gazogene, becomes each day more legendary.

Drawing by Boardman Robinson

The life we lead, you see, has in certain aspects a distinct resemblance to "Duck Soup," which we still see in the movie theaters, together with—which is not less astounding—"Mr. Smith Goes to Washington." It is very much a day-to-day life. Shoes with holes in them, patched shirts hold an important place in it. And so do dried beans. Often I say to myself, if I can get, with ticket DZ, 250 grams of dried beans I shall be able next Sunday to write the next chapter. For it is a fact, which I had not before experimentally proved, that intellectual work requires a certain amount of dried vegetables—we won't speak of fats or meat; without them it is accomplished with great difficulty and small success. Nevertheless, don't feel sorry for us, and don't, above all, feel sorry for me, since I for one have a very bearable, even comfortable life. I saw two years ago that you can be relatively comfortable during a barrage if you are flat on your belly in a field or under the illusory shelter of a tree while your neighbor in his haste has lain down with his face in a clump of nettles or in a ditch full of water. Moreover, after your first friend has been killed, you are less shocked by the death of the second, and, with more reason, still less shocked by the death of the tenth, whatever anyone may say. How many will be left when the rolling fire of the barrage has stopped? The spirit of the harsh weeks of 1940 is still with us in 1942.

Everybody's Business

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

A Threat to Labor Morale

IN CERTAIN restricted but influential circles abolition of the forty-hour week is being heavily plugged as a panacea for the man-power problem. The first loud voice in its favor was that of Senator Reynolds of North Carolina, who said that the standard work week should be boosted to fifty-seven hours with elimination of extra pay for overtime. "I say fifty-seven hours," he added, because Great Britain is working fifty-seven, Germany is working sixty, and Japan seventy."

Anyone reading this statement might be forgiven for the deduction that the British standard work week is fifty-seven hours. And, indeed, Senator Reynolds, who is an ignorant fellow, may well believe this to be a fact. But the same excuse can hardly be offered for the New York Times, which, after editorially advocating a standard forty-eight-hour week, continued: "The average work week in England is now fifty-six hours. Our own average work week in factories is still less than forty-three hours. Before we resort to compulsory labor we should remove the present artificial scarcity of labor brought about by legal or union restriction of hours."

There is nothing absolutely inaccurate about this passage, but it is misleading since there is no hint to the reader that the average English work week actually includes from eight to nine hours of overtime.

The facts are that while the hours of labor of adult men are not limited by law in Britain, they are restricted in practically all industries by agreements between trade unions and employers' associations. The normal work week is forty-seven to forty-eight hours, with overtime paid at one and one-quarter to one and one-half times the standard rate and double time on Sundays. Moreover, under the war-time Essential Work Order which freezes men in war factories to their jobs, workers in essential undertakings are guaranteed as a minimum the "normal" weekly wage in that industry. This affords them protection, not enjoyed by American workers, against being forced to go on short time owing to non-arrival of materials, machinery breakdowns, or other causes beyond their control.

Before the war most British trade unions placed some restrictions on the amount of overtime that might be worked, but during the Dunkirk crisis they agreed to suspend these provisions. A report on the consequences made by the Parliamentary Select Committee on National Expenditure, a body with a conservative majority, is worth quoting at some length:

Where the normal working week had been fifty or fifty-five hours it was commonly increased to sixty-five or in some cases to seventy-two hours a week. The immediate effect of this and of the national appeal for the greatest effort was a remarkable increase in output. Quite obviously, however, such an effort could not be maintained for any length of time. Output began to decline rapidly at the end of a few weeks and at the end of about two months fell to a little above and sometimes lower than that which was obtained before the increase of the length of the working week. Some establishments realized the situation and reduced hours at once; others were slower in doing so. At the present time [August, 1941] although hours have been generally reduced, there are establishments where a normal working week above sixty hours is still in force.

What a contrast between this cool and informed appraisal of the hours question and Senator O'Daniel's demand for a standard seventy-two-hour week!

In July, 1940, the British Ministry of Labor recommended an immediate reduction in hours to sixty a week, with the ultimate aim of bringing them down to fifty-five or fifty-six. At the present time the average is probably around the last figure. A great many plants in Britain while working all round the clock for six days a week have found that the most satisfactory results are obtained by not attempting to operate on Sundays except in the case of special rush jobs and for purposes of maintenance and repair. Both the health and the productivity of the workers have, in most cases, been improved by the provision of a regular day of rest. Moreover, vacations are regarded as essential to health. It was not possible to arrange for them during the stresses of 1940, but in 1941 and 1942 the government urged workers to take the week's vacation with pay which was general in Britain before the war.

Once again it must be emphasized that in Britain all hours worked above the standard week are paid for at the additional rate; so that the average worker is receiving extra pay every week for eight or nine hours overtime. The average American worker, on the other hand, is working less than three hours overtime, which suggests that the American employer is much less willing to pay a premium rate than his British counterpart. Primarily, hours of labor are being restricted by profit considerations.

For there is no reason to suppose that American workers in war plants would not put in longer hours if they got the chance. The November issue of Fortune, in an article entitled What's Itching Labor, quotes an Illinois-Carnegie steel worker as exploding: "Hell, I'd like nothing better than more production. So what am I doing? I work five days a week. They won't let me work more." Other men in the steel mills interviewed by Fortune expressed similar views, but they all said "no" when asked if they were willing to work extra hours without overtime rates of pay. Some of them, however, qualified this by stating they would agree if the additional profits that resulted were extracted and if executive salaries were restricted. While Mr. Grace enjoys a bonus that expands in proportion to Bethlehem's profits, they do not see why they should forgo incentive pay for extra efforts.

If the reactionary press gets its way and the new Congress, feeling its Republican oats after the election, carries out proposals to repeal the forty-hour law and abrogate union contracts providing for overtime pay, we can expect a sharp decline in labor morale, unless at the same time commensurate restrictions are placed on profits. For men who have been earning regular overtime pay, action of this sort would mean an actual slimming of the pay envelope, and for their employers it would mean so much gravy.

Nevertheless, if it can be proved that the wage-and-hour law is a hindrance to production, its suspension for the duration can be justified. But in this case other private rights protected by legislation, which are proving an obstacle to the war effort, should be treated in the same manner. If workers are to suffer pay cuts by acts of Congress, why should not holders of tax-exempt bonds forfeit their privileged position? If contracts between unions and employers are to be canceled by Congress, why should not this set a precedent for the legal abolition of patent-license agreements, which certainly add to the cost of production? Class legislation, hitting only at labor's privileges, must intensify to a dangerous degree the workers' suspicion that the war is being used as a battering ram against their hard-won standards—a suspicion already aroused by the constant nagging to which they are being subjected in so much of the press.

AMERICAN LEGION leaders in Massachusetts have taken it upon themselves to investigate alleged violations of the Selective Service laws in that state. Commander William F. Campbell, chairman of the investigating committee, asserts that "draft-dodging has become so flagrant that large numbers of a certain racial group are coming from New York to this section, where they are getting defense jobs and keeping out of the draft." A group of Boston liberals is urging an investigation of the Legion.

NO LONGER able to pursue its normal business, the Singer Sewing Machine Company has developed and is now manufacturing a machine for suturing wounds.

WORLD GOVERNMENT ASSOCIATION, an organization with an ambitious program for international amity, recently invited its followers and friends to a meeting which featured "Contract Bridge, a Concert of Yugoslavian Music, and a Conference on World Government led by Clark M. Eichelberger." Chief Rising Sun of the Cherokee Nation will call the meeting to order.

THE BROOKLYN TABLET, unofficial heir to Social Justice, predicts that children from fourteen to sixteen years old will soon be drafted for war work and that their mothers will then be sent into the front-line trenches.

A REPORT of a speech by an S. S. leader in the Hamburger Fremdenblatt shows one way in which Nazi leaders are explaining Hitler's difficulties to the German people. "The effects," the speaker is reported to have said, "of the many centuries during which German blood has been absorbed by foreign peoples became particularly noticeable in the fight against Germanism, for the German blood has given the foreign races a belligerent spirit of resistance."

THE BOOTLEGGING INDUSTRY, which has flourished despite repeal, now faces a new crisis. Sugar rationing has cut down production and forced many stills out of business.

Notes by the Way

THERE has never been anyone quite like James Thurber: yet I suspect the reason his particular kind of madness, at its best, is so acceptable and satisfying is that it is an authentic species of the genus of humor Americans have always demanded and created.

Here is the essential and ingratiating innocence; the tall tale and the knack of leading the reader into the domain of fantasy and the fabulous by "a bright trail of fact [which] fixes the attention . . . and seems natural"; the overturning of old values; the poetic sense of life; the monologue and the constant use of "I," which is a mask, "simply and blankly worn," for expression that rises out of submerged emotion and self-scrutiny but seldom if ever "brims over into self-revelation."

The mask was a portable heirloom handed down by the pioneer. In a primitive world crowded with pitfalls the unchanging, unaverted countenance had been a safeguard, preventing revelations of surprise, anger, or dismay. The mask had otherwise become habitual among the older Puritans as their more expressive or risible feelings were sunk beneath the surface. . . . No doubt the mask would prove useful in a country where the Puritan was still a power and the risks of pioneering by no means over. The Yankee retained it.

The American humorist has retained "the unchanging, unaverted countenance." So has the hard-boiled "deadpan" novelist, almost ad nauseam.

I pause for identification of the source of the quotations and, indeed, of the whole paragraph. It is "American Humor" by Constance Rourke.

Mr. Thurber's present collection, "My World—and Welcome to It" (Harcourt, Brace, $2.50), is uneven in quality. What Do You Mean It Was Brillig?, The Macbeth Murder Mystery, and the Secret Life of Walter Mitty seem to me the best items, and they are excellent. I also like The Letters of James Thurber and A Good Man. You Could Look It Up is interesting for what it attempts to do; but here the balloon of fantasy does not quite get off the ground.

Part Two of the book is mainly made up of six "straight" pieces—well, more or less straight—about pre-Vichy France. They are amusing; they have a touch of the innocent abroad; they are also moving, but largely, I think, because the reader's affection for France and the fact of France's fall make them so.

Thurber's drawings, of subjects human and inhuman, provide a happy ending to almost every piece. They too are innocent, ingratiating, and fabulous—though I recently had a Thurberesque experience which suggests that his drawings may after all have some connection with reality. A few Sundays ago when I opened the door to pick up the Times a large Dalmatian hound walked in. I had never seen him before; I haven't seen him since. Perhaps there really was a seal in Thurber's bedroom.

THE FALL NUMBER of the Antioch Review contains an article on the North American Negro by Luis Alberto Sanchez y Sanchez, the exiled Peruvian writer who was one of the contributors to The Nation's series on Hispano-American literature. Mr. Sanchez does not give us new facts about our treatment of Negroes. What he does do, and what makes the piece so fresh, is to show us, in a South American mirror unclouded by the associations that even the unprejudiced among us cannot escape, how cruel and stupid that treatment is. The article is part of a book Mr. Sanchez is writing about the United States for publication and distribution in South America. I hope it will be published here.

I HAVE BEEN meaning for some time to protest against a statement which appeared on the editorial page of the New York Times at the time of the death of Alice Duer Miller, who wrote "The White Cliffs of Dover." The Times labeled that work "doubtfully imperishable"—which reminds one of that equally recessive line, "Scarce dare we hope oak galls, I doubt." The editorial went on to say that "Mrs. Miller's other works . . . have added to the enjoyment of countless men and women of all ages even if, as literature, they were too light and gay to become what we ponderously call classic."

THE TALE which follows is said to be true. Not long ago a new house officer at one of the hospitals of the Medical Center was making the rounds. When he called on one elderly gentleman he made conversation by asking what the patient thought of the Center. The elderly gentleman expressed his admiration and then added, "I organized it." The house officer was startled but went calmly on.

"Do you know any of the people here? Dr. —?" He named several eminent physicians. Each time the patient answered that he did, and wound up by saying casually, "I appointed them."

The house officer took his leave, shaking his head over the things old gentlemen can imagine. It was only when he began telling the funny story to his colleagues that he learned that the patient was Nicholas Murray Butler.

THE WORD "progressive" is one of the hardest-worked in the language. So it is no wonder, I suppose, that a progressive publisher is about to issue a book by a progressive author entitled "The Complete Book of Progressive Knitting." Its primary object is to "raise knitting from a grandmother's pastime to an accomplished art."

FOR PUNSTERS ONLY: According to a dispatch from Ottawa, the general secretary of the Communist Party of Canada has revealed that during the two years he was being sought by police he was hiding out in northern Ontario. The heading read "Tim Buck Reveals Hideout." I'll print the four-line verse that makes the best punning use of that provocative line.

Three Views of Russia

THE TRUTH ABOUT SOVIET RUSSIA. By Sidney and Beatrice Webb. Longmans, Green and Company. $1.50.

DUEL FOR EUROPE. By John Scott. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

WE'RE IN THIS WITH RUSSIA. By Wallace Carroll. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

SKIPPING an unfortunate preface by G. B. Shaw and going straight to the grain: the Webbs seek to improve relations with the Soviets by declaring that Stalin is not a dictator and that, except for transitional blemishes, the U. S. S. R. is already a full-fledged and multiform industrial democracy. To make their points they just quote extensively from the 1936 constitution. The result is necessarily a purely abstract treatment, of which the following is quite typical.

So far as Stalin is related to the constitution of the U. S. S. R. . . . he is the duly elected representative of one of the Moscow constituencies to the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R. By this assembly he has been selected as one of the thirty members of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U. S. S. R., accountable to the representative assembly for all its activities. It is this Presidium which selects the Council of Commissars (Sovnarkom) and, during the intervals between the meetings of the Supreme Soviet, controls the policy of the Sovnarkom. . . . In May, 1941, Stalin, hitherto content to be a member of the Presidium . . . took over, with the consent of the Presidium, the office of Prime Minister . . . in exactly the same way . . . that Winston Churchill, with the consent of the House of Commons, became Prime Minister. . . .

Of the Soviet Prime Minister's relations with the Communist Party the Webbs offer this explanation:

[Stalin] has persistently asserted in his writings and speeches that . . . so far as the Communist Party is concerned he acts as general secretary under the orders of the executive. He has, in fact, frequently pointed out that he does no more than carry out the decisions of the Central Committee of the Communist Party.

But the Webbs have a second and more realistic line of argument. Recognizing that one feature of the Soviet democracy is "the idolization of one individual as an infallible leader who must be revered and obeyed and not criticized," they explain Stalin's accession thus: After Lenin's death it was agreed "that some new personality had to be produced. Among the leaders of the Communist Party there ensued a tacit understanding that Stalin should be boosted as the supreme leader." The Pickwickian sense given to the words "ensued" and "tacit" may cause some discomfort, which is not lessened when one reads that the supreme-leader idea is after all inconsistent with Marxism, but that the facts "suggest" that in Russia's backward condition there was "no alternative to the one-party system with its refusal to permit organized political opposition to the new political and economic order." The latter suggestion may be true, but it hardly jibes with previous arguments. It is a pity, for the original abstraction and the consequent contradictions obscure the fact that the Soviet economy, which this reviewer believes to be the most important single thing a socialist has to defend in this war, is socialist in its basic structure.

Two very different books remain. In his former volume,

"Behind the Urals," Mr. Scott established himself as an authority. In it he movingly described his experiences as a worker at Magnitogorsk. Unlike the Webbs, Mr. Scott was a tiny but living cell in the vast organism of Soviet life. His book, poorly written as it was, was one of the most powerful influences this writer has experienced this year. Mr. Scott, admitting his pain and horror at certain features of Russian life, shrinking at what, for a Westerner, proved to be an intolerable burden, nevertheless declared his profound belief that the Soviet Union was filled with a great sense of good purpose and that its achievements were real and substantial. In short, Mr. Scott confirmed one's belief that if in the post-war period there is a desperately necessary influx of the blood of socialist democracy into the Soviet system, then in the U. S. S. R. we shall see something that will be worth all the cost of war and revolution.

Mr. Scott, then, respects the Soviet Union and has no need of special pleading. In the present book, the central thesis of which is indicated by the title, he examines Soviet relations with the Third Reich and describes Stalin's efforts to postpone and prepare for the inevitable shock. Upon matters of Russian foreign policy he has little to add that is new, though the simplicity of his formulation, "a duel for Europe," enables him to ignore distracting unessentials. But Mr. Scott has several great advantages. He is no mere correspondent. He knew the language and had many well-informed and confiding friends, and he was present in the U. S. S. R. until the outbreak of the Russo-German campaign. He can therefore credibly report the temper of the people. There are some surprises in his book. The first Russo-Finnish war, he says, was extremely unpopular in Russia and was the cause of a serious lowering of industrial morale, which led to a decline in production. But while the Red Army was unwelcome in Finland, the contrary was the case in Poland. The whole bearing and mental tone of Soviet soldiers returning on leave from Poland was proof that they had passed through an exciting experience of welcome.

But it is in his account of the U. S. S. R.'s preparation for war that Mr. Scott excels. Stalin did not for one moment place any trust in the pact. When the Finnish war had usefully disclosed certain weaknesses, a tremendous industrial and military drive was begun—involving, Mr. Scott says, hundreds of thousands of "casualties." Production in the spring of 1940 was low, but the measures taken sufficed to correct that state of affairs. The laws regarding lateness and absence were enforced with the drastic penalties of imprisonment and confiscation of wages. Much was accomplished by a virtual draft of labor, as in Britain, combined with the lengthening of the working day from seven to eight hours, plus overtime. (British and Russian workers now put in about equal hours of work.) Factory discipline was sternly enforced, and disobedience and slovenliness in work became crimes. A million youths were conscripted into semi-militarized industrial schools. Prices of certain goods were raised to lower consumption, while free higher education was abolished. In the army the promulgation of a new disciplinary code was accompanied by drastic reorganization. Special and successful efforts were made to improve equipment supplies, which had been insufficient to fit out a vast mass of reserves. In this account, I believe, Mr. Scott has been a little too content to recite the external facts. A greater emphasis should have been placed on the advantages of the Soviet type of economy. It is a question of degree, of course, for Mr. Scott does attribute some of the success of that preparedness campaign to facilities which Mr. Carroll, in "We're in This with Russia," describes as follows:

In the Soviet Union, where private property has been abolished, the government was not hindered by private rights. . . . It did not have to plead with the motor industry to stop the manufacture of automobiles and start the production of tanks. It did not have to waste public funds on "cost plus 10 per cent" contracts which encouraged manufacturers to slow down production, keep labor idle, and increase costs in order to increase profits. And it did not have to plead with labor unions to waive the forty-hour week and extra pay for overtime.

Upon one important point Mr. Carroll here misinforms us. The Soviet government did not have to plead with the Russian unions, but Russian workers do receive time and a half pay for overtime above a forty-eight-hour week. And I think he might have remembered that if the American automobile workers' union had had its way, production would be much farther along than it is.

"We're in This with Russia" is a typical correspondent's book, well and warmly written, sympathetic and liberal in attitude. If it adds nothing to what Messrs. Caldwell, Ingersoll, and Werth have told us, that is perhaps not Mr. Carroll's fault. He reports with sobriety, except for an occasional excess: in distributing arms to the people the Soviet government certainly showed that it was confident the people would make good use of them, and Sevastopol proved that trust was justified; Mr. Carroll, who has seen the British Home Guard, comments thus, "No other government, even in this total war, had dared to put such confidence in its people." But there are few such blemishes, and if, despite the good liberal sense of its final chapters, I do not urgently recommend this book it is solely because it contains little fresh information. Skip the Webbs, buy the Scott, and reserve the Carroll at the library.

Anti-Nazi Thriller

HOSTAGES. By Stefan Heym. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

STEFAN HEYM'S novel about the Nazis in Czechoslovakia will set your hair on end. No doubt a faithful record of what it is like to live under the Nazi terror, it piles horror upon horror in nearly unbearable quantity and photographic detail—torture, rape, all the excruciating paraphernalia of Nazi sadism. You get the impression that Mr. Heym hates violence almost too much, he is so fascinated by it. But neither his sincere passion against Nazism nor the emotions which his readers will bring to his subject can raise his book to the place claimed for it in the ranks of serious anti-fascist literature. It takes more than a serious audience to make a serious novel. For the most part "Hostages" is only a grand-scale thriller. This is not to ignore the difference between the fear we feel as we contemplate a whole nation of murderers and the fear we feel as we contemplate the individual acts of terror of an ordinary thriller; but it is also not to confuse the emotions an author plays on in his readers with the emotions he himself creates. When you have finished "Hostages" and your equanimity is restored, you have the cheated sense of having yourself written the best part of the book. What Mr. Heym has contributed is shabby, sterile, sentimental.

A group of people are in a Prague cafe on an afternoon when a Nazi officer disappears from the cellar. The Gestapo knows the officer is a suicide but prefers to act as if he were murdered; all the people in the cafe are held as hostages for the non-existent murderer, among them a group of five men who are placed in one cell—an industrialist, an actor, a journalist, a psychoanalyst, and a janitor. It is with these five, their lives before their arrest and their conduct as they await death, that the novel chiefly deals; the janitor, a member of the underground, has comrades outside of jail who provide the free-moving action of the story. Here, obviously, is material for any kind of novel. Using the microcosmic device, Thomas Mann wrote "The Magic Mountain," and Vicki Baum wrote "Grand Hotel." Mr. Heym's novel, when it is not a thriller, is an anti-Nazi "Grand Hotel." His psychoanalyst woos immortality by taking notes on the reactions of his cell-mates; the actor gives himself a big scene by trying to confess to the uncommitted murder; the pitiless industrialist is unapologetically shown up in all his cowardice. Mr. Heym's characters, compounded of all the elements other novelists have taught him to look for, may simulate reality but they are only contrivances.

Perhaps it is always the fault of meretricious fiction that it likes to deal with the biggest subjects: kitsch walks in where fine intelligences may fear to tread. In common with so many modern novelists, Mr. Heym is much concerned with death and with the problem of how we must live in order to know how to die; and like so many modern novelists, he solves his problems politically. Only Janoshik, Mr. Heym's philosophizing janitor, can meet death courageously, for of the five victims he alone has lived with a sense of his continuity in freedom; in so far as his companions learn his "truth" in their few days of association with him, they too are able to face death bravely. Well, it is Mr. Heym's novel to do with as he likes; he had only to demonstrate his thesis instead of stacking the cards for it. But it seems that death, like other important subjects, defies the novelist with a political ax to grind, no matter how great the cause in which he sharpens his weapons.

Business in American Life

THE AGE OF ENTERPRISE. By Thomas C. Cochran and William Miller. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

EARLY in this "social history of industrial America" Professors Cochran and Miller assert that "[we] have not been a people essentially political, literary, metaphysical, or religious. Our habits and folkways have not been formed only by voting, reading, logic-chopping, or prayer. Our manners are not simply those of conventions, lyceums, schools, or churches. We have been primarily a business people, and business has been most important in our lives." There cannot be the shadow of doubt that business has been something very special in our national life. Emerson noticed it as far back as 1834. Henry Demarest Lloyd, in "Wealth Against Commonwealth" (1894), complained that we were averse to examining what was the greatest force in our personal and social lives. Professors Cochran and Miller are anything but shy in their examination: they relate exceedingly well what forces combined to make this a business country, and what business did to the people in it.

There is little essentially new in "The Age of Enterprise," and the authors emphasize that their purpose has been "simply to make the non-professional reader acquainted with what we believe to be at once the most useful and most easily available books and magazines which bear upon our subject." Considering our general unwillingness to talk business when discussing our civilization, this is something in the nature of a public service. The reader does get the story, and he is bound to realize from it that industry has not been merely a fact in American life but one of its major factors.

At the same time the authors' enthusiasm for their subject has, I think, made them a little extreme in their view. How "primarily" have we been a business people? There is Gilbert Seldes's "Stammering Century"—a similar case could be made out for religion. There is Louis Adamic's Common Council for American Unity—American history could certainly be interpreted in terms of Plymouth Rock to Ellis Island. The persistent problem—and this Professors Cochran and Miller have not fully resolved—is precisely how much of a factor business has been or can be at any given time. Business may be the heart of the nation, as Charles Edward Russell once wrote, but it isn't its blood, bones, and brains. Suppose one has read "The Age of Enterprise." Suppose one has seen the effect of transportation and the frontier on industrial America, and studied the rampant individualism which it encouraged; watched the political triumph of industrialists, the "Gilded Age," the rise of the labor movement and farm bloc, the Progressive era. Suppose one has sampled the art, ethics, philosophy, and social standards which accompanied these changes. One comes to the era of world finance, super-efficiency, high-pressure salesmanship—and what then? Professors Cochran and Miller see hope in the fact that the New Deal finally took our individualist bull by the horns and made it walk with something approximating social consciousness. But war has now taken over, and the future of American business, if it is to be seen aright, will have to be read with particular care out of the past.

Professors Cochran and Miller grant willingly that there is plenty of work yet to be done in their subject. Here is one suggestion. The Progressive movement, they say, was composed of "fringes" of the urban middle class—united with the Western yeomen—which, "truly conservative," opposed all collectivism, that of trusts as well as of trade unions. "[The Progressives] insisted . . . upon the supremacy of laws over men or institutions, and they had a naive belief in the efficacy of legislation to achieve their ends."

That is the accepted version. But it is a question whether the fact that super-businesses succeeded the old trusts discredits the attempts of the Progressives to prevent the evils of the trust system. Is it certain that without their efforts to restrain the trusts, those same trusts might not have become uncontrollable forces in American society? Were the Progressives really "naive" in fighting for salutary legislation? Let us grant that the Progressives failed to bring the millennium—who did?

What one can learn from "The Age of Enterprise," it seems to me, is that no book which does not take business into account can help us to understand ourselves today. An outlook—cultural, political, social—which ignores the business strain in our civilization will stumble somewhere. Sinclair Lewis in "Babbitt" and Matthew Josephson in "The Robber Barons" told only parts of the story. The rest of it includes such figures as Henry Villard, "Golden Rule" Jones of Toledo, Joseph Fels—yes, and Sherwood Anderson.

IN BRIEF

THE BURNING WHEEL. By Slater Brown. Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

Mr. Brown has written a serious and intelligent novel about a group of poor Connecticut farmers and the frenetic city people who buy farms and become their neighbors. When one of the city men seduces the daughter of a farmer, all the tensions latent between the two groups flare up into melodrama and violence. Using the device of a narrator who is welcome in both camps, the author can tell his story without restricting his point of view to one side or the other; in fact, Mr. Brown's ability to look at all his characters with equal honesty and understanding is an outstanding achievement among present-day novelists. But it was not necessary for him to put a "curse" upon his valley: all such communities are cursed, and for the same reasons. The malignancy that Mr. Brown attributes to his particular part of the countryside, symbolized by the scrambling poison ivy, deprives his novel of its full significance and indicates an unwarranted lack of faith in his ability to tell a general truth about people.

MY HEART FOR HOSTAGE. By Robert Hillyer. Random House. $2.50.

Writing simply, and dully, Mr. Hillyer tells the love story of an American soldier in Paris at the end of the last war. The American boy, who is very New England, has an affair with a French girl, who is very French. The girl lies, the boy judges too quickly, and although the two love each other dearly, they fail to make a go of things. With a little bounce and humor here would be material for a nice light novel, but instead, unfortunately, Mr. Hillyer has written a thin and nostalgic reminiscence.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL. By Richmond Croom Beatty. Vanderbilt University Press. $3.

In a highly finished work urbanely and effortlessly combining biography, literary criticism, social history, and scholarship Professor Beatty has performed the difficult feat of revealing James Russell Lowell in "the essential shallowness of his mind" while doing full justice to his abilities and his charm both as a man and as a writer and to his significance in American life. Without debunking

Lowell he shows him up and yet leaves him worth reading and worth reading about. If his culture was derivative it was real, and as for the core of the man, he himself asked: "If I am not an American, who ever was?" To read about him in these pages is a pleasure.

INDIANS OF SOUTH AMERICA.

By Paul Radin. American Museum of Natural History Science Series. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $4.

While the hazards of armchair anthropology are different, they are not less than those of direct investigation; but Dr. Radin skirts the usual difficulties more skilfully than usual, producing a lively book whose main ingredients are quotations and condensations liberally gathered from a variety of good sources. Failing to satisfy the interest it stimulates, "Indians of South America" derives its merit largely from the fact that the author has indicated the richness of the field as well as the paucity of information concerning it. He has charted the subject in its broad outlines, described in interesting detail the specific culture traits of a number of aboriginal tribes, and raised provocative questions, to some of which he offers tentative solutions. Native cultures are described as they existed in the past or as they persist, virtually unchanged, in the present. The sole chapter dealing with fairly recent times describes the life of "a modern Aymara," and relies chiefly for its material on a late nineteenth-century account by Adolph Bandelier. The failure to include any discussion of Indian-white acculturation is most unfortunate, for it throws the whole picture out of focus so that the book, though vivid and true in detail, is vague and inaccurate as a whole.

BOHDAN: HETMAN OF UKRAINE.

By George Vernadsky. Yale University Press. $2.50.

This is a somewhat romanticized biography of Bohdan Khmel'nitsky, who in 1648 led the famous Ukrainian rebellion against Poland and presided over an impartial massacre of Polish landlords, Catholic clergy, and Jewish tradesmen and land agents. The story has its picturesque side, which is highlighted by the author, and also its obscurantist and brutal side, which is not. The social aspects of the Cossack movement, and its larger European significance, are noticed but not developed.

BY
ARCHIBALD BOLLING SHEPPERSON

The surprising, yet authentic human story of two people and their intimate associations with the men and women who shaped America's destiny. A book for today about those who, yesterday, lived to temper the steel from which our freedom was forged. Tense with interest, varying from King George III turning his back on Jefferson to Lucy's pouring scalding tea down a guest's back, and including the hitherto unpublished account of an arch-traitor to the American Cause. As frank as a diary—more illuminating than history.

ART

PAVEL TCHELITCHEW. Paintings and drawings. The Museum of Modern Art, until November 29. Tchelitchew is one of those whose function it is to supply up-to-date art for the forward-looking masses on Fifty-seventh Street. Also, like his fellow neo-romantics and most of the orthodox surrealists, he reverses the anti-pictorial trend of cubist and abstract art to assert again the fictive nature of what the picture frame incloses. The painting becomes once more a window into another world—which in this case is generally supposed to be the artist's most private mind—and the frame is the unambiguous line of demarcation. Tchelitchew is accomplished enough. But in essence his work is a vulgarized documentation of most of the fashions in advanced painting since 1920, and his pictures, taken even on their own terms, are deadened by their trite and static organization. Everything stays too obediently in its place, the value of one color is too close to the value of every other color in the given picture, tonality is too even, design too balanced. There are, however, three or four likable pictures: two comparatively early harlequin subjects, a gaudy autumnal double-image landscape in gouache, painted recently, and a pretty painting called "In the Madhouse." In his present phase the artist should stick to gouache or water color; his latest oils with their shrill saccharine color and gelatinous symbolism set a new high in vulgarity.

JOHN B. FLANNAGAN. Sculpture and drawings. The Museum of Modern Art. It is more difficult in these times to be a good sculptor than a good painter. Flannagan was a good sculptor. Yet there can be discerned in his work most of the hesitations that afflict the contemporary artist. His respect for his material, his reluctance to interfere with it, and his greater success in small format reflect among other things his lack of a conviction or certainty definite and strong enough to justify the complete transformation of a large brute block of stone into a man-made monument. Less assurance is required, it seems, to create in two than in three dimensions. In three dimensions one works closer to one's subject; and without the control of some fixed point of view which has an authority more than personal, there is a danger of succumbing to subject matter and verging, as Flannagan threatens to in more than one animal or figure piece, on the sentimental and even the cute. Flannagan is saved only by his sensitivity to the abstract forms dictated by recalcitrant matter; in the nick of time they step in to rescue the work of art. But there were also certain advantages in Flannagan's plight. Very little sculpture in stone has ever permitted the intimacy and the directness yet delicacy of feeling which are to be perceived in his. This is really lyric sculpture. It is quite likely that Flannagan was the best native sculptor we have had in this country.

PEGGY BACON: "Pens and Needles." Retrospective exhibition of pastels, prints, and drawings. Associated American Artists Galleries, until November 21. Miss Bacon is a crisp draftsman and, within the limitations of our culture and age, an amusing if rather distracted satirist. Her dry points, beside which her pastels are unimportant, are more effective in their details than as whole pictures. As wholes they are conceived in an offhand, unimaginative way, right in the tradition of the best Anglo-Saxon comic and caricatural art. Miss Bacon is not thoughtful enough to put real sting into her humor. This shows not only in the kind of anecdote she records but also in the very quality of her feathery line.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

RECORDS

GROPING for words to explain the compulsion that had led him, after a couple of Beethoven sonatas, to play a few small pieces by Schubert, a pianist I know said: "They are so much less important—but so much more beautiful." Some of Schubert's works, however, have great import as well as their heart-stabbing beauty; and one of these is the Piano Trio Op. 99, of which Victor offers a new recording made by Rubinstein, Heifetz, and Feuermann (Set 923, $4.73) to replace the Cortot-Thibaud-Casals version that has been withdrawn. One must regret the loss of the older version, with Casals's marvelously inflected performance of the cello part; but one must be glad that the new one is so good. Feuermann lacks the fire that produces the dynamic force, the powerful tensions of Casals's phrasing, but he plays with the beauty of tone, the impeccable plastic sense in phrasing that were to be heard in all his performances; Rubinstein and Heifetz play much better than Cortot and Thibaud—Heifetz, for once, with uncharacteristic simplicity; and without achieving the degree of ensemble integration that was the result of all the playing which Casals, Cortot, and Thibaud did together, Feuermann, Heifetz, and Rubinstein do achieve a good group performance. Except for a pace in the second movement that is a little too fast for the proper effect of the music, and a nervousness of style in Rubinstein's playing in this movement that also is disadvantageous, the performance is an excellent statement of the work. And except for an occasional blanketing of the piano by the strings the performance is excellently recorded.

Also on Victor's November list are Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" (Set 920, $5.78) and Barber's Adagio for Strings (11-8287, $1.05); and I can think of a large number of things for which Victor might better have used precious machinery, labor, and materials. Monteux's performance of "Scheherazade" with the San Francisco Symphony is more relaxed than Rodzinski's with the Cleveland Orchestra on Columbia, and is recorded with more richness of sound. Barber's piece is realized in the beautiful sonorities of the N. B. C. Symphony strings conducted by Toscanini.

On Columbia's November list is a set of all twenty-four of Chopin's Preludes played by Egon Petri (Set 523, $4.73), which does not satisfy our need of a good recording of these pieces. As far as I can tell from what comes off the records, Petri's conceptions—if not the best I have heard or can imagine, and if not without details I would question—are competent and acceptable. But the execution of these conceptions, as it comes off the records, is extremely defective; and it is difficult to tell whether the cause is wholly or only partly the faulty recording. The unbalanced recording of the sound of the piano—with the middle and lower range heavily outweighing the upper range—causes the melody in the right hand to be too weak and at times completely inaudible; but when only one or two sounds of an ornamental turn are not heard it may be because Petri has not played the turn clearly. And so with the many rapid passages that are blurred and confused.

On a Columbia single disc (71399-D, $1.05) are Elizabeth's Prayer from "Tannhäuser" and Elsa's Dream from "Lohengrin," well sung by Astrid Varnay.

Constance Rourke: Reply from the Critics' Den

Dear Sirs: I don't know whether to laugh at Margaret Marshall's curious delusion that she, and she alone, fully appreciated and understood Constance Rourke's beautiful work or to protest against her surly misrepresentation (in The Nation of October 24) of my New Republic review of "The Roots of American Culture." Perhaps I may do both.

No one would possibly guess from Miss Marshall's heavily scornful remarks that my review was essentially a tribute to one whom I considered one of the great philosophic folklorists of our time and a writer whom I described as an artist and an extraordinarily sensitive and scholarly student of the full range of our American culture. No one would possibly guess that I did not "dismiss" Constance Rourke but carefully distinguished her from the shallow folksy nationalists and professional antiquaries who are forcing so synthetic a patriotism on us today. No one would possibly guess that I praised Constance Rourke as having a vision of people's culture equal to D. H. Lawrence's; that I spoke of her as "an observer, a seeker of [American] essence"; that the very title of the piece, The Irreducible Element, pointed to her deep understanding of the estrangement from their native society, the ignorance of their native resources, that so many writers suffer from in America.

Nor would anyone possibly guess from Miss Marshall how warmly I wrote of Constance Rourke's exquisite taste, her joy in America, the "quiet exhilaration" in it that she described in Audubon and that I found in her. For obviously Miss Marshall did not mean anyone to guess. Because I dared to point out that Constance Rourke's recovery of so many native folk materials was not quite enough for us today, it appears that I "dismissed" her. Because I dared to suggest that Constance Rourke was an artist in those materials rather than a critic bringing past and present together, it appears that I did not take in the full meaning of her classic, "American Humor." But I did take it in, and I took Constance Rourke so seriously, wished so deeply to learn from her, that I examined her work where others merely praise her glibly because she proved America not quite the artistic desert they once thought it to be. But let Miss Marshall go back to the last chapters of "American Humor" and ask herself why Constance Rourke could write of Henry James only in terms of "The American," of Lardner only in terms of his dialogue, of Lewis only in terms of his cracker-barrel talk. My point was simply that for all her skill in analysis of the materials she recovered, Constance Rourke could only examine fragments of those materials in modern and contemporary writers. I said that she did not approach criticism on its contemporary ground; she thought she did, and Miss Marshall takes the will for the deed. But there is an essential vagueness in the last chapters of "American Humor," as in the last chapter of "The Roots of American Culture," that is inevitable in view of her concentration on our pre-industrial culture, her joy in the recovery of it, and her great desire—so abundantly fulfilled—to prove that Americans did have a distinct and often beautiful native culture of their own.

Nothing in Miss Marshall's piece, I must add, is so revealing as her notion that "American Humor" is "scandalously neglected." Of course it is neglected—among the avant-garde critics and those who believe anything is chauvinistic which speaks of our American nativity, our "irreducible element." If Miss Marshall knew anything of the studies of American literature that go on in our universities and scholarly magazines, if her own literary culture were not so limited to the avant-garde critics themselves, she would know that "American Humor" is studied and admired everywhere among those who have read something more than Partridge and Brooks. And she would know of the many who have declared it to be—as I consider it—one of the prime works on the American imagination.

But Miss Marshall must seize upon Constance Rourke; and use her as a banner. When one's reading of Emerson is limited to one's childhood, Constance Rourke's studies in Emerson's world can seem larger than life.

ALFRED KAZIN

New York, October 28

Miss Marshall's Rebuttal

Mr. Kazin's review was a tribute to Miss Rourke's "beautiful work" in the sense that a funeral service in a cemetery is a tribute. In his first four paragraphs he made many pleasant remarks: he even made statements which pointed to a quite different conclusion from the one he came to. His last two paragraphs, which I cited specifically as the basis for my comment, would certainly cause a reader not already familiar with her work to assume that it was charming but perishable and quite irrelevant for all practical or contemporary purposes. His final sentence, "Commemoration, somehow, is not enough," was the last sad shovelful thrown on the grave. That was his final verdict, and though it was delivered more in sorrow than in anger, it constitutes a dismissal.

In his letter Mr. Kazin says that the title of his review pointed to Miss Rourke's "deep understanding of the estrangement from their native society, the ignorance of their native resources, that so many writers suffer in America." (Isn't it asking a good deal of a reader to expect him to deduce so much from a title?) But surely such deep understanding, which is as rare as Rourkes, points not to static commemoration but to a living critical perception highly relevant to the present. It hardly squares either with Mr. Kazin's faintly patronizing description of Miss Rourke in the last paragraph of his review as living "in that recovered morning world [of early America]."

I still don't see how anyone who has taken in "American Humor" can say that Miss Rourke was an "artist in those materials" but not a critic bringing past and present together. To take only one example: he complains that she "could" write of Henry James only in terms of "The American." She could have written volumes about him; in "American Humor" she did write twenty pages of general and illuminating comment on James aside from the ten she gave to "The American." The design of the book hardly allowed for the detailed analysis of more than one novel. And I shouldn't be surprised if she assumed that the reader, having read it, might be capable of applying her insights and conclusions to other novels by the same author.

As for the charge of vagueness, Miss Rourke, it is true, did not provide charts showing our traditions in neat parallel columns; nor did she set down a recipe for writing the great American novel. She did give us a fresh discovering view of the sources that James and Dickinson and Whitman and Poe drew upon, consciously and unconsciously: by so doing she made the reader aware of the sources of his own thought and feeling. Is that criticism or commemoration?

Mr. Kazin's last paragraph is irrelevant, though I enjoy his rousing angry portrait of myself. Even I knew that Miss Rourke's work is valued by scholars. (I only hope it will be made compulsory for students, and for the right reasons.) The quite uncryptic title of my article indicated that it was concerned with the critics and the reviewers of books. They, rather than the scholars, must be depended upon to communicate Miss Rourke's ideas to the general public. I happen to think that is desirable.

Books on Trial

Dear Sirs: Your readers may be interested to learn that the defendants convicted in the Oklahoma criminal-syndicalism prosecutions, nationally known as the Oklahoma book trials, have been ordered to return to the state by December 1 to receive the verdict of Oklahoma's highest tribunal of justice, the Criminal Court of Appeals.

It will be recalled that in August, 1940, simultaneous raids with liquor search warrants were made on the Progressive Bookstore, the Communist Party headquarters, and six private homes in Oklahoma City. Nine men and three women were finally indicted under the Oklahoma criminal-syndicalism law on charges of possessing "Communist" books and of membership in the Communist Party. The evidence against them consisted entirely of books from the bookstore and from their private libraries. Three men and one woman were convicted on that evidence and sentenced to ten years in the penitentiary and a fine of $5,000 each. The court refused to allow the introduction of evidence to show that the books to which the prosecution objected were also on the shelves of the library of the University of Oklahoma.

Eight men and women still face trial. Their books are still locked up in the Oklahoma County jail—among them "The Communist Manifesto," the novels of Jack London, the speeches of Abraham Lincoln, and the Constitution of the United States.

Arguments on these cases were held before the Criminal Court of Appeals on September 9. Judge Thomas Doyle, eldest member of the three-man court, refused to listen to the attorneys for the defense and absented himself from the court during the entire proceedings, although he announced that he would take part in making the decision.

Two weeks later 176 prominent clergymen, including Dr. Guy Emery Shipley, Bishop James C. Baker of Los Angeles, the Reverend John D. Day of Topeka, Dean E. N. Comfort of Oklahoma, Dr. John Van Schaick, Jr. of the Christian Leader, and the Reverend John C. Cranberry of the Emancipator, addressed a letter to the Governor of Oklahoma assailing these prosecutions as a violation of the hard-won American right to freedom of conscience.

Those of your readers who see these prosecutions as part of the struggle of Southern diehards to preserve the economic and political status quo—as a threat to a free America—are urged to write to Mac Q. Williamson, attorney general of Oklahoma, Oklahoma City, asking that the state confess error in these cases and drop its attempt to sustain the convictions of the District Court.

Undaunted Refugees

Dear Sirs: We who are associated with the Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee are very proud to point to Konstantin Najd, thirty-year-old veteran of the Spanish War whose remarkable deeds as a leader in the Yugoslav guerrilla forces were especially cited in the press dispatches some weeks ago. For Konstantin Nadj, as a member of the International Brigade, was helped by our organization, and it was by such means that he was enabled to return to his homeland, where he now continues so magnificently the fight which was actually begun in 1936 in Spain.

This valiant young man is only one of the hundreds of anti-fascist fighters who have been aided by this committee to resume a life of activity and usefulness in our common cause. This was the opportunity they sought; it was the hope that sustained them in their starved and persecuted lives after they crossed the frontier into France. In Mexico and elsewhere they are making an incalculably high contribution; they are serving on every front as active fighters, as laborers, as writers and professionals.

A considerable number of less fortunate anti-fascist refugees, though they possess visas, are unable to obtain transportation because of lack of funds. The rates on the small Portuguese boats which bring them to Vera Cruz are indeed high, but it seems to us that no price is too great to bring to safety these men and women who, after unbelievable suffering, are still undaunted and ready to make any effort to defeat the Axis.

Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee

The Shape of Things

THAT THE GERMANS ARE SENDING FRESH forces into Tunis is significant. Since they cannot hope for victory in that region unless the disposition of forces in Europe is very much changed, it would seem that Berlin intends to fight a holding action in North Africa while preparing a blow elsewhere. Against whom will that blow be aimed? Turkey or Spain? Ankara has reported that German garrisons in the Balkans have been greatly strengthened, but it would be unwise to keep one's eyes too steadily fixed on that quarter. It is at least reasonable to believe that the German High Command would be much relieved if they could prevent consolidation of Anglo-American bases in North Africa. Hitler must surely wish to strike a speedy blow at the United States in order to show the German people and conquered Europe that the Americans are powerless to invade Europe. If that should be his decision, then Spain offers the only battlefield upon which he has any chance to counter our North African move. The closing of the Straits of Gibraltar would so endanger the entire supply system of the Anglo-American forces west of Libya that we might be compelled to make a "premature" counter-invasion and so risk confronting strong, well-prepared German forces. In other words, Hitler may decide to repeat his Norwegian maneuver.

BESIDES THE ENORMOUS GAINS REPRESENTED by control of the Straits of Gibraltar, a Spanish venture may seem to offer many other advantages to Hitler. Even should Franco decide to resist, his army is in no condition for serious fighting. By giving opportunity for a campaign of rapid movement Spain conforms to German tactical preferences, and the German leader, remembering the Napoleonic campaign, may reason that, after all, an invasion of Spain now would merely be forestalling a United Nations move later. Hitler will have learned by this time that the old paralysis is gone. No longer is there a reluctance among the democracies to invade so-called neutral territory. That the occupation of Spain would not be all advantage is true. Previous to our seizure of North Africa many experts held that Hitler preferred not to burden himself with fresh territories to police and new coastlines to defend. That can no longer be his main consideration. A far greater hazard is immanent in our own North African plans. Neither London nor Washington may wish to open the ball in Spain; yet the Allies cannot have sent so many men into the Mediterranean without taking into account the chance that Hitler might strike back through the Peninsula. It would be unwise to put exclusive trust in Franco's word or in Hitler's readiness to oblige the Spanish dictator. Once again there has been no change of heart in official Spain; the recent Cabinet shifts were only a change of guard. America must stand watch, therefore, against the Spanish troops in North Africa as well as Hitler's forces. The Straits are too precious to lose.

WE HAVE WON THE SECOND ROUND OF THE Battle for the Solomons in dashing style against a numerically superior enemy fleet. Warm congratulations for the navy, which has received some well-deserved brickbats in the past year, are now in order. Admiral Nimitz, in particular, merits commendation for ignoring the adage and changing the command in the Solomons area. His choice of Vice-Admiral W. F. Halsey, who is brilliantly living up to his reputation as an aggressive in-fighter, has been thoroughly justified. The Navy Department deserves our thanks, too, for releasing quickly a comprehensive account of the battle, including an apparently complete admission of losses which, while painful, represent a comparatively low price for the damage inflicted on the enemy. The Japanese fleet, dispatched to the waters around Guadalcanal for the purpose of landing heavy reinforcements and supplies on that island, was a powerful one, but significantly it appears not to have included any carriers. It approached at night and was caught off guard by a bold maneuver which sent our lighter ships racing between its lines. The smashing success thus scored was followed up the next day by aerial attacks on enemy transport and supply ships which accounted for ten vessels and thousands of troops. The withdrawal of the crippled Japanese task force provides us with an opportunity to clean up the enemy on Guadalcanal, and it should also facilitate MacArthur's operations against Buna. But as Secretary Knox warns us, the Japanese navy is not knocked out and we must be ready for the next round.

MUCH OF THE STING IN REPRESENTATIVE Maas's strictures on our Pacific war policy has been removed by the new victory in the Solomons. The Navy Department does seem to be mending its news policy gradually, and Admiral Nimitz and General MacArthur have recently cooperated to such good effect that the admitted dangers of divided command in the southern Pacific appear less glaring than before. Mr. Maas, of course, spoke with some authority as a member of the House Naval Affairs Committee and as a colonel in the Marines recently on active service in New Guinea, but he had little new to say about specific shortcomings. When, however, he turned in his radio address to matters of global strategy he gave voice to more original and more questionable ideas. His theme was the absolute necessity of defeating Japan no matter what happens in Europe, and he insinuated that our High Command was frittering away our strength on expeditions in too many different directions and neglecting the Pacific theater. In weighing the force of his arguments we have to remember that prior to Pearl Harbor Mr. Maas was an isolationist and as such must bear his share of responsibility for helping to delay the preparedness which would have enabled us to carry on war against Japan more effectively. Like other isolationists Mr. Maas sticks to the idea that the war against Japan is peculiarly "our war" and that the battle for Europe is of secondary importance. Nobody who can think in such compartmental terms has any business talking about global strategy. What is the sense of saying, "It makes little difference who wins in Europe . . . if the Japs win the Pacific"? Is it not equally true that if Hitler wins in Europe our chance of victory in the Pacific will be shattered?

WITH THE TOTAL OCCUPATION OF FRANCE by Hitler the situation of the leaders of the French democracy has become extremely precarious. Though the principal figures of the Riom trial could not expect any real justice from the magistrates of the Pétain regime, their lives were not in danger. They were protected by the growing feeling of sympathy and respect that the dignified behavior of Léon Blum and the awakening of Edouard Daladier had aroused all over France. As for Georges Mandel and Paul Reynaud, they were never even brought to trial. Reynaud's weakness at the end disposed the capitulators in his favor. Mandel, on the contrary, terrified the men of Vichy. He knew too much about them, and the prospect of having him address the tribunal with his usual courage appalled officials who might easily be transformed from accusers into accused. Herriot and Jeanneney were from time to time subjected to certain restrictive police measures but never to a real prosecution. Even Laval realized that the French people stood with these men. But Himmler will not be so sensitive to past records or present prestige. In Czecho-Slovakia, in Poland, in Norway, he has liquidated the men who have taken a similar stand. It is not likely that he will show more restraint in France. And the fate of these leaders, exposed by their prominence, will be shared by thousands of anonymous fighters for democracy, who have fallen, together with all France, into Hitler's hands.

AS FOR THE THOUSANDS OF ANTI-FASCISTS—Jews and non-Jews—who in the last fifteen years had come from all over Europe to find refuge in France, their fate is symbolized by the terrible news that Francisco Largo Caballero has been delivered to Franco by the Gestapo. The seventy-five-year-old Loyalist Premier, one of the most venerated figures of the whole international labor movement, now faces a firing squad as the end of his heroic career. It is to be hoped that all the American and Latin American labor organizations, together with every other decent human being in this hemisphere, will ask President Roosevelt to use his influence, by means of the radio, to prevent Caballero's execution.

THE ONLY REFUGEES FROM THE DICTATORS who may benefit from developments in the Mediterranean are the anti-fascists in North Africa—provided, that is, that the American command will take them under its protection. Messages directing attention to them have come from many parts of the world. Among the most interesting is one signed by General Vicente Rojo, the Loyalist commander whose offensive on the Ebro won him universal respect. With other Spanish generals now in Buenos Aires he offers his services to President Roosevelt, suggesting that he organize in two divisions the 30,000 men of the former Spanish Loyalist army who were sent to North Africa by Vichy and Hitler. Though such action is hardly feasible as long as we continue to recognize Franco, their liberation, as well as that of thousands of Italians, Jews, and others, should not be delayed.

LEND-LEASE SHIPMENTS IN OCTOBER CAME close to the billion-dollar mark for the first time since the outset of the war. President Roosevelt has announced that despite the preparations for the North African campaign we provided more than $915 billion worth of supplies to our allies, two-thirds of which were military items. This is welcome news indeed after the many months in which lend-lease shipments fell far short of expectation and need. Eighteen months ago it was estimated that we should have to provide a minimum of one billion dollars' worth a month in order to offset the advantages gained by Germany through its European conquests. That the United Nations have been unable until within the past few weeks to assume the offensive may be attributed largely to our failure even to approximate this goal. But recent events tell a different story. The importance of our growing lend-lease shipments is particularly evident in the African campaign. President Roosevelt declared recently that our total shipments of military equipment, food, and industrial supplies to the British army in Egypt totaled $636,952,000 in the nineteen months ending October 1. This included more than 1,000 planes, more than 500 medium tanks, and 20,000 trucks. A group of American-made Sherman tanks and self-propelled 105-millimeter guns which were sent after the fall of Tobruk proved of incalculable value in the final decision, according to Prime Minister Churchill. We trust that a similar story may be told before many months about Russia and China.

NOT SO LONG AGO A STRIKING PROPOSAL was made by the Chinese Foreign Minister, Dr. T. V. Soong. He urged that the United Nations begin now to create the new order that must follow the war, that they organize "a realistic machinery for collective security" and set it to work "before this war ends and while the pressures of war make it possible for such cooperation to catch hold." He spoke as one of the leaders of the nation that suffered first and has suffered most grievously from the failure of the League of Nations. But he spoke not out of discouragement but out of hope. Now his appeal has been echoed and expanded in a remarkable message from Chiang Kai-shek to the Herald Tribune Forum, meeting last Tuesday in New York. After discussing the essentially democratic texture of Chinese society and the firm determination of the Chinese people to move forward into complete political democracy, the Chinese President strongly repudiated the idea that after the war China might emerge as "the leader of Asia." China, he said had no desire to replace Western imperialism in Asia with an Oriental imperialism or isolationism of its own. And he called upon the United Nations to "start at once to organize an international order and embracing all peoples to enforce peace and justice among them." These words contrast pleasantly with the recent pronouncement in behalf of empire made by Britain's unreconstructible Prime Minister.

NO WRITER OR RADIO NEWS ANALYST HAS discussed the effects of the appointment of Admiral Darlan as head of the French administration in North Africa with more open distrust than Edward Murrow, speaking for the Columbia Broadcasting System from London. In the course of his report Mr. Murrow summed up Darlan's Vichy career in these lines:

Let's look at this man's record. On February 10, 1941, he became Vice-President of the Council, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the Interior, and the Navy. One of his first acts was to turn over political refugees to the Germans. He began at once to adopt Gestapo methods. His government was responsible for the sending of foreigners, mostly Spanish Republicans, from internment camps in France to slave-gang labor on the Trans-Sahara railway. He intensified the anti-Semitic measures. His police force helped the Germans round up Alsatian refugees in unoccupied France by the Germans. In July his government practically turned over Indo-China to the Japanese, thereby opening the back door to Singapore. In October a certain Carl Holtz, a German officer, was assassinated in Nantes. Six days later Admiral Darlan's government handed over thirty hostages to the Germans—Frenchmen. They were shot.

When the British went into Madagascar, Darlan gave the order to resist, saying, "Make the British pay as heavy a price as possible for their act of highway banditry." He asserted that the British had betrayed France in Flanders, tried to starve women and children in Djibouti, and that the day would come when England would pay. And now this man is given political dominion over North Africa—with American support.

The British press and radio, acting under guidance, take the line that for the time being military considerations dominate. . . . One wonders whether we may not stand dishonored in the eyes of the conquered people on the Continent who have been led to believe through Anglo-American propaganda that Darlan is one of the greatest living traitors.

Poll-Tax Filibuster

CAPITOL HILL agrees that if the bill abolishing the poll tax could be brought to a vote in the Senate, it would be approved by a majority comparable to that which it secured in the House. Nevertheless, the bill is in grave danger, for its passage is being fought by a gang of Southern Senators with every weapon in the arsenal of obstruction. Their tactics can be defeated, but only by determined majority leadership backed by the strong support of public opinion, which must be brought to bear not on the opponents of the bill—they are a hopeless case—but on those Senators who, while prepared to vote the right way, may contribute to its defeat by their slackness.

Last week Senator Barkley of Kentucky, who has accepted responsibility for pushing the measure through, sought in vain to bring it formally before the Senate. Friday's session was wasted by parliamentary maneuvers and prolonged debate over the question of whether the Judiciary Committee's favorable report had been properly adopted. On Saturday, while Senator Bilbo of Mississippi continued what appeared to be a promising filibuster, other members of the Southern bloc absented themselves in the hope of preventing a quorum. This move was countered by an order to the sergeant-at-arms to arrest Senators present in the city. But the session ended without any progress being achieved.

It is to be hoped that better attendance by Senators known to favor the bill will prevent any repetition of this time-consuming stunt, but it will inevitably be succeeded by new tricks. Senator Bilbo, while denouncing suggestions that he is planning a filibuster, has promised to talk from now to January 3, when the present Congress expires. And his lead is being followed by supposedly responsible men such as Connally of Texas and George of Georgia. The last-named, for instance, is proposing to attempt to tack on to the bill an amendment calling for a forty-eight-hour week, and some forty other equally irrelevant and controversial amendments are promised.

There can be only one answer to this attempt by a reckless and bigoted minority to obstruct democratic processes. As Senator Norris, who is fighting to kill the poll tax in the last great battle of his noble career, has said: "We can break this filibuster if we fight fire with fire. We'll have to invoke every parliamentary rule in the book to do it, but the Senate ought to have the right to vote on a question that is as fundamental as the abolition of the vicious poll tax." We hope Senator Barkley will be courageous enough to follow this example and that the majority favoring the bill will not submit to the dictation of a minority. Should they allow this to happen, they would be acquiescing in the disruption of orderly government and exposing the Senate to the raucous laughter of the anti-democratic forces throughout the world. Goebbels could not ask for more.

Man-Power Planning

THE report of a subcommittee of the Truman committee provides us with the nearest thing to a man-power program that has yet been offered—eleven and a half months after Pearl Harbor. On the whole, the subcommittee's program is a remarkably sensible one. It stresses the necessity for balancing our military and industrial man-power needs before establishing the details of our man-power policy. To this end it suggests the appointment of a single head with powers comparable to those of Byrnes in the economic field, who would have a voice in determining basic military and war-production requirements. This view has wide support in Congress, and reports indicate that the appointment of a man-power director may shortly be effected. In the absence of any over-all policy or the machinery for carrying out such a policy, the Truman subcommittee believes that it would be "a mistake for Congress even to consider passage of any drastic compulsory legislation." On this point the findings of the subcommittee concur fully with the recommendations of the Tolan committee, the Management-Labor Policy Committee of the War Manpower Commission, and the recent conference of the C. I. O. leaders.

And for the immediate present the judgment is scarcely open to dispute. Under present conditions no government agency—the Selective Service System, the United States Employment Service, or the Manpower Commission itself—is equipped to handle a program of compulsory labor placement. To attempt compulsion without a plan or machinery to carry it out would only arouse antagonism and imperil the management-labor truce which has prevailed for the past year.

This fact does not, however, justify the faith in voluntary measures shown by the Tolan and Truman groups. The Truman report declares, for instance, that "once a definite, clear-cut man-power policy which makes sense is announced . . . voluntary cooperation will be forthcoming in full measure." The experience of cities like Baltimore and Buffalo, where voluntary measures have been given a fair and extended trial, fails to bear out this conclusion. Under any system most placements would be made voluntarily, but experience indicates that reliance on voluntary methods—without a big stick in reserve—leads to muddling and procrastination. The contrast between the level of war production in the United States with its voluntary measures and that of Great Britain or Russia provides an unanswerable argument in favor of some form of compulsion.

On other matters the Truman group is on firmer ground. It is far more specific than any other such group has been in urging the expansion of nursery schools and supervision for the children of working mothers after school hours. It urges an aggressive campaign "to eliminate hiring prejudices of all kinds, whether because of age, sex, or race." In suggesting that the work week be lengthened to forty-eight hours whenever practicable, it avoids the danger that this will merely be a means of contributing to employers' profits by retaining the bonus for overtime and providing that additional overtime wages be paid in war bonds. Unfortunately, the recommendation left a loophole at this point by suggesting that employers be permitted rather than required to pay time and a half for all work over forty hours a week. While existing union contracts would presumably be honored under this proposal, unorganized workers would apparently lose the protection now afforded by the Fair Labor Standards Act. This would be in sharp contrast with wartime labor policies in Great Britain and Russia.

The discussions of man-power policy at the C. I. O. conference focused attention on the chief weakness in all discussions of man-power to date, a weakness that pervades all aspects of the war program—failure to take account of and provide representation for men who really do the work. No man-power policy, voluntary or compulsory, can possibly succeed without the confidence and active cooperation of the men on the job. British experience suggests that the surest way to obtain labor's cooperation is to give it an adequate place in the key war agencies. And this is not merely a device for salving labor's pride. When it comes to the formulation of man-power policy, the chief points of issue will not be large questions such as compulsion versus voluntary methods. The sore points are much more likely to be such questions as seniority, overtime pay, the payment of transportation and moving expenses, housing, and a hundred and one minor matters of direct concern to the workers. Such matters will not be adequately taken care of unless labor is given a direct and influential voice in the shaping of an over-all man-power program.

America's First Quisling

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

PROSTITUTES are used; they are seldom loved. Even less frequently are they honored. But Darlan has been put at the head of the military and civil administration of French Africa by the American command.

There was reason to use Darlan. No other French official knows as much as he about the military and naval installations in Africa from Dakar to Bizerte, and his services were worth a good sum. But office and power were too high a price to pay, as we are rapidly finding out. What doubtless appeared a reasonable military expedient is proving a costly political blunder, and various government spokesmen in Washington are trying to mitigate the effect of the transaction by explaining that it is only a temporary deal at worst, due to be abandoned as soon as its immediate purposes have been secured. Unfortunately—or perhaps fortunately—this confession of sharp practice is not very disarming. Democratic statesmen who announce their intention to double-cross a double-crosser cut a rather sorry figure in the eyes of friends and enemies alike.

Darlan had motives of his own for wanting to be bought. Certainly he was looking out for his own interests, as he has always done. He may also have been serving Vichy as an anchor to windward just in case the Allies should defeat Hitler after all. Whatever his reasons, his knowledge and collaboration were ours for the buying. And it is difficult to believe that they could not have been had at a reasonable price. But if his favors could really be won only by setting him up as our Quisling in North Africa, we should have done without them—even if lives were to be lost and military advantage forfeited as a consequence. For the United States has only one claim on the allegiance of the peoples of the world: an honest and courageous democratic policy. To the extent that we have strayed from that policy—in our dealings with Spain, with Vichy; in our past dealings with the major fascist powers—we have already compromised our position of democratic leadership. We can't afford new ventures in double-dealing or in reactionary diplomacy even in the interest of military gains. The price is too high.

Small incidents often illuminate the effect of important measures. On the day the elevation of Darlan was first rumored, a Nation editor telephoned a friend in the office of the Fighting French to ask him what it all meant. He refused to discuss it and seemed distressed to think that a responsible journalist could take such obvious nonsense seriously. He dismissed the story as just another of the countless rumors that had been flying out of Vichy, designed to confuse and mislead the unwary. "It absolutely could not be true," he said. What must have been the feeling of our friend when the unbelievable turned out to be the fact?

Multiply this Frenchman by his millions of compatriots in and out of France itself who look to our army to free their country not merely from alien rule but from the rule of men who are traitors and tyrants in their own right. What are their emotions as they see Darlan established as civil and military chief of the new Free French Empire? And what will be the answer of the men and women of France when we ask them to rise in revolt against Axis slavery under the leadership of one of the gang that sold them into slavery in the first place? The French people want to destroy their traitors, not follow them.

The first political mistake was made when the American forces carried through the North African operations without inviting the cooperation of the Fighting French or even consulting their leaders. De Gaulle should have been associated with the venture from the start; he should have marched into Africa side by side with Eisenhower. The second mistake was made when Giraud was chosen to lead the forces in North Africa, also without consultation with the Fighting French. Giraud, a brave man and a distinguished general, should have placed himself under the leadership of De Gaulle, who for two and a half hard years has directed the entire French military resistance to the Axis and has rallied the hopes and support of the vast majority of the French people. The third mistake was Darlan—and this last mistake will prove a political disaster no military success can offset.

After an interval of rejoicing over the American move into Africa, the Fighting French, especially in London, began to ask, though with commendable restraint, why their services and advice had been so pointedly ignored. The sudden emergence of Darlan overwhelmed their reticence. In a powerful statement, following immediately on a conference with Churchill, De Gaulle said flatly that the Fighting French had had no hand in and assumed no responsibility for "negotiations in progress in North Africa with the representatives of Vichy," and that any arrangements "which would in effect establish a Vichy regime" there could not be accepted. This was a clear-cut political act—an announcement to his followers in all countries and particularly to the illegal fighters in France that they had not been deserted and betrayed by their leaders.

The bitterness and resentment now expressed openly in French circles here and abroad are echoed all over the world—in Latin America, in the occupied lands of Europe, among our other fighting allies, and not least in the hearts of democratic Americans. And they arise from a deep-seated suspicion that the appointment of Darlan was not merely an ill-advised bit of strategy. It fits too well in the tight, complex pattern of appeasement to be so easily extricated.

Darlan is not an isolated case. He is in direct descent from Hitler, from Mussolini, from Franco, from Vichy itself. The men who preferred to sell oil to Mussolini for his Ethiopian invasion rather than risk his downfall by applying effective sanctions; who sacrificed Republican Spain to Hitler and Mussolini and then supported the fascist dictator they had brought to power; who have steadily upheld Pétain and frozen out the Fighting French—these are the men who find satisfaction today in the subversion of Darlan, the sudden acquisition of Flandin and Pucheu. The appeasers have never been in a majority even in the State Department, but from 1935 until this hour they have been able to force the long series of concessions and bargains which bit by bit weakened the force of democratic resistance and helped to bring on the war they opposed. They have at all times feared democracy more than fascism, and revolution more than anything else on earth. Today their fear of democracy and revolution poisons their hope of victory. So they maneuver to keep in power those groups which may, they hope, rob victory of its terrors and insure a European order safely secured behind the bars of social and political reaction.

To win Darlan to the "Allied cause" was for them not merely a temporary strategic necessity but a political triumph—appeasement's first real success. If they can add Laval and Pétain they will be even better pleased.

I wrote a final paragraph for this article, and it concerned a dream. It was a dream of American invading forces on the borders of Germany, and of a deal with Göring. He offered us the Luftwaffe and a part of the Nazi army. We accepted his services and raised him to power. It was a nice idea but a little too fantastic to set down as a realistic possibility. Today, as we go to press, I read the column of Arthur Krock in the New York Times, quoting official Washington opinion on the Darlan appointment. In it I find these lines:

One of those [officials] questioned said today: "War has forced us idealists and democrats to quantitative, rather than qualitative, morality as the test. If, for example, Göring should offer to come over with a few planes, we don't want him. He will cost more than he will contribute. But if he can bring the Luftwaffe with him we'll receive him."

And so I have thrown away my former conclusion. I find it wasn't a dream after all.

A Bill for Total War

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, November 16

EVERY American anxious to back our fighting men with the maximum of arms and supplies should do what he can to support the Kilgore-Pepper-Tolan bill for an Office of War Mobilization. This may be the last chance for many months to weld scattered war agencies into one effective organization, and the difference between taking some such step now or taking it later will be measured in lives. The President has it in his power to effect the purposes of this bill by executive order, or he can use his influence to prevent its passage. The armed services and the big-business crowd generally will oppose it.

In the welter of conflicting advice on the subject which will no doubt be offered, Mr. Roosevelt may find it useful to focus attention on one point. There are seven Senate and House committees investigating the conduct of the war on the home front. All but two of them, the Senate and House Military Affairs Committees, are headed by New Dealers. And all the New Deal chairmen are supporting this bill.

These five committee or subcommittee chairmen—Senators Truman, Murray, Pepper, and Kilgore and Representative Tolan—have united behind this measure because it embodies the constructive conclusions of months of investigation. It is a bill for total war. It has three main purposes. One is to bring order and greater capacity for effective action to a branch of emergency government badly crippled by the rivalries of overlapping agencies. The second is to impose clear and necessary policy directives on the men in charge of mobilizing the home front. The third is to end the domination of the war-production machine by monopolistic and business-as-usual forces which make it impossible to attain an all-out effort.

The easiest of these to understand is the organizational problem. Section 7-a of the Kilgore-Pepper-Tolan bill reflects the dangerously muddled situation it is intended to correct. Under the Office of War Mobilization there would be an Office of Production and Supply. The latter would bring together all agencies having to do with the procurement, production, and financing of war supplies. To this Office of Production and Supply, Section 7-a would transfer the functions and personnel of (1) the War Production Board and the Smaller War Plants Corporation; (2) those subdivisions of the War, Navy, and Treasury departments, of the Maritime Commission, and of the Office of Lend-Lease which have to do with the procurement and production of war supplies; (3) those subdivisions of the Federal Loan Agency and the Department of Commerce which finance plant expansion and purchase of materials in the war-production program; and (4) the Office of the Petroleum Coordinator, with its diverse duties in connection with the purchase and production of aviation gas and synthetic products.

By taking over the personnel of these various bodies, the new organization could function while changes were being made. The advantage would be in having all production and supply matters under a single authority, thus ending many of the delays from which we suffer. While WPB may initiate a project, the contracts have to be signed by army procurement and the financing has to be obtained from Jesse Jones, and any one of the three may balk at the plans of the others, with no real court of final appeal short of the overburdened White House itself.

The bill would bring all man-power, production, and supply agencies under unified civilian control and impose certain necessary duties on the new agency and its sub-agencies. These duties have been but imperfectly understood, and they cannot be fulfilled without "unity of command" on the home supply front. Section 6-a of the bill, for example, provides for a current inventory of industrial capacity. It provides for a detailed time schedule of end and intermediate military and civilian products, plant by plant. It provides for the allocation of productive resources as well as materials to meet the production program worked out by a top requirements committee on which the Secretaries of War and the Navy, the Chief of Staff of the army, and the Chief of Naval Operations would be represented. It provides for plant inspection to make certain that labor is being used at maximum effectiveness. Today we have no one over-all agency with power to formulate or to carry out a concerted program of this kind, and the lack of one is slowing up our war effort.

Perhaps the most important aspect of the bill is its purpose to make the war-mobilization program more democratic in character and to provide greater freedom within it for men with enterprise and ideas. This is by far the most difficult task of all and the one point at which the bill is incomplete. The bill would end the use of dollar-a-year men. It would give labor and agriculture, as well as business, representation on a top Board of War Mobilization. One of the duties of this board would be to stimulate the activity of labor-management committees.

But these measures are not enough. The bill ought to provide for a change in the make-up of the materials branches and the industry branches, which necessarily do much of the detail work of the production program. It ought to provide for the representation of labor and small business in these branches. The most interesting and fruitful provisions of the bill in this respect are those which embody Senator Kilgore's proposals for an Office of Technological Mobilization. This agency would have power to force the licensing of patents and secret processes, would promote research on new production methods, and would be able to mobilize our scientific capacity in the war program. Today our scientific agencies are as scattered and overlapping, and as dominated by big business, as are our production agencies. This is serious in a war as dependent as this one on technological efficiency and ingenuity.

In the perspectives of the Tolan bill current shifts at the WPB seem either trivial or misdirected. The principal effect of the reorganization of the industry branches is to enhance the growing power of Vice-Chairman Ferdinand Eberstadt and to give the armed services new influence within the industry branches. The principal effect of the new "controlled-materials plan," the umpteenth WPB effort of its kind, is to increase the power of the army, which is now the dominant influence at the WPB and has thoroughly demonstrated its incapacity for the tasks of industrial mobilization. The current effort is to cut production quotas to fit scarcities of materials. A harder task is to increase the output of materials, particularly of the three "controlled materials"—steel, aluminum, and copper. This requires readiness to recognize the value of labor's suggestions in these fields and to fight monopoly obstructions to maximum output. Neither Eberstadt—a corporation lawyer, formerly a partner in the brokerage firm of Dillon, Read—nor his chief subordinate in the new setup, Ernest Kanzler, has shown any such capacity.

Was Hull Right About Vichy?

BY ROBERT BENDINER

GENERAL EISENHOWER'S forces have rescued North Africa from the Axis and the State Department from some of its severest critics. The chances are excellent that North Africa will stay rescued, but I am not sure about the State Department. The joy over our first major military success has sent many erstwhile opponents of our Vichy policy scurrying to Canossa, but I have a feeling that when the jubilation dies down they will begin to wonder whether our diplomats had as much to do with it as Cordell Hull would have us believe.

As one who never felt that anything good could come of concessions to fascism, I remain incorrigibly unconvinced by Secretary Hull's contention that our occupation of Morocco and Algiers is the fruit of his two-year courtship of Vichy. It is perhaps early in the day to assess the claim in all its aspects, but even now I believe certain observations are in order.

To begin with, I am rather taken aback by some of the motives which Mr. Hull now ascribes to our Vichy policy. Relations were maintained and food distributed, it seems, only in order that consular and relief agents might have an opportunity to obtain information and to conduct propaganda; the long-range objective was always "to pave the way and prepare the background in the most effective manner possible for the planning and sending of the military expedition into the western Mediterranean area. . . ." It would be remarkable enough if, in view of the record, our policy toward Vichy actually did rest on a foundation of disingenuousness rather than blindness, but it is even more remarkable for Mr. Hull to be bragging about so sly an approach to diplomacy—particularly in the same week in which new overtures are being made to General Franco. The Secretary's profession of foxiness has a fanciful quality about it, exulting as it does in an amorality which we have condemned in other nations and of which I find it hard to believe we have actually been guilty.

My impression that the State Department has hastily improvised its claim to a lion's share of glory for the North African campaign is reinforced by the conflict between President Roosevelt's several explanations of the move and that of Mr. Hull. The President told the French people that the occupation was designed to head off an immediate threat of an attack by the Axis on this strategic area and that it was decided upon only in June of 1942. Mr. Hull, on the other hand, would have us view it as the secret objective of a policy that was launched with the fall of Paris. I beg leave to doubt that the State Department could have foreseen the military decision of last June a year and a half before we had even entered the war.

On close inspection the five purposes which Secretary Hull claims for the Vichy policy boil down to three:

(1) "opportunity for the government of the United States to get from week to week highly important information virtually from the inside of German-controlled territory and from North Africa"; (2) "maintenance of close relations with the French people and encouragement of leadership in opposition to Hitler"; (3) "constant effort to prevent delivery of the French fleet" to Germany, or any other violation of the terms of the armistice. These points are perhaps worth reviewing in some detail, because they constitute the basis of the department's claim to vindication.

It is undoubtedly true that the handful of diplomatic agents and the twenty men who supervised the distribution of food in North Africa were able to report useful information, but their contribution was small indeed compared with the volume of data which hundreds of Free French sympathizers from Calais to Tunis were ready and willing to impart. Had we broken with Vichy, much of this information would still have been available through any normally functioning espionage system, particularly in view of the prevailing anti-Vichy sentiment in North Africa and the presence of hundreds of disaffected French officers. As a matter of fact, we learn now that it was the daring secret mission of General Mark W. Clark which three weeks before the invasion obtained the vital information as to installations and troop dispositions. It was this Commando-escorted band, and not Mr. Hull's food-distributing observers, who made possible the clock-like precision of the military operation. Honeyed relations with Vichy may have had some deception value, but they also cost us heavily in successful liaison with the Fighting French, who had no part whatever in the first great move to free their homeland. Indeed, General de Gaulle himself knew nothing of the campaign until it was launched, and certainly he had no hand in the selection of General Giraud, much less of Admiral Darlan, to take charge of French affairs in North Africa.

Nor should it be forgotten that while we enjoyed the services of Mr. Hull's observers in France and North Africa, Vichy was able to make similar use of its agents in our own country. Its officials here enjoyed the rights of diplomatic immunity and were in a position to send Laval (read Hitler) any information they thought of value.

Concerning the second major purpose of the Vichy policy, Mr. Hull is not explicit, and I don't see how he could be. Far from encouraging opposition to Hitler, our friendliness toward Vichy, as any Fighting Frenchman will tell you, was in fact one of the greatest obstacles to a crystallization of French resistance to the Axis. It was our decision to support Vichy in the days following the collapse of the French army which discouraged the organization of a Free French government in North Africa. Several high French officers were willing to carry on in the colonies and were dissuaded from doing so only by the revelation that the great power of the United States was being placed at the disposition of the Vichy government. Late in June, 1940, General Mittelheuser, commander of the French forces in Syria, sent a message to General Noguès in Morocco communicating his willingness to carry on the fight. He was about to send a similar message to the British command at Cairo, offering the support of the French Army of the Near East, when word came through of Washington's determination to deal with the Pétain regime. The General tore up his letter.

Events, I believe, have already exposed the fallacy that it was our Vichy policy that kept the French fleet out of Hitler's hands. If the fleet is not delivered to Germany now, when we not only have broken relations with Vichy but have seized a great part of the French Empire, would a firmer stand with Pétain have induced its surrender before? If a completely occupied and powerless France fails to yield the fleet now, would a France that still had a semblance of a government have handed over this last remnant of its power? It would appear that the French navy has not now, and did not ever have, any intention of abandoning its ships either to Germany or to England. To a considerable extent the rank and file of the fleet has for years had marked political inclinations to the left. Much of it, moreover, was recruited among the traditionally seafaring Bretons, and Brittany has been more solidly anti-Vichy than any other section of France. Many officers, on the other hand, are anti-British and collaborationist, but these professionals have a vested interest in the integrity of the fleet which transcends political considerations. Neither Admiral Leahy, Marshal Pétain, nor Secretary Hull is to be thanked for this fortunate combination of circumstances. Any courting of the Vichy politicians for the purpose of saving the fleet was wasted affection on our side and successful blackmail on theirs.

It is possible to argue that maintaining purely formal relations with Vichy was not incompatible with encouraging resistance to the Axis, but if that was Mr. Hull's intention, it is almost impossible to understand the hostility and resentment that were constantly displayed toward De Gaulle and his movement. If, as Mr. Hull asserts, our policy was aimed at "keeping alive the basic concepts of freedom of the French people," why the undisguised fury over the seizure of St. Pierre and Miquelon by the Free French? It can hardly be argued that this was merely a show put on to prevent a break with Vichy. We could easily have rejected responsibility for Admiral Muselier's move and let it go at that. Events have proved that nothing we could have done short of attacking French territory would have induced Vichy to break off relations with us. But instead of shrugging its shoulders, the State Department did everything possible to restore the islands to Vichy control. We appeared to be bent on more than merely preserving formal relations so as to have the services of observers. Our Ambassador and his aides went out of their way again and again to demonstrate affection and regard for Pétain and his government—at a time when democratic Frenchmen were fighting in the ranks of the United Nations or dying in concentration camps. How did this "help keep alive the basic concepts of freedom of the French people"?

In the last three months our policy toward Vichy has in truth been more realistic. We suffered relations to continue but at the same time dealt more and more openly with the forces of General de Gaulle and displayed greater contempt for the Marshal's government. Had we followed this policy from the start, I could feel more sympathy with the present contentions of Mr. Hull. The fact is that the cavalier attitude toward Vichy dates from the Roosevelt-Churchill decision to occupy North Africa. The State Department merely followed suit and would now appear to be cashing in on a very good thing.

I know that it will seem ungracious in the midst of this first great victory to begrudge any part of the government its share of credit, and I write this with no pleasure. If this war were a great sporting event it might perhaps be better to forget the past and give the diplomats the benefit of the doubt. But this is not the Rose Bowl game, and the department's present position contains implications for the future. If the appeasement of Vichy is to be put down as a success, there will be more appeasement to come. Opposition to such a policy is not a principle which can be lightly relinquished. If foxy diplomacy justifies the support of a Pétain as against a De Gaulle, I fear we shall shore up other Pétains. We are in fact doing that very thing in Madrid at this moment. I shudder to think of this kind of "cleverness" at the peace table.

Our Vichy policy is merely one chapter in a long history of appeasement. It must be judged in that context and not merely as a piece of diplomacy which did in fact precede a successful invasion of North Africa. Some day the forces of the United Nations will invade Germany, and in that happy hour I hope we shall not be asked to believe that the triumphal entry was planned at the Munich conference.

New Deal for Stockholders

BY MAURICE H. GREENBERGER

THE Securities and Exchange Commission has trained its guns on the greatest citadel of oligarchy in this democratic nation—the management and control of corporations. Since the action of the commission can hardly be called spectacular in these days of world-shaking military events, it will probably not receive the public attention and support that it deserves, though we can be sure that it will meet all the opposition of which corporation officers and their spokesmen are capable.

The problem is not a new one. It has been the subject of discussion and study for many years. Everyone knows that the control of our corporations, and particularly of the giant companies that dominate the country's economic activity, is not actually in the hands of the majority of the stockholders. At one time "trust busting" was popularly thought to be the remedy for corporate evils. It is now understood that the principal problem created by the giant corporations arises not from bigness, which it is often in the public interest to preserve, but from the separation of control from ownership. This was clearly demonstrated by A. A. Berle and Gardiner C. Means in "The Modern Corporation and Private Property."

In the days of the small entrepreneur, employing a handful of workmen, the owner of the establishment was also the active controlling and managing force. With the expansion of enterprise, the corporation was found to be the most suitable form for industrial and financial activity. As long as corporations were relatively small, the law that dealt with them—John Marshall spoke of their "artificial being, invisible and intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law"—was comparatively satisfactory. But today, when they are larger and richer than some states, that body of law is greatly in need of re-examination and revision. The impact of corporations on our lives and even on the very safety of the nation—witness, for example, the Standard Oil—I. G. Farben affair and the rubber situation—is too substantial for us to be content with a body of corporation law made for phantoms and conceptual creatures.

Theoretically, the stockholders exercise the right of control through their rights to attend stockholders' meetings, to vote on certain vital matters, and to elect directors. However, these rights are more formal than real. In many instances the stockholder is deprived of the corporate franchise through such oligarchic devices as the issuance of non-voting stock, voting trusts, denial of the right to maintain fractional interests, and the holding company. But the commonest method of keeping control out of the hands of the majority—and it is a method whereby the board room pays lip service to democracy—is to be found in the perversion of the proxy system.

A survey made recently by the Temporary National Economic Committee showed that of 14,000,000 record shareholdings, about 7,500,000, or 54 per cent, had a value of $500 or less; about 2,000,000, a value of between $501 and $1,000; and about 3,000,000, a value of between $1,001 and $5,000. In other words, approximately 90 per cent of the record shareholdings were of a value of $5,000 or less. These are scattered throughout the country, and it is obvious that a stockholder whose interest is comparatively so small cannot make an annual trip to the stockholders' meeting, which is often at a great distance from his home.

To these stockholders the controlling group sends a proxy form, which is usually returned executed. This act of "control" on the part of the stockholder is facilitated even to the extent of the prepayment of postage. No more cerebation is required of the stockholder than he would need to mark a ja ballot. If the corporation is listed on a national exchange, the management must mail proxies at the request of any stockholder of record who wishes to set up an opposition. But while the corporation pays for the printing, postage, and other incidental expenses incurred in its solicitation of approving proxy certificates, a group of stockholders in opposition must bear these expenses themselves. As a result, the task of forming a corporate opposition—except in cases of flagrant mismanagement which might excite the support of a great number of stockholders—rests upon a few individuals who are willing to be economic crusaders and able to expend time, money, and effort for the corporate good, in most cases with slight assurance of success. The changes in the rules concerning the solicitation of proxies which the SEC proposes are designed to enable the stockholders to exercise a more effective control of management.

Much has been written about the corporate entity. In the eyes of the law this artificial creature is the owner of the corporate property and assets as against even the stockholders themselves, who constitute the corporation. For some purposes in the law it is a person, and for others it is not a person. However, if the matter is viewed in the light of our prevailing philosophy of private property, the assets and property of the corporation do belong to the stockholders. A great number of these stockholders at one time in our economic development would have been individual owners of small productive enterprises. Today they are part owners of our corporate giants by virtue of having purchased shares of stock or insurance policies or through deposits in savings banks. By such participation, theirs are the railroads, the steel mills, the meat-packing houses, the insurance companies, and a host of other enterprises.

The SEC says that in the corporations subject to its jurisdiction a stockholder will hereafter have the right to submit proposals to his fellow-stockholders together with a one-hundred-word explanation of the action he wishes to sponsor. The security holder is also to be given the opportunity to nominate candidates for directorships, and these nominees are to be placed in ballot form on the proxy. In its summary of the proposed revision of the rules the commission states that "some managements have adopted procedures which encourage signature in blank rather than execution of the ballot" for each proposal submitted to the stockholders. The rules are to be amended to permit the counting of only those proxies which indicate specifically the action to be taken, thus preventing the arrogation of authority through default. These are the more important changes. Other provisions require the disclosure of compensation in excess of $25,000, of directors' and officers' dealings with the corporation, and of the company's activities during the preceding year.

The action of the SEC is an attempt to reform the proxy system, which in the words of Chairman Purcell "has been sadly prostituted." The commission is undoubtedly wise to devote its attention to the proxy device as a means of stimulating more intelligent stockholder expression. But the jurisdiction of the SEC is limited. Add the fact that companies may incorporate in any of the forty-eight states even though their activities are nation-wide and they are indispensable units of interstate commerce, and the conclusion is inescapable that a federal code of corporate morality is necessary to cope with the problem. Many states are only too eager to attract enterprises which seek legal sanction for undemocratic structures and practices.

Since in an economy of bigness the stockholder cannot be brought to his corporation, his corporation must be brought to him. It is suggested that federal legislation be passed which would facilitate the expression of stockholders' views by dividing them into regional groups. This idea might contain the answer to the problem of minority and management control. The country would be divided into corporate districts, like the Federal Reserve districts. In each of these districts would be located a district office of the company, and at this office a list of the record stockholders should be available, to encourage communication among them. Also there should be periodic district meetings at which directors representing the district would be elected; these directors ought to have a voting power equal to the value of the securities they represent. At district meetings the representative-director should be required to explain to his constituents the activities of the corporation, and orderly discussion and debate should be encouraged. This or a similar plan would be more effective in arousing and maintaining stockholder interest than formidable proxy forms containing necessarily technical data.

It is doubtful whether democratic capitalism can survive if the power of industrial and financial property is abdicated to economic despots, however benevolent or paternalistic they may be. Some democratic technique for corporate control must be discovered. Preventive control in corporate council halls is more desirable than punitive disapproval in the courtroom. Unless we can establish industrial and financial democracy, freedom of enterprise for the few will prove to be destructive of all the freedoms for the rest of us.

"The End of the Beginning"

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE best news in several months of war is now coming out of North Africa as the British and American armies, driving west and east, threaten to destroy the German hold on Libya, together with the entire Afrika Korps. For the first time in the Western theater of the war we have seized the initiative and are forcing the enemy to meet our battle plans rather than attempting with slight success to meet his.

Today's news flashes must be seen in perspective if their importance is to be appreciated. Rommel's victory in Libya in early summer and the fall of Tobruk were shocking blows to the United Nations cause, especially since they were achieved against defenders markedly superior in man-power, armor, artillery, and airplanes—everything, in fact, but tactics and leadership. The failure of Hitler quickly to reinforce his able lieutenant may have been the result of his inability to spare the necessary men and supplies from Russia, but it has proved extremely expensive for him. The Germans became mired in the desert, with their long transportation lines pounded by the greatly superior Allied air force and their overseas communications under attack from British submarines. Meanwhile the British curbed the individualism of the R. A. F., found a better commander, and rebuilt their superiority in all arms.

With complete air dominance, naval cooperation, and both bigger and better-equipped armored forces, there was no sound military reason why the British should not have won. Yet they have lost battles in the present war when the advantage was almost as definitely theirs. Victory in Egypt is therefore a cause for satisfaction. It is even more gratifying to note the immense improvement in British tactics over earlier campaigns. Profiting from past disasters, the Army of the Nile used infantry well supported by artillery to prepare paths through the German and Italian mine fields and then sent in its tanks to exploit developed weaknesses on both flanks. Axis mistakes in anticipating the striking point proved costly. The outflanked troops were compelled to fall back along a narrow front under heavy artillery fire and merciless strafing from American and British planes, and several divisions, mainly advanced Italian units which had been acting as shock absorbers, were entirely cut off by the swiftly moving steel tentacles. Rightly refusing to pause to deal with these nearly helpless units, General Montgomery pursued the main German armored divisions, exploiting to the utmost the advantage afforded him by his superior tanks and aviation.

Notable as Montgomery's successes have been, the African campaign would still be a secondary one but for other recent events. Because Rommel threatened vital British positions, any marked advance of his army was serious, but British drives into Libya menaced nothing of equal importance to Hitler. Even if they had conquered the whole province, the Allies would not have found it much easier to send supplies through the Mediterranean as long as the enemy's air bases in Sicily blocked the road and no counter-bases were available.

It is the American invasion of Morocco and Algeria and its synchronization with British moves which give North Africa great strategic importance at present. The success of either the British or the American drive alone offers no tremendous threat to Hitler, but success in both will not only eliminate Rommel but affect immeasurably the whole course of the war.

The American campaign makes use of one Allied asset which has not previously played a decisive role, namely, British naval command of the extreme western Mediterranean. The base at Gibraltar and the western Mediterranean fleet have discouraged any Italian desire to send raiders out of the Mediterranean and have aided convoys to get through to Malta but have otherwise been of slight value. These ships, completely dominant in their area, covered American landings.

Though the army's press releases have been a great improvement over those of the navy, too little information is available to permit any adequate commentary on our work in this area so far. With sea and air superiority it was not surprising that we could establish bridgeheads, apparently with little loss. The use of American rather than British troops and the vigorous propaganda campaign which accompanied American landings doubtless helped to weaken French resistance, which was not as vigorous as might have been expected from the large number of troops in the country, though of course their morale and equipment were poor. Early conquest of airfields greatly aided our cause. Later news may dictate a different view of the campaign, but present evidence shows careful planning, skilful coordination of sea, air, and ground forces, and aggressive leadership.

Several counter-moves are open to Hitler. He may be able to force Franco to change from an inactive to a belligerent ally, in which case the more than 100,000 soldiers in Spanish Morocco would offer a definite threat to the American rear and Gibraltar could be attacked by land. He can strive, despite inevitable heavy losses, to send strong reinforcements to Rommel. Or he can complicate our supply problems by a concentrated U-boat attack on Allied shipping lanes to Africa. Or, finally, he can write off Africa as a bad bet and redouble efforts against Russia, hoping for the unlikely decisive victory which would permit him to withdraw troops from the east in time to meet any really damaging attack launched from the south and west.

There are few indications that the last course is even being considered. Concern for his prestige, if nothing else, is apt to make Hitler determined to redress his fortunes in Africa. The occupation of all France and the dispatch of air units to Tunis are signs of this. Hitler cannot afford to treat the African campaign in its present stage as secondary. Allied success here will (1) eliminate the use of French bases by German and Italian submarines; (2) plug the largest of the few remaining leaks in the British blockade of Continental Europe; (3) effectively isolate Dakar and pave the way for an assault there by land should it become expedient; (4) provide badly needed combat experience for American troops; (5) bolster American civilian morale; (6) enable the Allies to set up a string of naval and air bases along the Mediterranean from which southern France, Italy, and Greece can be steadily harassed by naval, air, and commando raids. Axis defenses in this region, unlike those of northern France, will require a great deal of strengthening to become even relatively secure.

Conquest of North Africa will also free the British of the necessity of keeping large naval squadrons at both ends of the Mediterranean. In narrow waters airplanes can to a certain degree serve as cheaper substitutes for ships, especially in warding off attack on transportation. More Allied sea power will therefore be made available either for convoy duty or for use against Japan in the Pacific, in both of which spheres it is badly needed. With a protecting umbrella of air power it should be possible to reestablish the Mediterranean "life line" close to the African coast. This route cannot be made perfectly safe—especially south of Sicily it will remain hazardous—but since the shortening of the route to the Near East will save both time and shipping, some losses can be borne with equanimity. Even the Soviet Union can receive supplies by rail across Syria and Mesopotamia much more quickly than by the enormously long Persian Gulf route and more safely than via Murmansk.

Of course these are possibilities which cannot be fully realized before several months at least, or even a year. Despite Axis knowledge that an attack was impending we gained some of the advantages of surprise, for with many objectives to guard, Hitler had to await our attack before committing himself to defensive measures. The speed with which we continue to exploit this advantage in the weeks ahead is therefore of vital importance.

Exhilarated by our seizure of the initiative, many commentators have overlooked certain negative aspects of the task before us. Whatever answer Hitler makes—and an attack through Spain would offer a first-class threat—an African front will, for a time, make enormous requirements on merchant shipping and naval escorts. And it has been off the West and Northwest African coast that submarines have scored most of their recent successes. For several months to come this drain on an already insufficient pool of merchant tonnage is almost certain to end German worries over the launching of a front elsewhere. To some extent the African offensive may also be robbing Peter to pay Paul, since its demands on Allied air power have caused a lessening of raids over Germany in the past few weeks.

Our methods in Africa can best be described as cautious, but the word is not used in a critical sense. The invasion of Algeria and Morocco comes under the heading of what the author has described in earlier issues of The Nation as "small-scale offensives," aimed at definite but limited objectives and made feasible by their distance from the centers of German military power. In no correct sense of the term is it a full-scale "second front." In the September 5 Nation I offered the view that a large-scale invasion of Western Europe was impracticable at the time because of lack of men and ships. This view was recently confirmed by the President. The present operations probably represent the maximum land effort that the United States can make under present transport limitations. They have a splendid chance of complete success. But the campaign's very distance from Germany is also its greatest drawback. For it does not offer a grave immediate threat to Hitler. Even should it be entirely successful, a shift of the garrison division in Western Europe, without the recall of any large number of units from the Russian front, should be adequate to meet the menace it offers.

The best analysis yet made of the current African situation came from Winston Churchill, and it is one which over-optimistic Americans should take to heart. "This is not the end or the beginning of the end," he said, "but the end of the beginning."

Talking of India

BY KINGSLEY MARTIN

I HAVE heard of Englishmen who think India none of America's business and who object to the constant stream of criticism and suggestion now made about India in the United States. Now that the United States is in the war, I can see no justification for such complaints; all problems that affect the conduct of the war and the application of the Atlantic Charter are legitimately the affair of all the members of the United Nations. But if that goes for the Indian question, it also goes for the Negro question, and for all the other problems of race and color and religion that are involved in a global war and a global peace.

Of course there are difficulties and responsibilities involved in this joint discussion of problems that used to be regarded as the internal affairs of particular nations. Americans are legitimately cross when challenged about the Negro question on the basis of ignorance, and I must confess to an impatience with American critics of British policy in India who imagine that the Indian Congress is an elected body similar to the elected body of the same name in Washington, who argue about a solution for India without having even heard of Pakistan, and who completely forget, in demanding freedom for Indians, to inquire into the interests of the depressed classes or of other minorities. I really believe that many who are vehement about India have in their minds an analogy with eighteenth-century America. They ask why Britain does not "quit India," oblivious of the fact that at the present time all the Indian parties, including Congress, agree in wanting Britain to defend India. Some knowledge, I suggest, is a necessary basis for the discussion of any subject, even of British imperialism.

As an anti-imperialist myself, I have a certain nose for the hypocrisies of imperialists, and I am not deceived by the excuses put forward by people whose real desire is simply to hold on to power. Similarly I recognize among the various types of Britain's critics some who are not inspired by genuine liberalism. I can take anything from informed critics who care about the liberty they demand. But sometimes I detect not so much an interest in India or in winning the war for the United Nations as a groping toward an alternative imperialism that might easily prove no more decent and liberal than Britain's.

Having got these warnings and complaints off my chest, I add that they do not, to my mind, apply to Mr. Wendell Willkie's broadcast, which was carefully and usefully phrased, or to the article by Louis Fischer in The Nation. On some points I disagree with Fischer, but I know that he formed his views after the most elaborate inquiries in India and that it is a sincere and informed opinion. Louis Fischer has been a good friend of mine for many years, and I was not at all surprised to find that he had been captivated by Gandhi. He is an enthusiast by nature and instinctively a libertarian. It was on grounds of liberty that he finally abandoned his long championship of Stalin's policy in the Soviet Union. He was certain to take a Hindu against a British view. I have seen some of his voluminous notes; he took the trouble in the extreme heat of the Indian plains to type out as far as possible verbatim everything that passed in his numerous conversations with high British officials and soldiers as well as with Indian leaders of many shades of opinion. If he made, as I think, a serious mistake in interpretation, that was not due to lack of pains in acquiring information. But if he had tried more strenuously to find a constructive solution in the terribly difficult setting of the war, I believe that his conclusions would have been less clear-cut and possibly more useful.

Let me explain. The sting of Fischer's articles was the charge that the offer which Sir Stafford Cripps carried to India was not sincerely intended. That there were some in official positions who never believed in the Cripps mission is, of course, clear, and that Mr. Churchill has never changed his youthful mind about India is an inescapable deduction from his recent speeches. But if Fischer had been able to seek evidence in England as well as in India and had talked with Sir Stafford Cripps and those who accompanied him on his mission, he would not, I think, have explained the breakdown of the Cripps negotiations by a simple charge of Whitehall sabotage.

I wish the British government had been willing to go farther in the offer made to India for the immediate war period. With the war close to their own doors, it was natural that the Indian leaders should pay less attention to post-war promises than to the question of an immediate increase in power. Sir Stafford went to India at his own instance; he was the spokesman of the British Cabinet and an old friend of India, in particular of Jawaharlal Nehru. He seemed more likely than anyone else to persuade the leaders of the chief parties in India to make up their minds to work together and with Great Britain in the defense of India. He offered an Indianized and representative Viceroy's Council instead of an official and hand-picked Council. He had no authority to offer a National Government during the war. But he could legiti-

POLITICAL WAR

EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

"Compulsory Democracy"

A MOST interesting report that came out of France just before it was entirely taken over by Hitler described the work of some fifteen Study Groups, representing a cross-section of French life, which have been meeting for the purpose of formulating a program for the future government of their country. We have heard a great deal about the courageous acts of sabotage and political warfare directed against the Nazi invaders, but very little is known of the discussions going on in occupied countries concerning plans for a future free Europe. The report of the fifteen Study Groups sheds light on the sort of political and social structure which the Europe of today is looking forward to for the morrow.

These fifteen groups came out of the very soil of France. Among their members were conservatives and radicals, Socialists and Communists, factory workers and university professors, farmers, former municipal employees, and often the pastor of the village, sometimes a Catholic, sometimes a Protestant. The groups met "underground" in spite of all the difficulties of the occupation and the watchfulness of the Gestapo. They took up for discussion concrete subjects, political and economic. And the plans that emerged from these deliberations were sent to London and submitted to General de Gaulle's National Committee, which in turn sent back to France suggestions to be considered by the Study Groups. At the same time the groups, by employing considerable ingenuity, managed to send outlines of their conclusions to anti-fascist cells in Belgium, Holland, and other occupied countries with a view to creating a common program for a future free united Europe.

The plans stipulate, it is interesting to note, that prior to any work of reconstruction there must be promulgated a new Declaration of the Rights of Man, to be based on a single fundamental concept: that the people shall have every liberty except the right to deny liberty. This applies both to the international and the national sphere. For example, no nation may carry its right to independence and sovereignty to the extreme of constituting itself a fascist state which by its mere existence would threaten the peace and liberty of Europe. In the internal sphere, no party with dictatorial tendencies will be tolerated. Not only will a party be outlawed which advocates a corporative system such as Doriot tried to organize with the cooperation of the Nazi rulers, but every party must choose its directing body and arrive at its decisions by strictly democratic methods. Never again

HITLER IS STILL THERE

Delivered at the moment when the American army was accomplishing one of the most remarkable exploits of the war, Hitler's speech of November 8 fell on ears which were predisposed to take it as his swan song. Two phrases combined to give it the tone of a confession of defeat: his ill-timed declaration that he wouldn't "go abroad" like his royal predecessor and his outcry, "there is only one thing left and that is battle." Those words were seized upon by nearly every radio analyst and every editorial writer as proof that Hitler now felt himself beaten.

A reading of the whole speech in a less emotional atmosphere would have led to a more restrained interpretation. Apart from those two phrases Hitler did not talk like a defeated dictator. On the contrary, his words breathed defiance and determination. He pointed to the unchallenged fact of his vast conquests and said, "Whatever we possess, we hold actually and firmly, and nobody gets a place where we already are" (forgetting Libya for the moment). He said his last peace offer had been made. He described the vast gains made in the Russian campaign—and Russia's losses in sources of vital supplies. He said he would "anticipate every move of the enemy."

His acts support this interpretation of his words. Only two days were needed to prove that the brutal initiative which has characterized him in the past has not been abandoned. On Saturday the American troops landed in North Africa. On Tuesday Vichy's incapacity to resist the American invasion had become fully evident. On Wednesday Hitler occupied Vichy, marched through the rest of France, and attacked in Tunisia. His acts, like his words, showed neither the uncertainty nor the slowness of defeat. They showed an enemy who still is there, full of strength and will; an enemy who can be defeated only by effort and planning, by tanks and men, and not least by peoples and ideas; an enemy who can be defeated only by combined military and political war.

will France permit such a degrading spectacle as was presented by the Radical Socialist Party in 1938, when, on the eve of the opening of the party convention, all the undesirables of the neighborhood were rounded up and seated as members and then permitted to vote on vital questions of French policy. The new France will permit all the rights that a free man can desire, but not the right to practice fascism, under any guise. This concept has been referred to as "compulsory democracy."

This new idea of compulsory democracy is pushing its way into the thinking of the occupied countries of Europe, which have learned by bitter experience the futility of any attempt to conciliate fascism. Of the same order of ideas are the tentative plans drawn up by the Study Groups for a government that will be both representative and strong. They recognize the need, especially during the transition period, of a government which can take a firmer stand against all the elements threatening liberty and order. They realize that the alternative to a dictatorship on the one hand or chaos and civil war on the other is a government, popularly elected, in which the executive can act swiftly and decisively.

In view of recent developments in North Africa, it is of great interest to examine the position of the Study Groups in regard to the so-called transition period. Many people talk as though all Europe, the conquered countries as well as the aggressors, would have to undergo a period of military occupation. This suggestion is strongly repudiated. Far from believing that France must live under the control of an Allied army of occupation, these groups assume that independent governing bodies will be set up while the struggle for liberation goes on. As soon as a single department of France is free from Nazi control, the French authorities will take over and the French people will begin to rule themselves. It would be a mistake for the Allied armies to interfere in any way with the internal forces of the liberated country. It is highly encouraging that the Americans in their occupation of North Africa promise to act in a way that corresponds to the thinking of the French Study Groups in regard to this last important point.

A Gallup Poll of Blood

BY PAUL HAGEN

OUT of the night of Germany comes a Gallup poll of blood. Incontrovertibly, it reveals the specific difficulties the Nazis are encountering at home on the eve of their fourth winter of war.

This Gallup poll is provided by the list of people executed in Germany. Another longer list continues to grow in the occupied territories. But recently the roster of those officially beheaded in Germany proper has been expanding. Not that the Nazis had not murdered at home before. There has always been quiet liquidation of individuals; there have been celebrated purges. Last year the spotlight of home propaganda was turned on several model executions—humble radio listeners, black marketeers, and defeatists. That was in the days when the myth of Hitler's invincibility was to break down for the first time, before Moscow. But the consequent purge of the High Command and the reorganization in high places were not followed by increased terror against the people. On the contrary, Nazi propagandists uttered words of understanding for the strains they had to endure. This year, however, while the second offensive on the Russian front was being frustrated at Stalingrad, the executioner at home took up his work. And we have the first reports of local mutinies and of firing squads against soldiers. But let us analyze such evidence as is available.

For the month of September we have a list of persons officially executed, in some cases with ages as well as names and with court charges and sentences. This list of fifty is of course not complete, nor is it, as we shall see, reliable in every detail. Here is a rough outline of it, as put together from B. B. C. broadcasts, from the press, and from clandestine stations like "Weimar," which quote, in some instances, from local German newspapers and radio reports: Frankfort, five persons executed—charge, high treason, attempts to organize "Communist cells," dissemination of foreign radio news; Mannheim, fourteen persons—charge, organization of a new party nucleus to undermine the German home front and the army, dissemination of enemy radio news; Oldenburg, one man—espionage for a foreign power; Breslau, two armament workers—acts of sabotage; Berlin, two persons, one a twenty-one-year-old girl—espionage; Munich, one man—high treason and attempted aid to the enemy; Bochum and Schwerte, ten workers—charge unknown; Kassel, a middle-aged couple—after serving prison terms for treasonable acts, they again upon release listened to foreign broadcasts and spread enemy news; Berlin, an artist and a clergyman—listening to foreign broadcasts; Esslingen, a young worker—high treason; Nürnberg, a man who had been in a concentration camp for Communist activities—charged with resumption of these activities; Austria: Vienna, three persons, one a woman—high treason, undermining the German armed forces; Krems, two workers—Communist activities; Graz, a number of persons—formation of a Communist organization.

There has been some confusion in recording this list, owing to discrepancies in Nazi official announcements. It is a preliminary and only approximate record, but several facts about it are worth noting. First, it is the longest list of official executions in any one month since the Nazis came to power. Second, it is predominantly a list of men and women active in the former labor movement. Third, a large part of the group comes from bombed areas around Mannheim, Frankfurt, and Ludwigshafen. The number of executions reported for this western industrial area is striking; that discontent is showing itself in the form of riots in bombed districts is also confirmed from other sources. To raise the bogey of "growing bolshevism" in these areas may have been one of the purposes of publicizing the executions.

The validity of the Nazi charge that the victims were underground reorganizers of the Communist Party may best be judged by the Mannheim cases. Here is the list of the fourteen victims. It has been checked in New York with people from Mannheim who knew them: Georg Lechleitner, aged fifty-seven; Jakob Faulhaber, aged forty-two; Rudolf Langendorf, forty-seven; Ludwig Molderzyk, forty-three; Anton Kurz, thirty-six; Eugen Siegel, thirty-nine; Philip Brunnemer, seventy-five; Max Winterthaler, forty; Robert Schmoll, thirty-nine; Rudolf Moll, forty; Daniel Salzinger, forty-five; Käthe Veit (née Brunnemer), forty-eight; Adolf Veit, forty-nine; Johann Kupka, forty-two. Only Georg Lechleitner was a local official of the pre-Hitler Communist Party. None of the others were Communists. They were members of the Socialist youth movement, the Social Democratic Party, and the free trade unions. For years the center of the group had been the unhappy Brunnemer family—seventy-five-year-old Philip Brunnemer, his daughter, Käthe Veit, and his son-in-law, Adolf Veit. The father, a labor veteran, a survivor of the persecutions under Bismarck, was one of the faithful functionaries of the old Social Democratic Party; his daughter had organized a Naturfreunde youth group after the last war. They and their friends were critical of many of the policies of their party during the Weimar period, but they were faithful to it. Party lines of course no longer exist in underground Germany, though the old traditions are still strong; people simply work together, try to hold out, and prepare for a new movement. The Nazi label "Communist" must be taken as a weapon in the war of nerves at home—the Nazis will call a Catholic bishop a Bolshevik if they want to destroy him—and in the new appeasement drive directed toward certain quarters in Europe.

We should be only too happy to be able to say that the executions prove the existence of strong underground organizations, of an effective revival of anti-Nazi activity. Unfortunately, we cannot do so. There may be a new movement in embryo, but we do not know. In view of the age of the victims it is even possible that their names were chosen at random from lists of subversive persons prepared long ago, and that they were executed merely for propaganda purposes.

This has been done in Norway and France. However, this can be said: the Mannheim executions show where the Nazis find the greatest potential danger on the home front. Look at the list again. The youngest of the Mannheim victims was thirty-six, the eldest seventy-five, the bulk of the group between forty and fifty. This is the present age of the old guard of the former labor movement. The Mannheim executions, like most of the others, make it clear that the Nazis, knowing the home front, knowing the growing unrest, know also whom they must present as alleged conspirators—the men and women from whom the public might expect resistance. In short, having denied in so many boisterous speeches that they are afraid of a repetition of 1918, the Nazis are afraid of exactly that. The Gallup poll of blood has very little relation to the specific charges of the courts, but—particularly when compared with last year's record—it proves that, in the opinion of the Nazis, the danger of fundamental changes at home is growing. A dozen times in the past the Nazis have assured the public that they had wiped out the anti-Nazis; they now demonstrate that they did not believe what they said. That is why the heads of potential leaders roll again.

Innocent men and women are not yet being executed in masses in Germany as they are in occupied Europe. Murder at home is still in slow motion compared with the horrifying tempo abroad. The important news is that there is no longer a difference of principle between the Nazis' defense at home and their defense against the opposition in the conquered countries. One of the best illustrations of this is afforded by the executions that followed the assassination of Heydrich. According to figures compiled by the Swedish Goteborg Handels-Tidning, 1,103 people were executed at that time. We have learned since that the investigations conducted by the Gestapo, though officially confined to Czechoslovakia, were in reality pursued even more thoroughly in Germany—on German railways, in German homes, in German military headquarters and soldiers' barracks. There is a report of a mass purge shortly after Heydrich was shot, in the famous Lichterfeld barracks in Berlin, the scene of the purge of Röhm's followers in June, 1934.

This is a situation with which the United Nations should reckon in formulating a strategy of political warfare.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IN THE fourth year of the war life is hard for German civilians. Rations have not yet been reduced to the smallest amount that man can live on—they are much larger than the unbelievably small allowances of the Italians—but the situation is pretty bad. The greatest lack, that of fats, can be only half compensated for by the carbohydrates of potatoes, which are somewhat more plentiful. The deficiency of proteins—meat, fish, eggs, cheese—cannot be made up and is calamitous; even the class which is allotted the best ration, the so-called "hardest workers," do not get the minimum necessary for health. And not only is food scarce but also heat, and means of transportation, and above all the consumers' goods which no household can get along without. To illustrate: many of the cheaper restaurants are now asking their guests to bring their own knife, fork, and spoon. These precious articles are so unobtainable that customers are carrying away the restaurants' equipment.

Depressing as these privations are, the thing that is most dreaded has not yet happened. In Germany the worst economic catastrophe that can be conceived is inflation. On this subject the average German is both a neurotic and an expert. Inflation for him is not just an abstract idea; its mechanics are no mystery to him. In that hellish time when the mark fell to a trillionth of its normal value the present generation learned all about its workings.

Since the beginning of Hitler's rule, therefore, the specter of another inflation has been an ever-present source of anxiety. It has worried even the government, which realizes that nothing must happen to alarm a hypersensitive nation on this score. Up to now the danger has been successfully avoided. Prices on the whole have remained surprisingly stationary. And there is no use denying that a people abnormally wise about inflation has posted this on the credit side of the Nazi ledger.

For our part we might learn a good deal by studying the Nazi technique for keeping inflation at bay. And oddly enough we could also profit from observing the government's handling of the people in this matter. For on questions of money and inflation the government knows that it cannot fool the public, and it speaks to it frankly, reasonably, and to the point.

To stimulate saving, it announced a savings week for the beginning of November. There is a lesson for us in the way the necessity of saving was impressed on the people. Savings notes in Germany are of course the equivalent of our war bonds, but they were not played up as the best and highest-paying investment in the world. A much grimmer argument was used. Expounding a scientific and merciless theory of inflation, government spokesmen said in effect: It is essential that you make yourselves still less able to buy things than you now are. You must voluntarily withdraw from use an additional portion of your income and freeze it for the duration of the war. Too much money is in circulation, and too few goods are to be had. That is the wellspring of inflation, and we must plug it up more tightly than can be done through taxes alone. Herr Lange, the vice-president of the Reichsbank, used these words in a widely circulated appeal: "Every reasonable man will understand that as the production of war materials rises, total income also rises, while the supply of consumers' goods steadily falls—that is, purchasing power increases out of proportion to the amount of goods that can be bought. All our anti-inflation measures aim to draw off this surplus purchasing power. Only in this way can depreciation of the currency be prevented."

In this country we seldom hear people urged to save on these grounds. "Save in order to go without"—it sounds like poor propaganda. But it is the one effective defense against inflation in Germany. Only the brutal truth will have any influence on an informed people. Perhaps the struggle against inflation will succeed only among a people that can understand the brutal truth.

It is another question whether his public believed in the rosier future which the Reichsbank chief went on to paint. After the war, he said, you can enjoy the fruits of your savings. "After the war we will manufacture consumers' goods to correspond to the money saved during the war. Victory will make it possible for us to satisfy, very quickly and at reasonable prices, the demand for goods that has been dammed up for so long." It is more than doubtful whether a perspective of the future which presupposes victory is confidently accepted in Germany. That is an argument which Americans seeking to combat a future inflation could use with better effect.

Poor De Gaulle

IT WAS to be expected that the North African expedition would be hailed by the Axis press and radio as an act of American imperialist aggression, but a novel twist was introduced by one Axis commentator when he quoted a Paris newspaper as saying, "American piracy has not honored De Gaulle's sergeant-majors with the chance to share the glory of the Moroccan-Algerian raid. General Eisenhower and his gold-strippers have gobbled up all the crumbs themselves."

mately explain in private conversation that if the party leaders accepted the immediate offer and formed a strong Indian Council, it would in practice be impossible for the Viceroy to precipitate a series of internal crises by refusing to take its advice, even if he should wish to do so. Given that the communal issues were not raised during the war and that the supreme direction of the war was in the hands of a British commander-in-chief—provisions that excited no controversy—could not the leaders of the great Indian parties agree to serve in a Council which, Sir Stafford suggested, would in the course of daily business become a responsible Cabinet, just as the British Cabinet had in practice, and without legislative change, gradually taken over the once autocratic powers of the King of England? If his proposals were accepted, Sir Stafford's influence in Indian matters would in fact be supreme; he would personally do all in his power to insure that the Viceroy's veto atrophied just as the King of England's veto has atrophied. Exactly how Sir Stafford put this point we cannot, of course, know, but that he urged these considerations is clear. As Fischer points out, Sir Stafford would scarcely have sanctioned without demur the publication by Congress of the statement that he had given such an assurance unless the account given by Congress were substantially correct. Nor is Sir Stafford to be criticized for thus in informal conversation going beyond the letter of his instructions. I believe he was right in saying that if the Indian leaders had accepted his proposals, they might in practice have made themselves the effective government of India.

After the completion of discussions that mainly turned on the functions of an Indian Minister of Defense, there seemed an excellent prospect of settlement. The hopes of April 8 were abruptly ended next day. Louis Fischer attributes this disaster to a telegram which, he alleges, Sir Stafford Cripps received from Whitehall. This has been flatly denied. This particular telegram is not in my view of great importance. We know that there was much telegraphing and telephoning between Britain and India that night, and the next day, when Sir Stafford was asked to give a formal assurance of a new convention between the Viceroy and the new Council, he was only in a position to refer Congress to the Viceroy. Fischer is wrong in thinking that any telegram Sir Stafford received would substantiate a charge of breach of faith, for Sir Stafford had never been authorized to make any offer that formally reduced the Viceroy's powers, and if Congress asked him to state in set terms what had been no more than an informal and personal assurance, it could not have expected anything but a negative reply. Personally, I must regret that Sir Stafford had not the support of the Viceroy and the British government in his effort to ease negotiations by an unwritten promise that the convention governing the relation of the Viceroy to his Council would be changed once the Cripps proposals were accepted. Certainly, as Fischer says, powerful interests in Britain and India opposed the transference of power which Cripps hoped to achieve. But this transference of power during the war was never offered by the British government; therefore the offer could not be withdrawn. The question then arises why Congress should have asked for an open statement of an assurance that was by its nature personal and informal. The fact that they asked for a formal change that they knew from Sir Stafford the government would not grant suggests that they, like some conservative elements in Whitehall and Delhi, were afraid that the negotiations might succeed.

It is the part played by the divisions and weaknesses of Congress that Louis Fischer overlooked. Would Congress have been satisfied even if it had been formally assured that the Viceroy's veto would not be used? I am by no means certain. I do not mean that it might still have been difficult to settle terms of cooperation with Jinnah and the Moslem League. (I do not think Jinnah could have held out and wrecked the settlement if Congress had accepted.) Nor am I worried by indications that Congress would also have raised questions about the position of the princes. Why should it not? No, my concern is that Congress was always divided, and that the pacifist part of the Working Committee would have always found it extremely difficult to enter into any agreement to collaborate with Britain in the military defense of India. Consider how much was being asked of Congress. Here is a nationalist party, trained during years of struggle to regard Britain as the enemy and non-violent non-cooperation as the weapon. Suddenly they are asked not merely to abandon the struggle against Britain but actually to share in the responsibility for the conduct of a bloody war with the British government as an ally. A few like Rajagopalachari had no doubts and were prepared to accept the necessity of cooperation with Britain against the common enemy; Nehru, closest of Gandhi's followers, had long decided that in this situation he was first an anti-fascist. But not all Gandhi's followers had made any such decision, and though Gandhi was not himself present at the negotiations, his influence was powerful. Sir Stafford Cripps has spoken of a last-minute intervention by Gandhi, while equally truthful men, like Rajagopalachari and Nehru, have denied it. There is no difficulty in finding an explanation for this apparent contradiction. Sir Stafford may well have known of telephone conversations between Gandhi and some of his followers about which Rajagopalachari and Nehru knew nothing. But we move from the sphere of deduction into that of certainty when we state that Congress was deeply divided and hesitant; that it feared finding itself trapped into decisions that it might regret; that it very naturally found the Cripps proposals lacking in that dramatic concession of power that would have enabled it to go to its constituents confident of persuading them to abandon the tradition of non-violent non-cooperation and to rally to the new flag of violent cooperation. Remember, too, that Congress was skeptical, after the Burma campaign, of Britain's capacity to defend India against Japan.

Is it any wonder that a committee, so torn as this, should prefer the unity of refusal on a main constitutional issue chosen by themselves to the hazards of an acceptance which might divide its ranks and which to some of its members would certainly be psychologically more difficult than another period in a mild and already deplorably familiar confinement?

My own summary would therefore be that if Congress had been a more united and resolute body, less dogged by a minority attitude and a tradition of negotiations, it might have accepted the Cripps proposals and made of them, as Cripps suggested, the first and crucial stage in the formation of a real National Government. I add that the British might, in my judgment, have made an offer that even this divided committee could have found no excuse for rejecting. The failure was on both sides.

All this is past, but still important. I well understand the immense attraction of Gandhi and how Louis Fischer has become his apologist. The Mahatma's technique of non-violent non-cooperation is one of the great inventions of history, and stubbornly adhered to, it might have driven the British from India years ago. But it is a purely negative method, and it is not capable of dilution or compromise. Gandhi cares, says Fischer, about India's national independence first, and he was prepared to drop his pacifism for it. Certain it is that through months of negotiations Gandhi did in fact move to a position in which he accepted, in words at least, majority decisions that involved the total repudiation of pacifism. At the final meeting of Congress before the arrest of the leaders a resolution was passed offering certain military collaboration if a National Government was formed. It is a pity this resolution did not come earlier and that, when it did, it was accompanied by the threat of civil disobedience. Earlier resolutions attempted to bridge the gap between militarism and pacifism by the use of such ambiguous words as "resistance," which could mean violence to one Congress member and non-violence to another. Moreover, Gandhi's whole record, as any study of his pronouncements during this war shows, is not only that of a pacifist but that of a politician who sees his duty to go to any lengths in the attempt to keep India out of war. Under his leadership India would pass into Japanese hands not because he was or could be pro-Japanese but because that would be the result of his policy. No doubt Gandhi hoped, if the British did quit India, to persuade Japan not to invade, and if this persuasion failed, to offer non-violent non-cooperative resistance. This technique, sometimes successful in appealing to the public conscience of a Western democracy, would certainly be ineffective against the Japanese army.

There is a further point that American critics neglect. They ask why we do not "quit India." I am not denying that there is an imperialist reluctance to relinquish power. But note that at this moment nothing would in fact so much alarm Americans and adherents of the United Nations everywhere, including India, as for us to attempt anything of the sort. No Indian party asks us to quit India until after the war, when we have promised to do so.

Indians distrust British post-war promises? True, and other members of the United Nations may perform a service, in my view, by offering to give a joint guaranty of this freedom. Americans who take part in this controversy should ask themselves whether they are prepared for the responsibilities involved in such a guaranty, which should be a joint affair of the United Nations, necessarily involving a new attitude on the part of both America and Britain toward all Asiatic and colored peoples. Indians, it should be noticed, are becoming suspicious of American as well as of British imperialism, and the participation of Russia, and especially of China, which is intimately concerned with the defense of India, seems essential if any such scheme is to succeed.

In regard to the immediate situation, I do not know whether it is now too late to form a genuine National Government in India to collaborate with the British in defense against Japan. I should myself like to see another attempt made by men like Rajagopalachari and Sir Tej Sapur to set about the task, without any restrictions, of establishing a National Government, with the fullest facilities for negotiation with any leaders, in or out of jail, who are ready to collaborate in India's defense. I cannot now judge how likely success would be: I am sure some such offer should be made; and if, as is possible, success would be more likely with a United Nations guaranty, then I should choose that method. There may be other means of ending civil disobedience and the reign of violence, of approaching a reconciliation and the formation in India of a genuine National Government. No possibility should be neglected. I welcome American interest and help in any such settlement. I only suggest that the starting-point must not be a desire to expose British imperialism—a game in which I have myself taken a hand—but a responsible realization that we are in a desperate war which includes India. Every critic who writes about India should ask himself coolly and earnestly what exactly in these circumstances he is advocating. To give the American public the idea that there is some simple action of quitting India which Britain should take, leaving Mr. Gandhi in charge in India, is to serve the interests of no one except the Nazis and the Japanese. The problem is not now one of quitting India but of finding how, in defending India, to pass over the largest possible measure of power to the most responsible and representative Indians.

BOOKS and the ARTS

M., W., F. AT 10

BY LIONEL TRILLING

PROBABLY few Nation readers will have heard of the book I am writing about. It has never been advertised in the literary sections; it may never have been reviewed. It is "A Survey-History of English Literature" by William Bradley Otis and Morris H. Needleman. Its aim is modest: it undertakes to present all the useful facts and necessary opinions about English literature. Barnes and Noble first issued it as one of a series of review-outlines but it seems to have had an unusual success and it is now being advertised and adopted as a required textbook for college courses. This utilitarian, rather grubby-looking volume is, I think, one of the symptoms of our intellectual condition.

My own interest in it is first of all aesthetic. For me there is a pawky charm in its mysterious critical statements. I like to read of Thomas Carew:

Gentlemen of the privy chamber (1628). Taster-ordinary to the King (1630). Friend of Suckling. Brilliant wit, lover of women and rime. Skilfully polished verse, neat and tuneful phrase, mastery of the overlapped heroic couplet. Second only to Herrick, lacking the latter's warmth and love of nature, but possessing a sensuous fancy and a becoming virility. . . . Best of his longer poems is "A Rapture," audaciously amatory and "marred" by unreticent passionate "impurity," emphasizing the physical (and to some the "perverted") side of love much in the way of Aretino and Donne. In the latter poem his expressions, metaphysical either through volition or constraint, are not inappropriately imaginative; e. g. "And we will coyne young Cupids," and taste "The warme firme Apple, tipt with corall berry." Two of his most common stanzaic structures are ababcc and ababb.

Of this it is perhaps appropriate to remark, in the cryptic words the authors use of John Webster's work, that its "pornography is endemic rather than deliberate."

Then it is fascinating to read that Bacon's "counsels for the practical life are nucleated by three staple subjects" and to wonder why the authors wrote this rather than "stapled by three nuclear subjects." And there are those mad masterpieces of cautiousness from which we learn of Gibbon that "not only may his anti-Christian arguments be antiquated but his method of historical research may be defective or obsolete," and that his history is "somewhat sneering in its ironical deference toward Christianity." But most engaging of all is the system of parallel opinions, the columns of Suggested Merits balanced by the columns of Suggested Defects. Of "Beowulf" a Suggested Merit is "Broad study of character"; a Suggested Defect is "No minute characterization." Two Suggested Merits of Dr. Johnson are "Teacher of moral wisdom" and "Sonorous words," but a glance to the right discovers that two Suggested Defects are "A moralist in everything he wrote" and "Copious use of Latinized vocabulary." With an apparatus like this it is impossible to go wrong.

For example, under Alexander Pope we find:

Suggested Merits

2. Heatless, faultless lucidity. Polished and brilliant diction. Unerring choice of right word, incisive.

Suggested Defects

2. Poor in largeness of imagination. Rhetoric, not poetry. Periphrastic constructions and pretentious expressions.

In every class of English B1 (M., W., F. at 10) some students will take their stand as Merit men or Defect men, but they will be strong-minded rather than well-rounded. Well-rounded students with a proper feeling for the nuances of criticism will know how to deal with the problem of Pope's style: "Pope, by his polished and brilliant diction, his periphrastic constructions and pretentious expressions, achieved a heatless, faultless lucidity. As a result of his unerring choice of the right word he produced rhetoric, not poetry."

But literature is not always easy and even the well-rounded student will be stumped by the Wordsworth situation. For no sooner has he absorbed Suggested Merit 1, "Spiritual love of nature, cosmic sympathy for peaceful things," than he has to square it with Suggested Defect 1, "In a strict sense is not always a descriptive poet, nor a great nature poet." The chances are that he will prefer Suggested Merit 2, "Found God in Nature—pantheistic philosophy," to Defect 2, "Philosophy unorthodox, or materialistic, or pantheistic, or mystical"; with Defects so irreconcilable any sensible student will hang on to Merits. But then he will have to deal with Merit 5, "Love poetry while small in quantity, is important for its personal quality, intensity and significance," as against Defect 5, "Lack of intensity and passion; note the mention but not the expression of sexual passion."

Mr. Otis and Mr. Needleman lack taste and prose, but they have not been lazy—they have accumulated the facts, they have consulted the treatises and learned journals and they cite their sources assiduously and indiscriminately, so that even graduate students use the "Survey-History" as a cram-book, finding it more efficient than the older discursive histories. Perhaps a moderately intelligent graduate student could make use of the facts and laugh at the opinions—although not all the facts are correct (we are told that Swift in A Modest Proposal "proposes revoltingly that the Irish should fatten and eat their children for food") and although, in the study of literature, it is often hard to separate fact and opinion. But not all graduate students are moderately intelligent and the "Survey-History" is primarily intended not for graduate students but for undergraduate "majors" in English and for those students who are taking a "required" or an "elective" course in literature, perhaps the only one they will ever have. A concise manual of facts is useful, even a cram-book can be recommended if its purpose is properly understood, but the "Survey-History," as I have said, is making its way in some of our colleges as a textbook, a historical and critical account of literature, an approved source of attitudes and ideas. When we have this in mind, the "Survey-History" begins to seem less funny than it is.

Of the graduate students and the "majors" in English, a large number become teachers; and it is not at all funny to think of teachers instructing young people in literature out of the opinions and in the style of the "Survey-History."

It is not essential to anybody's education to know anything at all about Chapman's "Caesar and Pompey," but when the student reads of this play, "Ethical reflection. Cato, the protagonist, commits suicide," he has been led to suppose that this nugget of inconsequence is a literary fact or idea. When he has been taught that "not the pitter-patter of hearts is involved" in the novels of Scott, "who apparently has no major purpose of crying in the wilderness" and "is quite blind to the abstract intelligence"; or that Sir Thomas Browne wrote "tasseled" prose; or that "The Tempest" is "poetically emotional" although "its character-outlines [have] no particular merit"; or that Milton's "Epitaphium Damonis" is superior to "Lycidas" "in sincerity and purpose"; or that Blake has "intense, ecstatic sensitiveness to impressions" but is "unable to depict his sensibilities," he—who is to be a member of the literary public, possibly a teacher—has had thrust upon him every shabby, fusty, third-rate vulgarity of opinion—I have chosen at random—that has ever attached itself to a work of English literature. Education for democracy? Perhaps we ought to begin with education for democracy's first element, simple intellectual decency.

And perhaps that is the element students are looking for when they turn away from literature to science or even social science. The honest student who takes his one course in literature with the help of the "Survey-History" or with a teacher who can use the "Survey-History" will surely be impatient to get it over with and go on to a less cynical subject. Even the literary student, the "major" in English, will surely need to be fortified by a native sense of intellectual honor if he is not to suppose that the study of literature is the jolliest of the disciplines because in literature anything goes.

In academic circles we hear a great deal about the sad estate into which literary studies have fallen and a great deal about what the function of the teacher of literature should be. Well, let us consider that the authors of the "Survey-History" made their book in an apparently successful effort to meet what is presumably an academic need; let us consider too that they made their book, as their footnotes testify, out of the precious essence of academic literary opinion. They have accumulated all the academic ideas, taking the good with the bad, distilling both into silliness, making a negation of common-sense and meaning. I am not trying to absolve the "Survey-History" nor to indict a profession; but clearly the "Survey-History" could not have been written without the connivance of a large number of teachers of English. And what is important is not that a foolish and vulgar book has been produced but that the written word is being treated without seriousness and respect by the very people who are supposed to be its guardians.

So the "Survey-History" is not a funny book after all. It raises grave thoughts. At the moment, however, I can escape the serious reflections by contemplating Defoe's lack of modern conveniences: I have just discovered in the "Survey-History" that one of Defoe's Suggested Defects is "No plumbing of the soul."

LITERATURE FOR CHILDREN

BY BETSY HUTCHISON

DURING all the centuries that children were seen but not heard they managed to see and hear a great deal. Growing up was the process of trying to figure out adult behavior, at first toward yourself and then in the adult world in general. Adults themselves did little to enlighten you.

For the last two decades adults have been studying the workings of the child's mind, considering how to make the world plausible to him and which parts of it should be made plausible at each stage. The results in pedagogical reform are a little disappointing, but that may be because progressive education, like Christianity, has been tried so seldom and by so few, and those few have sometimes been fanatics. The results in children's literature are so bountiful that we really do need a week out of the year to give thanks for the harvest, and to select a few of its fruits for those who give Children's Book Week a more than academic interest for us.

The informative books of the new era in children's literature are perhaps its most striking contribution. Even more than the so-called popularizations for adult consumption they have achieved a high level of integrity, which is often coupled with literary quality. Above all, most of them show a real respect for their audience; they do not condescend. There are of course some juvenile authors who are painfully aware that they are bridging a gap between themselves and their readers, and who assume that the adult must make the whole effort to reach the child. These authors write down; they produce a nauseating species of literary baby-talk, and their books are bought by adults who like to think of children in baby-talk terms. Beware of archness in children's books, especially when they are beautifully illustrated! I could name names, but I forbear.

On the other hand, there are the authors who recognize the child's impulse toward exploration and discovery and aim to meet him halfway because they know that he wants to go part of the way himself. If they are writing books which inform or explain they do not dress up the subject matter with irrelevant frills or tuck away pills of knowledge in the jelly of romance. They themselves find the subject matter romantic, and their enthusiasm is contagious. (Indeed, contagion is nine-tenths of good pedagogy.) Among these are the Petershams, Henry Lent, Roger du Voisin, the d'Aulaires, Gertrude Hartmann, Donald Culross Peattie, and the father of them all, Hendrick Willem van Loon. If the books are intended for children of ten and upward, an adult can test them by his own enjoyment. I cannot believe that Carleton Washburne's "Secrets of the Earth and Sky" should be limited to children's consumption, and it would be a dull adult who could not enjoy and profit by a reading of Genevieve Foster's "George Washington's World," a triumph of the art of book-making as well as a pattern of imaginative historical writing.

Juvenile fiction has its source in quite another wellspring, probably deeper in the unconscious mind of the writer. But the best authors in this field do not seem to be dealing with the problems offered by their special audience so much as with those which concern all creative writers. If they succeed,

In a dark age of terror, when brutal empires crushed out the liberties of small nations, and when arrogant wealth bestrode the common people of every land, the Bible and its religion came into the world as a challenge to tyranny and reaction.

the effect is spontaneous, and the result a communication of emotion. They can abandon themselves unashamed to comedy, as does Atwater in his "Mr. Popper's Penguins"; they can present tragedy undisguised as does Kate Seredy in "The Singing Tree," a story so poignantly beautiful in its plea for peace that one hesitates to offer it to children who have to face what lies between us and the achievement of peace. They can identify themselves with a historical background, without a trace of educational uplift, as does Cornelia Meigs or Lois Lenski; or they can lose themselves in fantasy like Disney or again Meigs in "The Wonderful Locomotive." They can present a great personality in the light of its human value—with no hint of "lives of great men all remind us"—as does Babette Deutsch in her "Walt Whitman," or Lisitzky in his "Thomas Jefferson." There is a long list by now of those who do one or more of these things, from Mark Twain, Louisa Alcott, Lewis Carroll, and Kipling to Disney, Ransome, Flack, Dalgleish, Kästner, Laura Ingalls Wilder, the Farjeons, Seredy, and Eric Knight, who should be included in a juvenile list for that great dog story "Lassie Come-Home."

But here the naming of names is a hopeless task, and an unnecessary one. The third edition of "The Right Book for the Right Child," completely revised and reset (The John Day Company, $3), contains thirteen hundred titles selected and annotated by a committee of children's librarians, and graded by the experts of Winnetka, than whom none are more expert where the working of the child's mind is concerned. The annotations are informative; the selection is comprehensive, including a judicious sprinkling of classics for almost all ages and a few adult titles for older children, especially from the field of biography. In spite of the most painstaking search, I can find very few omissions. These include the Farjeons' two delightful volumes of historical nonsense in verse, "Kings and Queens" and "Heroes and Heroines," and Donald Culross Peattie's "Child's History of the World." The titles are all graded according to the reading ability required, a fact too often overlooked by the well-meaning Santa. Unfortunately they are also arranged according to reading ability, which will probably discourage the average parent or adopted uncle. But this edition, like its predecessors, will be very helpful to teachers and librarians. The layman's standby will continue to be Josette Frank's "What Books for Children?" (Doubleday, Doran. Revised, 1941. Published under the auspices of the Child Study Association).

There is one great satisfaction about using lists of children's books. Although they may cover twenty years of publishing, the majority of the titles are still in print. For every year brings a new generation of six-year-olds who know not "Humphrey" or "Diggers and Builders" and of eleven-year-olds ripe for "Blueberry Mountain" or "Invincible Louisa" or "The Prince and the Pauper." Classics are made in ten years or less when a year or two represents a generation, and such classics are alive. The present season brings a shipload of new treasures to set beside the old ones, but by no means to supplant them. Leave ennui to the grown-ups!

[A selected list, compiled by Lena Barksdale, of children's books published this season appeared in The Nation of November 14.]

Memoirs of Julian Green

MEMORIES OF HAPPY DAYS. By Julian Green. Harper and Brothers. $3.

IF THERE is any truth in Dante's famous statement that no suffering is greater than remembering past happiness in present unhappiness, most of the inhabitants of the world have cause to suffer today. But for those Europeans, and particularly the French, who have taken refuge in the pleasant purgatory of America, all hope is not lost: they know that eventually heaven will be granted them in the form of a return to their native land. This is probably what permits them to mull over the past with such evident pleasure.

A few weeks ago André Maurois gave us his urbane memoirs; now an equally significant, though younger, French writer recounts his childhood and youth. Julian Green is a literary anomaly. An American of solid Georgian and Virginian ancestry, he was born and educated in Paris, where he grew up to distinguish himself as one of the most original French novelists of his generation. As a young child he sat on his mother's lap and listened without understanding a word while she read in English to "the little French monkey," as she affectionately called him. And now, after a dozen successful novels, most of which have been translated into English, he has come to America for the first prolonged stay since the three years he spent at the University of Virginia (1919-22), written his first book in his mother's tongue, and joined the United States army.

It is rare that a writer can express himself so personally in two languages. Oh, to be sure, his mother's tongue shows occasional signs of being influenced by his mother tongue: he "assists at" ceremonies, "profits by" opportunities, "is persuaded" of facts, "agitates" questions, and piles "heteroclitous" luggage into a taxi—but these are the only such examples in the whole book. It is more interesting that Julian Green, whose novels are so singularly lacking in humor, shows here a delightful and typically American sense of humor, as for instance in the passage describing the scene when his cousin Sarah, a loyal Southerner without the grim earnestness of the older generation, played "Marching Through Georgia" in the Greens' Paris flat: "A brief altercation followed and tears were shed; and that was the last time Sherman's boys marched through our house." No such sketch as the following will be found in his novels either: "Next to the baroness sat a middle-aged Mexican lady whose green sweater was outrageously and purposely tight, but whose tongue, by way of compensation, was loose; a heavy brown fringe fell over her eyes; she smoked cigarettes and talked about men in a manner which made the baroness wince."

The greater part of Julian Green's memoirs concerns his childhood in Paris and Andrézy on the Seine, the only boy in a family of six children. It tells of the beauty of France, the rigors of a French education, the supernatural fears of a sensitive child, the gathering war clouds in those calm days before 1914. This is only just, since Julian Green told us in his diary, published here three years ago: "All that I write is immediately and directly derived from my childhood." The later pages, after the experiences as an ambulance driver at the front and as a student at Charlottesville, describe the writer's early struggles. They contain suggestive discussions of the relative value of plot and characters, of the difficulties of the writer's medium, and revealing portraits of friends such as Jean Cocteau, André Gide, Robert de Saint Jean.

To say this is to suggest the limitations of these memoirs. Despite their nostalgic charm, they are too unaffectedly intimate to mean much to the general reader. ## Journalists on Leave

NEWSMEN'S HOLIDAY: NIEMAN ESSAYS—FIRST SERIES. Harvard University Press. $2.

ONE of the most interesting experiments in the American newspaper field since the turn of the century undoubtedly has been the establishment of the Nieman fellowships at Harvard University. The men who receive these annual grants, entitling them to browse at will for nine months at America's greatest center of learning, attending lectures or not, as they prefer, but enjoying the stimulus which comes from residence in such an atmosphere, have a rare opportunity. The maturity and intellectual curiosity of these picked reporters, desk men, and editorial writers and the cordiality with which they have been received at Cambridge have made the Nieman experiment highly successful.

In the volume under review the fourth group of Nieman fellows, those who terminated their residence last June, have combined to make a book of eleven essays about the newspaper business, essays which were originally conceived without thought of publication. But now that they have been put between covers they enable the public to get a clearer picture of this group of Nieman fellows than it has had of their predecessors.

These eleven essays cover various aspects of journalism. There are reminiscences here, together with discussions of such subjects as editorial independence, press agents, the Newspaper Guild, censorship, sports pages, the weekly newspaper, and related matters. Evident throughout are an earnestness and a striving after truth utterly alien to the whiskey-soaked caricatures conjured up in Hollywood who pass for newspapermen with a regrettably large section of the moviegoing public. Nor is there anything surprising in this. Anybody who has been the "guinea pig" at one of the fortnightly Nieman dinners knows that these boys are alert, keen-minded, intellectually curious, and as tenacious in pursuit of a fact as a hound dog on the trail of a fugitive possum.

After the introduction by Curator Louis Lyons, the book opens with an authentic bit of reminiscence by Kenneth Stewart, who carries us from the copy desk of the New York Telegram to the Paris Herald, and then back to Gotham to the bedside of the dying World. The success with which Mr. Stewart recreates the atmosphere of the various newspaper shops on both sides of the Atlantic in which he has worked makes this chapter a stand-out. Another high point is the final chapter, in which Thomas Sancton provides a sharply etched vignette of a fictitious character named "Charlie Wilson," the prototype of the newspaper "failure."

In between there is a chapter by Henning Heldt on the origins and raison d'être of the Newspaper Guild, which states the case for that organization with reasonable clarity and detachment. Mr. Heldt is properly enthusiastic over the substantial pay increases which the Guild has managed to obtain for its members at a time when those increases were sorely needed. Now that the organization has divested itself of its extreme left-wing leadership, more cordial relations between guildsmen and management should be possible. The tone of the Guild Reporter at one period was such as to make these relations almost out of the question.

Mr. Heldt's severe strictures upon the ethics of many publishers are partially answered by Robert Lasch, who presents in a well-balanced chapter a number of the arguments on the other side.

There is a meaty discussion of the weekly newspaper by Neil Davis. It sets forth with cogency the problems which beset the small-town editor. Some of us who rumble daily in the editorial pages may be taken aback by Mr. Davis's dictum that the weekly editor "swings far more influence in his home community than any other editor." Which is to say that when we editors of dailies think we are stirring up the animals and fluttering the doves from one end of the state to the other with blasts from our sanctums, we probably are not sufficiently aware of the extent to which the weeklies can checkmate us. Some weeklies, of course, carry no editorials, and others confine themselves to such soporific themes as "Patronize Your Local Merchant" and "Go to Church Regularly," but Mr. Davis is talking about those with a vigorous editorial approach. Their potency in their respective bailiwicks is doubtless greater than we city slickers care to admit.

All in all, "Newsmen's Holiday" is a readable volume. Most of the Nieman fellows represented here are worth listening to. In publishing their views concerning the profession which claims them, they have established a precedent which, it is to be hoped, will be followed by other fellows of the foundation.

Lincoln and the Copperheads

THE HIDDEN CIVIL WAR: THE STORY OF THE COPPERHEADS. By Wood Gray. The Viking Press. $3.75.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN AND THE FIFTH COLUMN. By George Fort Milton. The Vanguard Press. $3.50.

IN SEEKING to assemble the facts of the Copperhead movement during the Civil War the historian labors under certain disadvantages. In great part the correspondence of the Midwestern Democratic leaders has disappeared—it has apparently been intentionally destroyed. The evidence of sensational reports of spies and detectives is highly suspect. Moreover, although many records of the War Department have now been deposited in the National Archives, those of the United States Secret Service are still closed to students.

Nevertheless, in the preparation of "The Hidden Civil War" Professor Gray has examined an enormous body of material, both in print and manuscript. He has carefully searched the files of Midwestern newspapers of the period and discovered relevant editorial opinion, as well as instructive reports of clashes and riots. His study is concerned with the states of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, where the strength of the Copperhead movement was concentrated. It clearly analyzes the relation of the subversive element to the Democratic Party as a whole—a relation which was to redound to the disadvantage of that party, lessening for many years its strength as an opposition.

Professor Gray's foreword acknowledges a debt to his birthplace, Petersburg—formerly New Salem—Illinois, where he listened to the reminiscences of surviving "boys in blue" and Copperheads from "Secesh Lane." Little of the color of those reminiscences has penetrated his book. It is a scholarly and factual account of a critical phase of our history.

While Professor Gray's study leaves the impression that the decline of the Copperhead organizations was largely the result of the military successes of the Union, George Fort Milton believes that the failure was primarily due to "the lack of leadership, futile disorganization, and ineffectiveness of plan" of the revolutionary leaders. "Abraham Lincoln and the Fifth Column" abounds in incident and personality. Mr. Milton sketches the arch-Copperheads, Vallandigham and Fernando Wood; Horatio Seymour, the patriotic Democrat who was Governor of New York, and Oliver P. T. Morton, the Republican Governor of Indiana, who made himself the virtual dictator of his state. While recognizing the fallibility of "spy" evidence, the author frequently makes use of it, both in his account of the conspirators and of the federal agents who worked to uncover their plots. In spite of Mr. Milton's easy manner of writing and evident enjoyment of his subject, he has produced a book which leaves the impression of being rambling and discursive. It lacks the solidity of, for example, "The Age of Hate," the author's study of Andrew Johnson and the Radicals.

To the mind of this reviewer, the use of the term "Fifth Column" in connection with the American 1860's is as dislocating as it would be to speak of the Copperheads of the Spanish Civil War.

fact gathering and analysis. For Americans who want to understand what goes on north of their 3,800 miles of undefended border it is required reading. They will understand the situation even better if they read Professor McInnis's excellent history of that border in conjunction with Chamberlin's book.

Canada is no subject for hit-and-run journalists, for it is a country of infinite and deep-seated complexities. It is a country with a stomach full of seventeenth-century France, in the form of the province of Quebec, which it cannot digest and cannot get rid of. It is rent by sectional animosities and antagonistic economic interests. The three most powerful disturbers—religious conflict, economic conflict, and geographic conflict—produce almost hopeless division. And yet such a substantial degree of unity has been forged that Canada's war effort has been prodigious. Chamberlin has seen all these things clearly, and in the main he gets them into proper perspective. Few Canadians know that the planes of their vast air-training scheme fly a million miles a day, but Chamberlin dug out the fact. This year the country will produce enough aluminum for 80,000 planes. It has the largest small-arms plant in the world and the largest shell factory in the British Empire, and it has reached parity with Britain itself in the construction of merchant shipping. For a nation which had to start almost from scratch, these are accomplishments of the first magnitude. To pay for these things Canada has taxed its people to a point where the rates are only slightly below those of Britain.

The Canadian picture is not without its dark side. Canadian labor has been passed over in the appointments to government control boards. It does not feel happy about the anti-inflation controls. It clamors for production councils, which the government has been slow to set up. It has no Wagner Act, and it wants one badly. However, despite its grievances Canadian labor is solidly behind the war, though internally it is a house divided. The war between industrial and craft unionism almost wrecked the Canadian labor movement twenty-three years ago. It has never recovered from this struggle. Today only one Canadian in fifteen belongs to a union.

As the war goes on, the Canadian economy is becoming more and more enmeshed with that of the United States. Indeed, some critics complain that Ottawa has become nothing but a branch office for Washington, that nothing can be done here without Washington's approval. This is an exaggeration which has some basis in fact, but not much. Canada depends largely upon the United States for certain vital supplies—for a great deal of steel, for airplane engines, for oil, and for coal. The Hyde Park agreement has enabled it so far to obtain these things. But Canada's war production is so large that it can hardly continue to produce enough other things to pay for its supplies, and it may soon have to borrow or come under lease-lend.

Chamberlin believes that after the war Canada and the United States will move much closer together. Here I think he is on solid ground. If a large measure of world free trade does not come out of the peace, that will be the only solution for Canada's economic problems. But any approach to reciprocity will be bitterly fought by the industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Into these provinces American industrialists have poured almost $4 billion in investments in branch factories. They will seek to protect this investment by maintenance of a high Canadian tariff to shut out American competition. This is one phase of Canada's problem which Chamberlin does not see quite clearly. To live, Canada must trade. It produces enough food, for example, to feed four or five times its population. Obviously it cannot dispose of its wheat if imports are kept out.

In his history of the ungarded frontier so dear to the after-dinner speakers, Professor McInnis unearths many interesting and long-forgotten facts. That Canada managed to preserve its independence from the United States can largely be attributed to two facts. The first is the fantastic incompetence of the military efforts made to conquer it. Secondly, the imperialistic tendencies of the United States were directed toward the south and west at the time when it might have been able to swallow Canada. The border has not always been peaceful. Despite the fact that 40,000 Canadians fought with the Union armies during the Civil War, there was much bad feeling on both sides of the line at that time. Southerners plotted in Canada and Fenian raiders tried to free Ireland by invading Canada. For years America's trouble with Britain bedeviled its relations with Canada. Since Canada became a nation in its own right, relations have progressively improved.

DRAMA

A Vehicle for Miss Hepburn

AS ALL playgoers know, Philip Barry has his serious side. For many years he has tended to alternate between light comedy and more pretentious pieces tinged with religious mysticism. When, therefore, one sees the title "Without Love," that title not unnaturally suggests Roman Catholic theology—at least to those who are aware of the fact that "love" is not the exclusive possession of Hollywood and the pulp magazines. I, for one, found myself thinking in advance of O'Neill's "Days Without End" and anticipating some indictment of modern man on the charge of being—as he too often seems—"loveless" in the full theological and philosophical senses of that word. Imagine, then, my surprise to discover in the play which the Guild is presenting at the St. James Theater little more than a vehicle for Katharine Hepburn and her assisting co-star, Elliott Nugent—a vehicle in which "love" seems to be used almost exclusively in the True Confessions sense and the two people without it seem to be merely young members of opposite sexes who are slow to recognize a normal inclination toward the consummation of their marriage. "Without Love" is, in other words, little more than one more retelling of the old, old story of the marriage of convenience which everyone except the parties most directly concerned recognizes from the beginning as something more than that. This has always been, on its own level, a good story, and it still is. For one thing, it provides an opportunity for intimate dalliance which would be almost censorably embarrassing if the two parties were not already licensed to proceed even farther than they actually do. For another, audiences always find it pleasantly exasperating to watch a member of the male sex disregarding his manifest opportunities. But there is some significance in the fact that when the story is acted out—as it often is—at neighborhood movies on a Saturday afternoon, the hero always gets audible encouragement from the small boys assembled.

Considered simply as a "vehicle," "Without Love" serves its purpose well enough. Mr. Nugent plays the hero, who is assumed to be a young economist of remarkable abilities, as an engaging mixture of shyness and determination. Miss Hepburn, as the no longer idle daughter of the idle rich, brings to the role her gift for making a certain gauche angularity seem authentically elegant. Largely for these reasons the piece will almost certainly play the season out and run on the road as long as Miss Hepburn will consent to let it. Nor do I wish to deny Mr. Barry the credit that is due him. Even if, here as so often, he slightly overdoes an effect which he knows so well how to create and introduces us to people almost too charming, elegant, witty, sophisticated, and well bred, the fact remains that he does really know how to create that effect. Moreover, his dialogue has point and style as well as an extraordinary air of accomplished ease. Not more than one or two other contemporary playwrights can equal or even approach him when it comes to turning out an epigram—as distinguished from the epigram's roughneck twin, the wisecrack—pointed enough to be delightful without being too elaborate to sound convincing as conversation. And though there is no very large number of such epigrams in "Without Love," there are several. An example might be Miss Hepburn's remark while attempting to explain the effect of a New England background on her love life, "I pray for guidance—and blush when I get it." Another, which sounded quite as good but hardly stands so well the test of cold type, is her husband's diagnosis of the same dilemma, "Like the Tower of Pisa you may have certain leanings—but you remain upright."

For all these and for certain other reasons "Without Love" will not only run the season out but deserve to do so, provided of course one does not assume that success of that sort is any more than precisely success of that sort. Nevertheless, I cannot help coming back to the feeling that there is something objectionable in the play as a whole and that it ought to be either less serious or more so.

I have not, thus far, mentioned the fact that the background is Washington just before our entry into the war and that into the main action there keep intruding political references, quite a little hocus-pocus about big men with secrets for the President's ear, and some childishly simple theses about the Irish problem. What, I kept asking myself, is all this doing in a bedroom story? And no possible answer seemed even moderately satisfactory. If the war and its problems are what really interest the author most, then his main plot is singularly ill chosen. If the intention was somehow to establish a real connection and through that connection to give to the title some such inclusive significance as I suggested at the beginning, then I can only say that I fail absolutely to see what the connection is or how the story of Miss Hepburn as wife-in-name-only makes any point more important than the obvious one. Finally if, as I suspect, these patriotic or political references are merely an attempt to give some timeliness and weight to an essentially frivolous piece, then the device seems to me quite unworthy of Mr. Barry. I am not among those who proclaim that this is no time for comedy. I see no objection to plays, even frivolous plays, which have nothing to do with the war and which deliberately refrain from acknowledging its existence. But I do object to those which introduce the subject superficially or trivially; and it seems to me that, for all its occasional pretense of seriousness, "Without Love" does exactly that. To use our peril and our resolution, to use France and Poland, Dunkirk and the A. E. F., merely as a timely device for getting two young people to bed seems to me, to state it mildly, verging on bad taste. It is too uncomfortably like advertising lipstick for morale or inventing the slogan "V for Victory—and for Mt. Vernon Whiskey."

MUSIC

FOR the first time in my own lifetime, and probably in the lifetimes of most others, there is a performance of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" in its entirety—and not just any performance but one conducted by Toscanini that gives the work a form, a life in sound such as we are not likely to hear again. The mechanical means exist by which millions of persons throughout the country can hear the performance at least this once; but it is not broadcast because N. B. C. has bought exclusive rights to Toscanini's name for broadcasting purposes, and C. B. S. has bought similar rights to the name of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony; and if the companies have done this out of the devotion to music which they loudly proclaim, that devotion evidently is not sufficient to induce them, even on the most extraordinary of musical occasions, either to waive their commercially valuable rights or to pool them and broadcast the performance jointly. Similarly the means exist by which the performance could be preserved for millions of persons to hear in years to come; but even without the Petrillo ban it would not be recorded because Victor has bought the rights to Toscanini's name and Columbia the rights to the New York Philharmonic-Symphony's.

As we have seen, even when C. B. S. or N. B. C. broadcasts a musical program local stations may not carry it: the reader who wrote me last year that C. B. S.'s Pittsburgh station did not broadcast the Sunday afternoon New York Philharmonic concerts wrote me recently that this station was cutting off the Budapest Quartet's Sunday morning programs at 11:30; and another wrote me that the Boston station was not carrying the Budapest Quartet broadcasts at all. But this reader informed me later that when she got all the people she knew to protest and demand, the station began to carry the program; and having succeeded here she was about to organize a campaign against the program commentators who annoyed her. If you and your friends are not getting the music you want, make a loud and prolonged noise about it: that is the only argument which broadcasting companies understand.

Mozart's eighteen sonatas for violin and piano are being played three or four at a time, with a work of Bach or Beethoven in between, by Szigeti and Foldes at the Y. M. H. A. Three or four of these sonatas would be too many for one time even with Mozart and Szigeti constantly at their best, and neither Mozart nor Szigeti is at his best at every moment; but their best moments are not to be missed. It takes Szigeti time to work himself up to the point of communicative intensity at which, functioning with complete assurance and mastery of his instrument, he produces those breath-takingly inflected lines of sustained melody, among other things; and until then one accepts the technical and musical manifestations of lack of equilibrium. One accepted them in the delightful early Sonata K. 296 which opened the first concert, for the wonderful playing that Szigeti began to do in the dull Sonata K. 481, for his magnificent performance of Bach's Chaconne, and for his playing in the Sonata K. 526 where Mozart too is at his best. The piano parts were sensitively phrased by Foldes; but a combination of raised piano-lid and una corda pedal made their sound dull and thick.

In a performance of the Beethoven Concerto with the National Orchestral Association under Barzin a few days later Szigeti began again with playing that made the listener as uneasy as it made the orchestra and conductor, until somewhere around the middle of the first movement it began to pull itself together and to build up to something magnificent; and at that he was not able to establish complete rapport with the orchestra. The performance of Bloch's Jewish Poems provided another demonstration of the combination of technical competence and musicianship which is so rare in conductors (as in pianists and violinists) that one would expect Barzin to have been grabbed by a major orchestra long ago. I heard only recently that he was considered a few years ago for the conductorship of the Minneapolis Symphony that in the end was given to Mitropoulos; and this made me as angry as it must have made Barzin. I don't say that any American should be engaged in preference to any foreigner; but I do say that a Barzin should be engaged in preference to a Mitropoulos.

MORRIS GRAVES. Gouaches. At the Willard Gallery, until November 28.

Graves works almost exclusively in gouache on paper. He takes most of his motifs from zoology and embroiders them decoratively—birds, snakes, rodents, and the like. All except his very latest pictures are unsatisfactory in one respect or another; yet they have elements of strength in them and make no gestures to fashion or publicity. In spite of the debt Graves owes to Klee in several instances—in addition to his titles, which have the same whimsy-fantasy—he is one of the most inventive painters in this country. His color is somehow not American, being all grays, gray-blues, restrained pinks and madders. Since the artist comes from Seattle, one might argue a Pacific or Oriental derivation. He seems to have, on the basis of his 1941 work, an important future ahead of him. He generates power out of lightness and fragility—that is, in his best work.

Biddle's Order: a Third View

Dear Sirs: Can another voice be heard after Sforza's and Salvemini's on Biddle's Order (The Nation, November 17)? It is not a voice of full consent.

Of course it is splendid that Sforza and Toscanini and others of high rank in political and intellectual service are no longer "enemy aliens." Thankfulness must welcome an exoneration enabling, on less conspicuous levels, many harmless or useful Italians to live free and to find employment. But it is not so splendid that a number of German exiles, who suffered hardship and indignity at the hands of Nazism, who fled to this country as tested allies in a common cause, still are labeled "enemy aliens," with curfew and restrictions and, above all, the iniquity of being "technically" thrown back to the enemy camp against which they fought and still fight.

Words of hope we read in Biddle's speech, when he said: "I wish to emphasize that in thus removing the label of enemy alien from Italians, we do not forget that there are other loyal persons now classed as enemy aliens. Their situation is now being carefully and sympathetically studied by the Department of Justice." It seems that the study, perhaps excessively careful, has not been completed yet.

Biddle, whatever fine things he may have said otherwise in his speech, has insisted on national demarcations. One criterion is applied to the Italians, one to the Germans, still another to the Japanese. All of us—Americans born and Americans foreign born—should insist on demanding that the acquittal of the Italians be understood as a preface to the total and prompt repeal of the Enemy Alien Act, with discrimination among aliens to be made henceforth according to heart and mind, not to blood and soil. Then and then alone can Biddle's speech and order be greeted with unqualified applause.

Otherwise doubts may arise in suspecting minds. First it was the Austro-Hungarians who were exempted from the treatment of enemy aliens. Was it meant to please Otto von Hapsburg? Then it was the Italians. Was it meant to prop the diplomatic plot dramatized in Myron Taylor's visit to the Vatican? Italy is asked to break the chain that binds it to Nazi Germany, later on to receive from the hands of "democracy" the clerico-royalist chain that is being forged not so secretly in some smithies on both sides of the Atlantic.

This cannot be Biddle's order. His speech, ringing with human feelings and with genuine love for the "other Italy," must stand above such suspicions. An act of undelayed justice for all aliens in America, no matter what the land they came from, will dispel the doubt that the excellent intentions of the Attorney General are being used in adjoining quarters for deplorable machinations.

Yugoslavs Are Cheered

Dear Sirs: Attorney General Biddle's statement of October 12 that alien Italians in the United States are henceforth to be regarded as non-enemy aliens has met with immediate response in the Italian immigrant press in this country. Italians here welcome any move that has for its purpose the delivery of the Italian people from Fascist rule.

I believe that to have the picture complete your readers should also be informed that Attorney General Biddle made an additional statement on October 28 pertaining to the situation of those Yugoslavs who after the First World War had to live under Italy. According to a newspaper dispatch dated October 29, Biddle stated that "his present order removing Italian aliens from the alien-enemy classification applied also to aliens of Yugoslav nationality who were technically subjects of Italy by virtue of certain treaties negotiated following the First World War. The order also applies to Serb, Croat, and Slovene aliens who emigrated to this country from the former provinces of Zara, Udine, Gorizia, Trieste, Carnaro, Istria, Fiume, and Lastovo."

This news will undoubtedly cheer the souls of the 600,000 Yugoslavs who live in Italy. They have always been in the front line of the fight against Mussolini, and for that they have had to pay dearly. Execution, imprisonment, abolition of their native tongue, burning of schools and libraries have been their lot during the two decades of Italian rule. Yugoslav guerrillas, recruited partly from the peasant population of the region, have successfully engaged Italian troops in the hinterland of Fiume, Trieste, and near Monte Nanos. Efforts are directed against railway lines and military objectives. It can be said without hesitation that the Yugoslavs of oppressed "Venezia Giulia" are an important link in the chain of the activities of the United Nations on the European continent. With the second front approaching the mainland, an organized and trained resistance in the Italian provinces has immediate military value; the most important railway connections between the Mediterranean and Central Europe lead through country which is under constant threat from the Yugoslav guerrilla army.

In the United States immigrants from Istria, Gorizia, and Trieste belong to the best section of the foreign-born population. By tradition they are deeply democratic and loyal. Today they are in the defense industry of Cleveland and Detroit, in the Coast Guard of the Pacific Coast, in the Allied merchant fleet. Slovenes from Trieste and Gorizia form part of the Allied army in Egypt and Libya.

Attorney General Biddle's statement of October 28 does justice to and encourages a brave people who are already playing their proper role in the Allied war effort.

More Facts About the C. I. C.

Dear Sirs: In her letter to The Nation in your October 31 issue Geraldine Fitch treats well of the history, hopes, and aspirations of the Chinese Industrial Cooperatives. There are, however, some inaccuracies that should be corrected. In speaking of the International Committee she makes several points: (1) It has, she says, in remitting funds to the International Committee, by-passed the Central Headquarters. That depends on what by-passed means. Reports of donations to the regions are sent to the Central Headquarters so that the Central Headquarters can have an overall picture. (2) The International Committee is British and American with one Chinese as secretary. This also is not accurate. It was organized with ten Chinese and six British and Americans. That there are now more Americans is because the American money-raising organizations demanded that there be Americans to report on American funds. Incidentally, the International Committee was one of the first organizations distributing foreign funds in China to be a mixed committee.

The reason for the present set of problems is that the central administration, now in the hands of five men appointed within the last few months, one of whom is George Fitch, wishes to control rather than guide and strengthen the local cooperatives. It has, for instance, "issued an order prohibiting regional headquarters, depots, and individual cooperatives from entering into contracts on their own." This tendency has been resisted by Rewi Alley and the Chinese with him; hence the desire to be rid of Rewi Alley and some of the Chinese leaders.

The International Committee, organized by people who for almost four years have been working for the original conception of the C. I. C., sends the funds to the cooperatives, for projects proposed by the secretaries and supervisors of the seven regions. The emphasis has been on helping the federations to get stronger. The officers of these federations are elected by the members and will in time take over all the functions of the servicing groups. It is not a question of whether the American money going to China shall be spent by a few foreigners or by the Chinese. It is a question of whether the American funds shall be controlled by a few Chinese in high places or by the thousands in the cooperatives.

There is no reason to "lose faith" in the cooperatives or in China. We know that nothing is ever accomplished in our own country without opposition by some groups. We hope the American people will continue their support of the Chinese people, who for five years have carried on this great struggle.

Sins of the Anthologists

Dear Sirs: I was requested some time ago by Mr. Whit Burnett to select some piece of writing of mine for his anthology called "This Is My Best." I suggested an essay called The Old Stone House, writing him that it "seemed to me one of my short pieces that came out best." In the book, which has now appeared, Mr. Burnett has quoted the sentence from my letter, substituting means for seems and thereby making nonsense of it; but—what is more serious—he has also left out the whole last third of my essay, which, in the form in which he presents it, is certainly far from one of the most successful of my pieces, and amounts, in fact, to a fraud on the readers of Mr. Burnett's anthology.

There is no way for the unfortunate Emerson to restrain Mr. Richard Aldington in his "Viking Book of Verse" from lopping off the last two stanzas of the Concord Hymn; but such incidents as this ought to warn living writers to safeguard themselves by written agreements against the impudent mutilations of the anthologists.

Darlan and American Liberals

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE last two weeks have witnessed a historic clash between two theories of political behavior—the "quarterback" or opportunist theory, long indorsed by the President, and the theory which insists upon the importance of a thought-out, consistent political line. It seems to me that events have demonstrated the superior value—especially for a nation fighting for the survival of democratic institutions—of the second theory. And what amazes and alarms me is the ease with which so many persons sincerely committed to the democratic cause have accepted football tactics as adequate to the demands of a complex political-military struggle.

The opposition expressed by The Nation to Darlan's appointment as military and civil chief in North Africa was received with total disapproval by many liberals. The protest of one prominent dissenter is published on a later page of this issue. Suddenly, and with evident satisfaction, people who had fully recognized the dangers of appeasement abandoned their critical functions altogether. The wave of self-congratulation and relief set in motion by the first experience of victory swept both principles and political judgment from their accustomed moorings.

There were exceptions—notably the comments of Edward A. Murrow broadcasting from London, at least one careful discussion by Walter Lippmann, and several columns by Dorothy Thompson. I mention these persons particularly because they spoke clearly where others apologized or equivocated. I mention them, too, because they are so few, while the liberal apologists for the government's position are so many and so contemptuous of the principles and beliefs they formerly supported. And I want to say that the mass surrender of the liberals in this country, their determination to believe that military expediency and political wisdom are identical, their rush to follow the leader wherever he may be heading—these phenomena are ill omens for the future of democracy.

The one useful role independent liberals can perform is that of vigilance officers. Committed to no governmental position, restrained by neither official reticence nor party discipline, they have the duty to use their minds freely and critically. If they abdicate this role, they lose their only excuse for existence in a warring nation. At a time when the very shape of the future is being molded by the acts of today, the need for independent political thinking and leadership is as great as the need for a strong army and an efficient government. The satisfactions of the confessional and the sawdust trail, however tempting in days of stress, must be resolutely rejected by those who hope for the survival of democratic ways of either fighting or peacemaking.

Already events have shown how well founded was the belief expressed in this journal that the appointment of Darlan was political dynamite. The bitterness among the Fighting French and their supporters, the disapproval manifest even in official circles in Britain, the open alarm among the European free groups in this country, the quick reaction in Latin America, these were clearly responsible for the President's explanation on November 17. But his emphasis on the temporary character of the arrangements in North Africa, while serving as partial reassurance, also showed how little political foresight had entered into those arrangements. For in the very act of explaining matters to a disturbed and anxious public, the President was forced also to explain to Darlan that he was being cynically used for our immediate advantage and would be thrown out as soon as our position became secure. To expose a plot is to demolish it. To the degree that Darlan and his followers believe the explanation, Darlan's authority is undermined and his zeal, one would imagine, diminished.

But in any case, the political harm done by the Darlan appointment has not been undone, nor can it be by any pronouncement from Washington. Darlan is still in charge. He is organizing his civil administration. In his first broadcast announcing his assumption of control he assured his listeners that the Vichy laws would remain in effect. He must, it is true, carry out the orders of the American command. But how far our writ will run in French territory is a question. We have a war to wage on alien ground. We have given tremendous practical power—however temporary—to a man who has little reason to implement American orders any farther than he must. With our help and equipment he will build up a force officered by men who for the most part owe no more allegiance to us or to the democratic cause than he. No doubt they will be as loyal as our continued success warrants. What they would do if we should meet reverses can only be imagined. One thing alone would safeguard our situation as well as fulfil our political obligations: the prompt reestablishment of a legal government as constituted under the regime Hitler and Pétain overturned.

Not only have the dangers of our ill-advised political action in North Africa not been wiped out by the President's counter-action; suspicion, although somewhat allayed, has certainly not been dissipated. When the French labor leader Léon Morandat escaped to England the other day, he reported bluntly that President Roosevelt's influence in France had been reduced by 75 per cent as the result of the Darlan appointment. This may be an exaggeration; it is important if it is only half true. Our complacent officials and all recent converts to the cult of expediency should also ponder the attitude expressed in the influential political weeklies of Britain. Every one of them—and the list covers the whole range of political opinion, from the conservative Spectator to the left-wing Tribune, including the independent pro-labor New Statesman and Nation, the liberal Time and Tide, and the middle-of-the-road Economist—comments in its current issue on the dangers involved in America's political strategy in the North African campaign.

Neither the President nor the army nor their liberal apologists should fool themselves in this matter. Democratic elements all over the world have developed the deepest suspicion of the whole appeasement policy. They fear a future Europe studded with Quisling governments. They note the tenderness with which Franco's hateful tyranny is treated, and they ask whether Britain and the United States have not already pledged themselves to support his regime after the war in return for his continued neutrality. They see the creation of a "Free Austrian" battalion in the United States army built up with the collaboration of Archduke Otto, and they ask whether a new embryonic empire is in the making. They read that the foreign offices of the Allied nations are considering whether the future government of Italy should or should not be built around the House of Savoy, for twenty years the willing shield and accomplice of Mussolini. They observe the close relations between some elements in our government and the Vatican. And they ask whether in the end the forces of democracy may not find themselves marching toward victory side by side with their enemies.

These questions will be asked as long as our government acts as though this war were a strictly military struggle to be won by tanks and planes reinforced by political compromises which seem momentarily expedient. They will be asked until the United States, in common with the other United Nations, agrees on a consistent political policy and makes that policy a part of the grand strategy of the war. If the Inter-Allied Political Council, long advocated by this journal, were now in existence, the Darlan blunder would not have been made. Events may hasten the creation of such a council; the demand for a political strategy which will win the confidence and inspire the resistance of common people in all countries grows stronger every week.

The Shape of Things

A GLOBAL OFFENSIVE BY THE UNITED Nations is in the making, and in nearly all war theaters the initiative is passing into our hands. In the southern Pacific American and Australian forces are consolidating gains on Guadalcanal and New Guinea while the Japanese fleet licks its wounds. In North Africa the pursuit of Rommel continues while the Allied forces under General Eisenhower's command mass for an assault on Tunisia. But it is from Russia that the most exciting and important developments of the week are reported. A few days after a successful counter-offensive in the Caucasus, Timoshenko launched a powerful and rapid pincer movement designed to trap the Nazi army before Stalingrad. It is possible that a part of that army had already withdrawn westward, for it has long been obvious that Hitler would be unable to establish winter lines on the bare steppes between the Volga and the Don. In any case the Red Army seems to have caught the Germans by surprise and to have staggered them by the violence of its punch. The huge quantities of booty already taken suggest considerable demoralization among the Axis forces. And nothing could be less impressive than the latest Nazi alibi—a statement that the strategic plan of the Reichswehr was to open gaps in its lines in order to tempt the Russians forward to destruction.

THE SCARCITY OF NORTH AFRICAN NEWS and the vague terms of the meager official communiqués make intelligent comment on that theater difficult. American censors are having a field day, and many of the correspondents who were so mysteriously whisked from London to the scene of operations must be wondering why they were invited at all. One thing is clear: the task of mounting an offensive against the strongly entrenched enemy in the Tunis-Bizerte area is proving formidable. For while the Axis ground forces are undoubtedly inferior to the numbers we can muster, strong German and Italian air fleets are being concentrated in the Mediterranean arena. This situation makes understandable the anxiety of General Eisenhower, not merely to neutralize the French North African army, but to obtain its active aid. That was the reason for the deal with Darlan, and the bloodless adherence of Dakar enlarges our profit from the bargain. But we do not know what price the Vichy turncoat has received; according to his own statement, there have been no American demands "unrelated to military requirements." Controlling a large army revived by American supplies, he might be found to hold powerful trumps should the military situation deteriorate, for example, by the adhesion of Spain to the Axis. The emergence of Suñer in Madrid makes it impossible to overlook this possibility.

TWO FREEDOMS CLASHED IN THE CHAMBER of the United States Senate last Monday: the freedom of 10,000,000 American citizens to vote without having to pay for the privilege, and the freedom of Senators to talk on a bill without time limit and without pertinence. By a vote of forty-one to thirty-seven the Senators decided that their right to endless talk was the more important of the two; they refused to invoke the closure rule by which the anti-poll-tax bill would have been brought to a speedy vote and a certain victory. What they said in effect was that it is better for a measure approved by a majority of their membership to be filibustered to death by a handful of Senators than for the simple rules of intelligent debating to be enforced. Senators who favored the anti-poll-tax measure supported this fantastic view with solemn warnings about the dangers of closure and boasted of their spotless records in never having voted for this perfectly normal ban on parliamentary anarchy. We are glad to see the Senate get on with other important business, but in a way it is too bad that Senator Barkley, the majority leader, agreed beforehand to bury the bill if closure were rejected. The spectacle of Senator Bilbo reading back issues of the Congressional Record, or perhaps the telephone book, to a quorum of dozing colleagues might have produced enough public reaction to force an overhauling of the Senate rules.

AN UNHERALDED CABINET SHAKE-UP IN Britain has resulted in the demotion of Sir Stafford Cripps and steps upward for Anthony Eden and Herbert Morrison, both possible future Prime Ministers. According to a rather cynical suggestion, Cripps has been "a victim of the success atmosphere." His popularity helped to bolster the government when its own prestige had fallen to a low point after the loss of Singapore. Then by taking responsibility for the Indian negotiations he provided a convenient left-wing conductor for the lightning bolts of anti-imperialists at home and abroad. Now, with Mr. Churchill's ascendancy reestablished by victory, Cripps may have been sacrificed to Labor Party demands for greater representation in the War Cabinet. On the other hand, it is probable that he has found membership in that body a growing weight upon his conscience. Whatever disillusionment he may have suffered in the course of his abortive Indian conversations, he must find Churchill's reviving imperial effervescence hard to stomach. There must have been domestic decisions, too, which he accepted unwillingly, and difficulties may have arisen between him and the Prime Minister owing to the generally recognized impossibility of inducing the latter to take any interest in post-war problems. Cripps, therefore, may have been anxious to avoid further responsibility for Cabinet policy, but it is hard to understand why he should have accepted an administrative post instead of moving to the opposition.

benches. As an independent critic of the government he might have been in a better position to serve the progressive cause.

A RECENT BRITISH POLL, THE DETAILS OF which have not been published, revealed the popular belief that Anthony Eden was the man best fitted to succeed Mr. Churchill, with Cripps a close runner-up and the rest of the field nowhere. By virtue of his promotion to leadership of the Commons, Eden is brought into the limelight in just the spot where Cripps proved himself singularly inept. The House of Commons is always aware that it controls the destiny of a British government, and it has to be handled with a special mixture of firmness and tact. Cripps showed himself insufficiently sensitive to parliamentary atmosphere, and his tendency to pedagogy was resented by the members. Eden is likely to shine by comparison in this particular job. The elevation of Herbert Morrison to a place in the War Cabinet draws attention also to his possibilities as Prime Ministerial timber. He is as able a politician as he is an administrator, and so is probably aware that the promotion involves danger as well as honor. His labor colleague in the War Cabinet is the equally able Ernest Bevin, and between them there has long been a certain amount of rivalry. They will both need, therefore, to discourage Mr. Churchill from pitting one against the other. For united as the British political parties are for the purpose of winning the war, it is no use pretending that they share a common policy for peace or that jockeying for future political position has been abandoned.

AS THE NATION REVEALED SOME WEEKS AGO, Otto of Hapsburg has been busy planning a "Free Austrian" legion to be headed by himself. Now the scheme has moved a step farther. A Washington dispatch to the New York Times announcing the decision of the War Department to form a battalion of Austrian Americans to fight for the liberation of Austria also reported that Otto had set up a "military committee" to "cooperate in recruiting" the battalion. This item raises several fascinating questions. Was Otto authorized by the War Department to act as a recruiting agent? If so, was the decision made with the assent of the State Department? And in any case what possible excuse can be found for allowing this alien pretender to an extinct throne to enlist American citizens for the American army? But subtler problems are also involved. Otto's committee has announced that recruits for the battalion will be found among the "10,000,000 Americans of Austrian descent." The figure is interesting. Austria has a population of 6,000,000. To find 10,000,000 descendants of "Austrians" would be possible only if Austria were generously defined as including all the Succession States. And that, one must assume, is just what Otto meant.

How our allies, the Czechs and Poles and Yugoslavs, regard this enterprise can easily be imagined. They are naturally outraged and are waiting to see whether our government intends to rid itself of Otto's embarrassing services.

AN AGREEMENT BETWEEN ADMIRAL ROBERT, governor of Martinique, and the State Department will, according to Mr. Hull, make unnecessary American occupation of French possessions in this hemisphere. No details have yet been published, but it has been stated officially that the agreement provides for "American security" and for the maintenance of economic life in the French islands. We are unable to say, therefore, whether the Martinique radio will in future be subject to American control or be permitted to continue propaganda of the kind quoted in an article on page 576 of this issue. It should be noted that as recently as November 16 Admiral Robert was still transmitting orders from Marshal Pétain. It is said, however, that in signing the agreement with us he has cut himself off from Vichy and acted on his own authority. But from whom does he derive that authority if not from the government which appointed him? If he is no longer responsible to Vichy, then he is responsible to no one but himself, for he certainly has received no mandate from the inhabitants of the French Antilles. In other words, he is merely a self-made tropical tyrant who can hold his position only so long as the armed forces under him are loyal and the United States continues to recognize his government as legitimate. The second of these factors is undoubtedly the governing one, which means that we become morally responsible for his rule or misrule. Under these circumstances Mr. Hull ought to let us know what steps he has taken to free the prisoners whom Robert is holding for the sole offense of wishing to support the United Nations.

REPORTS FROM CHUNGKING OF JAPANESE troop concentrations in the northern part of French Indo-China and west of the Salween River on the Burma border indicate a serious threat to China. If the Japanese were successful in pushing into Yunnan Province as far as Kunming, China's last tenuous contact with the West by way of India would be cut. This would be a major calamity not only for China but for the United Nations cause in Asia. For regardless of recent triumphs in the Solomons and New Guinea, the chief hope of dealing a knockout blow to Japan lies in operations from China. The Chinese have vast armies trained and ready to destroy Japan's land armies once they are adequately equipped and provided with air power. They have several huge air bases within bombing range of Tokyo, but so far not a single long-range American bomber has appeared to use them. The number of fighters sent to China has been pitifully small. Our neglect of China and of the opportunities that China presents for effective action against Japan is the most discouraging aspect of our war strategy. The best aid that could be given to China would, of course, be the reconquest of Burma and the reopening of the Burma road. A major drive against Burma, even if not immediately successful, would automatically check a Japanese drive into Yunnan.

ONE OF THE MOST NATURAL—AND AT THE same time one of the shabbiest—arguments used by employers to shelve the National Labor Relations Board is that the board's hearings disrupt war-time production. It is therefore particularly painful to see it trotted out by the American Federation of Labor in the case of the Kaiser shipyards. Kaiser is charged by the C. I. O. with having entered into illegal closed-shop contracts with sixteen A. F. of L. unions. The contracts were signed at a time when only 191 men were working at his Vancouver yard, 66 at his Portland yard, and no men at all at the new Swan Island establishment. Consequently there are now thousands of men in the three yards who must hold A. F. of L. cards in order to work and who have never been permitted to designate a union of their choice. At least 700 workers, says the C. I. O. complaint, were being discharged at the very moment that Kaiser was recruiting man-power in New York. With evidence enough to warrant a full investigation of the charges, the board had no alternative but to issue a complaint and call for hearings. It is this action which William Green has denounced as "the outstanding Axis victory of the month" and which has impelled him to warn that his federation will seek to oust the board's present personnel. Ignoring the allegations contained in the complaint, Mr. Green has confined himself to pointing out that production at the Kaiser yards is booming and that labor and management are getting along beautifully. All of which is true—and just as irrelevant as an employer's contention that he should be exempt from the Wagner Act because he is successfully turning out war goods with the aid of a company union.

"IN A RECENT ISSUE OF THE NATION," complains Oswald Garrison Villard in the Christian Century for November 18, "a writer actually urged the defeat of twenty-six men who were candidates for reelection to the Senate or the House because they had not voted the way he thought they should." Mr. Villard's comment suggests a novel approach to politics, and we wish he had developed it farther. If a Congressman is not to be judged on the basis of his voting record, just what criterion should be applied? If there is something "discreditable"—the word is Mr. Villard's—about prying into this aspect of a candidate's qualifications, how can Mr. Villard conclude that "those who were reelected now have the right to say that they spoke for their constituencies and have been upheld by them"? Finally, if Mr. Villard himself did not—discreditably?—examine the voting record, what is it that impels him to believe that "not in many, many years has there been as startling and salutary an election as the one just held, or one which does more credit to the intelligence of the electorate"?

THE SURVEY GRAPHIC'S SPECIAL NUMBER ON "Color: Unfinished Business of Democracy" contains many excellent articles, including several on the status of Negroes in the African colonies, and of these none is more timely than a portrait of Felix Eboué, Negro governor of the Chad region, who has kept millions of natives on the side of the Fighting French. A copy of it should be laid on Cordell Hull's desk. Eboué is a great fighter and a statesman of vision; he strikes us as a far more desirable ally than some who have recently been adopted by the United States. As a matter of fact the Survey Graphic's issue as a whole should have the widest possible reading, for it presents an extremely interesting and lively analysis of one of the pressing problems of our time.

Political Censorship

WE HAVE heard a great deal about the sins of the British censorship, but probably most Americans are unaware that even more stringent restrictions are imposed on press messages sent from this country to Britain. Until recent months American correspondents in London were usually able to cable information which had appeared in the British press and were allowed to quote from editorials and speeches, however unfavorable to the government. In neither of these categories of news has the censorship in this country been nearly so lenient.

Facts of various kinds, particularly those relating to production, are frequently deleted from cables sent to Britain even though published in every American newspaper. An example is the President's statement that bombers are not yet coming off the Willow Run assembly line. The excuse offered in such cases is that the Nazis can get copies of British papers through Lisbon and can make use of even non-military information for propaganda purposes. This explanation would be more convincing if the Administration had not acquiesced in the operation of convenient pipe lines to Berlin through the Vichy and Spanish embassies.

But while they fight specific instances of censorship of facts, British newsmen concede that the question of what facts may be of use to the enemy is a reasonably open one. What they chiefly complain about are attempts by the censor to prevent the honest reporting of American opinion. British correspondents in New York have, for example, been prevented from telling their readers about the great debate in this country on race discrimination. They were not allowed to quote from a recent speech by Wendell Willkie on this subject. Again, efforts have been made to hinder the transmission to Britain of views expressed in this country about the Indian deadlock. In one of many instances a quotation from an article by Raymond Clapper sharply attacking Premier Churchill's attitude on India was prohibited. Another matter on which the American censorship is extremely touchy is State Department policy.

The Darlan incident brought this situation to a head. British opinion was extremely disturbed over the sudden development which placed a leading collaborationist with the Nazis in a position of great authority in French North Africa. Strong protests were made in the British press; sharp criticisms were heard in Parliament. Similar American editorials and statements could not be sent to Britain, and so successfully have our censors persuaded their British colleagues to accept their taboos that only an emasculated version of the pungent comments of the London political weeklies has been allowed to reach our eyes.

The excuse offered for this kind of censorship is again that it offers ammunition for Nazi propagandists. But there is no way of preventing such controversies from being overheard by Goebbels, and attempts to prevent Britishers who dislike the adoption of Darlan from learning that their feelings are shared by many Americans can only foster Nazi efforts to promote disunity between us and our allies.

In a recent cable to the London Sunday Dispatch, Don Iddon, New York correspondent of that paper, accused the American censorship of taking upon itself "the task of deciding what the British people should know about America and what they should not know about America." This suppression of opinion, he warned, is apt to result in a tremendous misunderstanding. "One day there might be a major schism in Anglo-American policy, and the people in Britain will say, and rightly: 'But we had no idea American opinion took this view. . . . There were never any indications of such a trend.' " "When you suppress honest and responsible opinion," Mr. Iddon concludes, "you are playing a dangerous game. American censorship . . . is shackling and gagging us and is shackling and gagging American opinion by preventing its export to Britain. I protest against this sort of censorship. It is not worthy of American democracy."

We indorse this statement and hope that the British correspondents will not be left to protest alone. As Raymond Daniell in a London dispatch to the New York Times points out, the British authorities are politely reciprocating the regulations of the American censors. Thus the rights and interests of all American newspapers, newspapermen, and newspaper readers are involved in this disregard for freedom of public opinion.

Ration Food!

ALTHOUGH the United States has produced more food in the past two years than in any other two years of its history, the average American housewife is having increasing difficulty in getting adequate food for her family. Our shipments of foodstuffs to our allies under lend-lease arrangements have been tremendous. Millions of our own citizens, including many in the armed forces, are enjoying an adequate diet for the first time in their lives. Some supplies, such as those of sugar, tea, coffee, and bananas, are reduced because of shipping difficulties. At the moment, the most serious stringencies are felt in meat, butter, and other dairy products. Owing to the demands of the armed forces, the amount of beef available for civilian consumers has recently been cut down to 70 per cent of last year's deliveries. A recent WPB order froze 50 per cent of the butter in cold storage in thirty-five principal marketing centers.

In normal times a temporary shortage in one or two food items would cause only minor inconvenience. But these are not normal times. Each rumor of an approaching shortage starts a flood of buying by hysterical housewives, thus frequently creating a shortage where none existed before. The coffee shortage was greatly accentuated by just such hysteria. The report of the cut in butter supplies almost immediately led to a wave of unnecessary buying. The OPA is said to be considering the adoption of drastic anti-hoarding regulations, but such regulations would be extremely difficult to enforce. The one satisfactory safeguard against hoarding and inequitable distribution of necessities is rationing. But rationing works best if it is instituted before stocks become seriously depleted. And the experience of the past few months demonstrates the unwisdom of giving advance notice regarding the goods to be rationed. There are many kinds of food which for one reason or another will never need to be rationed. But where shortages are anticipated—and the Department of Agriculture and the WPB well know where that is—immediate action should be taken to institute a rationing system that will guarantee adequate supplies for everyone.

It is worth noting that representatives of some twenty consumer, church, and labor groups have taken the initiative in urging a comprehensive rationing program. Many persons within the OPA are known to have long favored such action. But the WPB has held up general rationing, presumably because it was not sure of the public's reaction. The opposition of a group of recalcitrant Congressmen to nation-wide gasoline rationing may have intensified this concern. But we think the public would welcome a rationing program if it were presented as a means of safeguarding the family diet, not as an attack upon it. It is unfortunate that the propaganda associated with the rationing of sugar, oil, and gasoline appealed to the patriotism of the average consumer instead of making it clear that these steps were being taken for his protection. This handicap must be overcome if a general food-rationing program is to be successful. A fireside chat by President Roosevelt would perhaps be the most effective way of doing it.

Fighting the Fighting French

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, November 23

PRIME MINISTER CHURCHILL seems to have played some part in the President's statement last Tuesday declaring our North African agreement with Darlan "a temporary expedient." De Gaulle's own protest the day before was approved by the British government in advance of its release, and there is reason to believe that Churchill telephoned Roosevelt about the Darlan affair that same night. Some further clarification of our government's attitude was expected when André Philip, De Gaullist Minister of the Interior, paid a visit to the White House yesterday. A few of the Fighting French seem to have been optimistic enough to believe that the President might grant recognition, and they showed their disappointment after the conference. Philip was taken to the White House by Under Secretary Welles. After he left, Secretary Hull visited with the President. There may be some significance in the sequence. Hull could have wiped out the unpleasant memories associated with his reference last year to the "so-called Free French" by taking Philip to the White House in person; or he could have had Philip present at a press conference and made amends for the slur. He did neither. Hull and the dominant faction in the State Department still seem to harbor a grudge against the Fighting French.

The Fighting French are far from satisfied with the President's statement on North Africa. This dissatisfaction does not spring from lack of confidence in Mr. Roosevelt but from long and painful observation of some of the men and forces in his Administration. In some quarters the President's declaration "We are opposed to Frenchmen who support Hitler and the Axis" is being interpreted precisely and literally as shutting the door only on collaboration with Frenchmen now visibly supporting Hitler. If this is a correct interpretation, the statement does not mean much. Naturally we are opposed to Frenchmen now supporting Hitler. But what of the Frenchmen like Flandin and Pucheu who steadily supported appeasement, collaboration, and Hitlerism until the North African invasion but who are now flocking to our side? Some indication of how certain State Department figures would answer the question may be obtained from the newspapermen who reflect their views. On Tuesday Arthur Krock spoke of Flandin's "harsh conservatism, even fascism" as making him "ineligible for any sustained cooperation from the United Nations" (my italics), but added that "if he can be of any real use in winning the war, he will be used." The next day Ernest K. Lindley, while recognizing that De Gaulle had good reasons for disliking men like Flandin, made an extraordinary observation. "There are practical advantages," he wrote, "as well as inherent difficulties, in broadening the political base of the French movement for liberation." It would be broadened further, one supposes, if we could also take in Laval.

Dorothy Thompson wonders why "if it was possible to get Giraud out of metropolitan France . . . it was not possible to spirit a man like Herriot out, to be there to declare the dawn of liberation." A possible answer to the question is that among the army's political advisers are very few who would feel at home in dealing with an homme du gauche like Herriot. Most of these advisers are men of the right who gravitate naturally to the anti-democratic forces. With General Eisenhower is Robert D. Murphy, who is a close friend of General Weygand and who represents the right-wing Catholic attitude toward Vichy. There are many elements in the church at home and abroad who disliked the Third Republic as a secular state. The Office of Strategic Services, which seems to do much of the army's political thinking, is as mixed in its composition as its chief, William J. Donovan, is in his thinking. There are many good things, from the progressive point of view, to be said about both the O. S. S. and Donovan, but there is also much that is disturbing. The O. S. S. has acquired some of our most moth-eaten diplomats. William Phillips, who as our ambassador to Rome so admired Il Duce, is in charge of its London Office for Political Warfare. Hugh Wilson, whose soft attitude toward the Nazis so disturbed the late William E. Dodd, is also with the O. S. S., as is John Wiley, who was Bullitt's first secretary in Moscow. These men can inspire only misgivings in the European underground.

The battle for the reconstruction of Europe has already begun. A view that is meeting little resistance favors the setting up of new regimes far enough to the right to permit American big business to take back its properties and resume its old cartel ties. In most big-business circles it is realized that we must get rid of Hitler, but these groups would still like "the trains to run on time," as we used to say in the days when Il Duce was in favor. The European underground has other visions of the future, and that is one reason for the undercurrent of anti-De Gaullist sentiment in places like the State Department. André Philip is a Christian Socialist, but distinctly not of the Dollfuss variety. De Gaulle has learned much in the years since France fell. His followers have no intention of handing the country back to the Comité des Forges and the two hundred families. They wonder why we have called only for repeal of the Nürnberg laws, not for reestablishment of the laws of the Third Republic; anti-fascist French Jews will resent the move as compromising them in the eyes of their neighbors.

The most hopeful development here is the feeler put out by the Administration in the Welles speech asking for a statement of war aims. Without some such statement, without at least the outlines of a program, the forces of the economic status quo will win by default. "Nothing of importance," Wendell Willkie said in his speech at the forum conducted by the New York Herald Tribune, "can be won in the peace which has not already been won in the war itself." The policy of drift will lead toward more Darlan deals, and these impair the moral leadership of the President and the Vice-President and the American people in the eyes of the world. Unless watched, these temporary arrangements may take on a more permanent character. Trial balloons are going up here for a deal with Franco. These arrangements may be the means of achieving some immediate military advantage, but what of the Four Freedoms?

Pacific Deadlock

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

OUR recent naval victory in the Solomons brought into the public eye with startling suddenness a front which during the past few weeks had seemed to be definitely secondary.

The most striking characteristic of the Pacific war to date has been the closeness with which its main outlines have followed pre-war predictions. Japan was conceded an advantage in the western Pacific, the United States in the eastern. Barring the large-scale naval and air intervention which the pre-war diversion of American sea power into the Atlantic and the disaster at Pearl Harbor ruled out as a possibility, Japanese successes were certain. Had not the Japanese, in great confidence, attempted to make their victory complete by an unsound attempt to invade the American zone, their strategic position would have remained much stronger than it is today. The defeat at Midway and also the prolonged attrition in the Aleutians have definitely crippled Japan's striking power.

The enemy's losses, however, cannot be regarded as decisive. For if the war is to be won it is we who must take the initiative in an amphibious offensive, not the Japanese. The latter have already won, and to keep their victory they need only to repel American attacks. The central question, therefore, remains: Can we penetrate the western Pacific successfully and there decisively defeat Japan? Can we deprive Japan of its conquests?

Here we face two special difficulties. The first is transportation, in which the Japanese have the advantage of operating along lengthy but interior lines. A given number of merchantmen are more valuable to them than the same number would be to us because of the difference in distances. With this consideration and the needs of the Atlantic in mind, then, we must outbuild Japan by an enormous margin to achieve mere equality in the battle of supply.

In the second place we are obliged to take the offensive in the Pacific without naval superiority, because of the number of ships that must be diverted to the Atlantic. Furthermore, our Pacific fleet is matched against an enemy which in six years of secret shipbuilding has obviously constructed many more vessels than it has been credited with possessing.

The early news from the Solomons seemed to indicate that despite these disadvantages we were ready to answer in the affirmative the question as to whether we could reconquer territory seized by the Japanese. We achieved a complete surprise and made landings with ridiculously small losses. American strategists were convinced that the island-hopping process essential to victory had commenced. In nearly four months events have not justified these early hopes. We have succeeded in holding our conquests, but save in nearby and rather unimportant New Guinea we cannot show any positive victories.

There are several reasons for this negative record. To begin with, we were not prepared to follow up our successes with a further offensive elsewhere. The Joint Board apparently viewed the Solomons campaign as a local operation, an opportunity to handicap the Japanese without running the risks or undertaking the responsibilities of a full campaign. For example, MacArthur, whose command was not directly involved, was notably slow in sending army reinforcements to relieve the marine garrisons. But whether this circumstance opens him to criticism is doubtful since the navy can hardly be said to have taken its sister service into its confidence.

Our failure to follow up the occupation of Guadalcanal and Tulagi gave the Japanese an opportunity to recover and launch attacks of their own. On the night of August 8 three Japanese cruisers and four destroyers sank 40,000 tons of ships and did an undisclosed amount of damage to a somewhat larger American force, which despite advance warnings was completely unprepared. This disgraceful repetition of Pearl Harbor was actually cited as a tactical victory since American transports were not interfered with in the unloading of their troops. The navy, moreover, chose not to disclose losses until it was possible to make a simultaneous announcement of successes. This disaster, of course, required replacements, and these considerable reinforcements must have created serious logistic problems in the Atlantic. Despite our superior air strength, which could be readily replenished, the enemy took advantage of our inferiority in sea power and put in reinforcements and supplies. Air power proved invaluable. Had the Japanese held the upper hand here, our campaign would long since have ended in disaster. Nevertheless, air power could not take the place of naval dominance. Our planes exacted a tribute of Japanese ships coming within their range, but the fleet itself continued to operate.

A second reason for our negative record is to be found in the unwillingness of the Japanese to accept defeat and lose face. The anchorage at Tulagi and Henderson Field hold a certain value, but they are assuredly not worth the three major efforts which the enemy has made to recover them. This shortsighted pugnacity, while it has forced us to acknowledge the Solomons as a long-continued major campaign rather than an isolated episode, has also played into our hands to a certain extent by leading the Japanese to risk large losses repeatedly. Though they have never tried using the entire striking power of their navy and risking the war on a single battle, the task forces have become larger and larger. When efforts to entice our warships away from air support failed, the Japanese took long risks. The sinking of at least one Japanese battleship and five cruisers in a clash with our surface and air forces is a fair commentary on the military unsoundness of operating without air support. If the United States navy has been too cautious, as is sometimes charged, that of our opponent has been bold to the point of foolhardiness.

The continued fighting about the Solomons has yielded some interesting tactical results. Our air forces, especially those of the navy, have been largely responsible for our success to date. Repeatedly they have retained command of the air under attack and have destroyed a very large number of Japanese Zeros, bombers, and float planes. In contrast to its inadequacy at Pearl Harbor and the Philippines, our air-raid warning system has been extremely efficient, much better than that of our opponent. The navy has learned by bitter experience, but it has learned. Our marine and army units are likewise giving a much better account of themselves than did the land forces earlier encountered by Japan. Anti-aircraft defense by planes and guns has likewise become more effective, though the poorer grade of pilots now being used by the enemy probably has something to do with this good record. The plane carrier as a capital ship has demonstrated such definite vulnerability to air attack that either a much better protected type of carrier or a great superiority in their number will be a future prerequisite to carrying on an offensive. The battleship itself still packs the most powerful short-range punch of any weapon, and the mid-November naval battle demonstrated that it is not obsolete. But the longer reach of air power is clearly a necessity.

From the strategic point of view the campaign has certainly produced something approaching a stalemate. While we are somewhat better off than we were at the first of the year, the mass destruction of sea-based air power has left both the Japanese and ourselves so short of this essential to amphibious war that an immediate offensive by either side is highly unlikely. Defenses on both sides, however, are strong.

As to which side will be most benefited by the delay in launching an offensive, there is considerable room for doubt. The Japanese will be given more time to garrison islands, erect coastal defenses, bring in air forces, and otherwise consolidate their gains. On the other hand, the production of American shipyards is certain to augment vastly our striking power by sea, and it is not probable that the Japanese will be able to match this increase. This is especially true because the ratio of losses by attrition is clearly in our favor, though not to the degree that American official figures—which frequently do not include our own damaged vessels—would indicate.

The public is still suffering from a paucity of information on the war in the Pacific. A stupid method of handling news, for which neither Elmer Davis nor the navy's efficient Office of Public Relations is responsible, has made our sea fighters look even worse than they are. Most of the popular praise for Midway and the Coral Sea, for example, mistakenly went to the not over-modest Army Air Corps. Representative Melvin Maas of Minnesota, ranking minority member of the House Naval Affairs Committee, and Hanson Baldwin of the New York Times both returned from the scene of action with devastating criticisms. Those of Baldwin concern overcaution, poor leadership, useless and extreme censorship, friction between the services, and division of command. Maas has stressed poor leadership and the release of false and misleading news. Both hit directly at our naval high command. Official reactions have done little to promote public confidence, but the criticisms have nevertheless been distinctly valuable. The navy has been learning from its critics, as well as by experience, and it has been correcting its mistakes. As a whole the record in the Pacific is at least fair, and the enemy has certainly been guilty of as many mistakes. The decisive battle is yet to be fought. The showdown has merely been postponed.

Church Control versus Birth Control

BY EUGENE L. BELISLE

Boston, November 21

IN JUNE of 1940 a reputable survey of public opinion showed that 82 per cent of the voters in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts favored legislation permitting doctors to furnish information on contraceptives to women whose health would be endangered by pregnancy. Seventy-two per cent of the state's Roman Catholic voters who were asked indicated that they would favor such a law. Yet on November 3 a state-wide referendum on the subject resulted in a rejection of the measure by 58 per cent of the voters. As executive director of the Mothers' Health Committee, which conducted a vigorous campaign in behalf of the defeated measure, I was in an excellent position to see how almost half a million men and women were led to change their votes if not their minds.

The story begins in 1938, when an old Massachusetts blue law was construed by the state Supreme Court to make it a crime for a physician to prescribe contraceptives even to women who might die if they bore children. Several birth-control clinics were closed, and although it was still a relatively simple matter for a woman of average means to purchase contraceptives, it became exceedingly difficult for poorer married women to secure either advice or prescriptions. This circumstance soon led to a protest movement, and the protest just as quickly produced a violent reaction on the part of the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic church.

In 1941 an initiative petition bearing 45,000 signatures was submitted to the Legislature and promptly challenged by Frederick Mansfield, former mayor of Boston and now the registered legislative agent of William Cardinal O'Connell. The petition asked only that existing laws be amended so that they "shall not apply to treatment or prescriptions given to married persons for the protection of life and health by or under the direction of registered physicians. . . ." If this had become law, Massachusetts would still have had more rigid statutory restrictions on birth control than any other state except Connecticut. Mr. Mansfield, nevertheless, held that it was improperly before the Legislature, since the Constitution forbade the introduction by petition of "measures pertaining to religion, religious practices, and religious institutions." Asked for an opinion, the Supreme Court, three of whose seven members are Catholic, unanimously held that the legislation was "purely permissive" and "in the field of police power." No Catholic, in other words, would be required under the amended law to do anything not in keeping with his religious beliefs. The Cardinal's agent next held that the signatures were forged and fraudulent, but he was again rebuffed, and in January, 1942, the proposed amendment was offered to the voters. That was a signal for a campaign rarely surpassed in lies and distortion.

The tone of the opposition's campaign was set by the Pilot, official organ of the Boston archdiocese, which every week from late July until early November carried blazing editorials against the referendum. The gist of its attitude may be briefly conveyed: (1) birth control, it said, is not only against Catholic teaching but against "God's law" and should therefore be opposed by any Christian, irrespective of denomination; (2) the proposed amendment would permit the promiscuous distribution of contraceptives; (3) the measure constituted state interference with the rights of Catholics; (4) its sponsors had no morals, believed nothing they said.

The ultimate result of this constant hammering was that thousands of people voted No on November 3 because they actually believed that the referendum was intended to set up some form of state control over childbirth. A fantastic hysteria developed in many sections of the state. Some women believed that the proposed law would permit doctors to remove their ovaries against their will; that licenses would be required for childbearing; that doctors could forbid, and forcibly prevent, their having children.

The Democratic State Committee, once more in the control of former Governor James Michael Curley, recently elected to Congress, took its cue from the Pilot, and many Republicans took their cue from the Democrats. Candidates in the primaries vied with each other in denouncing the measure. Roger Lowell Putnam, Democratic candidate for governor, made it his principal campaign issue. Fearful of the clamor, Governor Leverett Saltonstall also opposed adoption of the amendment, saying that a decision on the merits of the measure should be postponed "for the unity of the war effort." Opposition propaganda was distributed in front of the Washington Street headquarters of the Democratic State Committee in Boston. One of the leaflets handed out to noon-day crowds was headed "The Church Says Vote NO on Birth Control, Dogs, and Horses," and explained that the dog- and horse-race gang "will finance the birth-control campaign and steal the election while the boys are away fighting." Parish priests rounded up unregistered voters, using lists turned over to them by machine politicians. A card mailed to unregistered voters and headed "Register to Vote No on the Birth-Control Referendum" illegally bore the seal of the State of Massachusetts.

On October 11 the Boston Sunday Advertiser, in one of its many special articles aimed at the amendment, unwisely revealed that "Jesuit priests have been especially insistent that the women of their congregations register. They have told their women parishioners that it is a moral duty for them to go to the polls and cast their votes against the birth-control amendment. Some have gone so far as to tell the women that it will be a mortal sin not to vote against the amendment." The Springfield Union reported on October 12 that "at Sacred Heart Church parishioners were told that Catholics had a moral obligation to vote against the referendum and that any Catholic who knowingly voted in favor of it could not expect absolution." A week before, Father Ruddy, of Sacred Heart Church, was quoted in the same paper as telling the Massachusetts Catholic Order of Foresters that the principal leader (unnamed) of the birth-control movement was in the contraceptive business. On Sunday, October 11, it was reported by indignant Catholics that from the pulpit of St. Gregory's Church in Dorchester it had been stated that the campaign for the amendment was financed by commercial contraceptive interests and directed by them "from a shady hotel near the North Station." From St. Anthony's Church in Allston, according to reports from dissenting parishioners, came the suggestion that the campaign for the amendment was being financed and directed by Jews. Subway cards, billboards, and three-sheet posters in the subway stations proclaimed, "Birth Control Is Against God's Law—Vote NO."

Until late in the campaign not one major Boston radio station would sell time to the Mothers' Health Committee, even to answer attacks by politicians. The Boston Post and the Boston Record-American-Advertiser combination gave column after column to the most inconsequential speeches by opponents of the measure, but refused even to sell space to its supporters. The Boston Globe likewise refused to sell space, but in the last two weeks of the campaign it followed a policy of devoting equal news lineage to the rival camps. The Fall River Herald News, only English-language daily newspaper in a city of 115,000, refused to sell space to the Mothers' Health Committee and ran news items only in the last few days, after the committee had succeeded in making a series of one-minute announcements on the freedom of the press over Fall River's radio station WSAR. The Herald News printed whole sermons on the other side. Code complaints were filed against Station WNAC (Boston), which had sold politicians time used to attack the amendment while refusing to sell us time for the affirmative. The result was that six days before election we were permitted to have fifteen minutes in which to answer a half-hour free broadcast by the Catholic Question Box on the preceding Sunday. WNAC decided to sell time during the last four days of the campaign, and on Sunday night, November 1, station WEEI allotted fifteen minutes to each side.

In the final days of the campaign the opposition ran riot. On Monday, October 26, the Boston Daily Record quoted Mr. Mansfield in reporting the planned distribution of 5,000,000 propaganda pieces through churches in Massachusetts. One of the folders stated, among other things: "Any person may sell, or give away, any article intended for self-abuse, or for causing abortion. . . . Any person may print or circulate cards or advertisements stating where such articles may be obtained." Another, printed in red and blue, with cherubic baby photographs for illustration, carried the following message:

Fathers—Mothers—Voters. . . .

Teaching birth prevention with the sale of contraceptives on the open counter of drugstores—department stores—the "5 and 10"—barber shops—beauty parlors—will encourage unlawful sex relations between boys and girls.

Do you want this?

Vote "No" on Question No. 1.

These cards were distributed within and in front of Roman Catholic churches on Sunday, November 1, two days before election. Boys and girls six and seven years old were seen handing them out within the doorways of the churches.

Small wonder, then, that the effort to bring social and medical sanity to Massachusetts was defeated by 691,000 to 505,000. The campaign will go on, and the Catholic hierarchy will find it much more difficult to have things its own way, even among Catholics. Toward the end of the campaign the Catholic Messenger asked for and ran paid advertising of the Mothers' Health Committee without a word of negative comment. Many members of the church privately expressed their shame at the conduct of the hierarchy. This Catholic opposition to political interference by heads of the church is likely to grow; if it does, it will go far to ease the anti-Catholic reaction which this campaign has stimulated throughout Massachusetts.

The Country That Moved

BY ALBERT RHYS WILLIAMS

FOUR months after the Nazis attacked the Soviets, Hitler complained that he never dreamed the Russians had such reserves of material. Again in six months he announced that Germany would direct its main effort against these "immense and incredible supplies of ammunition, tanks, and planes."

It is difficult to understand why he was so astounded. The phenomenal growth of industry in Russia was a well-recognized fact. The casual traveler looking out of the train window saw evidence of it. There were plenty of authenticated reports from specialists returning home after fulfilling contracts with the Soviets—among them many German engineers. And the Soviets, though they may not have told all about their industry, told a great deal.

In terms of capital investment, the Gosplan reported that during the First Five-Year Plan 51 billion rubles were invested; during the Second Five-Year Plan, 114 billion; during three years of the Third, 192 billion, making 357 billion in the aggregate, of which the lion's share went to industry.

As significant as the growth of industry is its distribution. To get some concept of this, instead of looking at figures, look at the map. Only it must be a new one. The old maps show the industrial centers in the extreme west—Leningrad, Moscow, and the Ukraine. Ninety per cent of all industry was concentrated in them, five hundred miles from the frontier. They had grown up in czarist days along with the railroads, close to pools of skilled labor, easy credit, and easy markets. The great hinterland of Russia was treated as a colony, a source of raw material and cheap labor.

The Soviets reversed this policy for three reasons: First, they sought to develop the backward regions and peoples at the expense, if need be, of the richer and more advanced centers. Only through the development of their own resources and the resulting benefits could the many peoples be welded together into one union. Second, they wished to locate industry as close as possible to the sources of raw material and cheap power. If cotton were grown in Uzbekistan, there it should be spun and not in Moscow. This meant that not only the new enterprise must be built, but at the same time new railroads and new cities and all the services required in such a drastic reorganization—very costly, but in the long run it would create a more rounded and less wasteful economy. Lastly, the location of industry should contribute to the defense of the country. The Soviets consciously planned for strong industrial bases on which to fall back in case of invasion, strategically located beyond the reach of bombing planes. They wanted to erect in the east duplicate plants of every essential industry, in case factories should be destroyed. They wanted all regions to develop local industries to provide for everyday needs and to be as self-sustaining as possible in case supplies should be cut off. In other words, they were aiming at "total defense."

Of all the new regions the Urals and western Siberia are the most important from an economic-military standpoint. The last time I talked with Lenin in the spring of 1918, he said: "Soon from west and south the White armies will be driving in on Moscow. But never mind. We have the big, rich Urals to fall back on. There we can hang on for a long, long time."

While the Whites, like the Nazis, almost reached the gates of Moscow, they never captured the city. So Lenin did not have to flee to the Urals. But in mind and feeling he was often there. Pointing out on the map the region lying between Vologda and Tomsk, he would say: "Look at it! An immense territory, half savage and in some places wholly savage. In that now wasted wilderness a score of civilized states could be built up."

It was more than a decade before this vision began to take form and shape. It began in earnest around the twin-peaked Magnet Mountain that rises out of the barren plain near the frontier of Asia and Europe. This was discovered when a traveler noticed that the needle of his compass, instead of pointing north, pointed to this mountain. It was an almost solid mass of magnetite—60 per cent pure iron.

In 1928 armies of workers with dynamite, bulldozers, steam shovels, and dredges moved in on the place. They were joined by exiled kulaks, Kirghiz nomads from the steppes, engineers from America. Hills were rent asunder, rivers turned from their course; caravans of camels, oxen, and tractors struggled through mud and dust storms. Buildings, hurriedly thrown up at the wrong place, were torn down, to be erected again. Concrete froze as it was poured. Typhus and malaria swept through the flimsy shacks and dugouts of the workers. Agents of the secret police watched out for spies and wreckers. Engineers, cursing and toiling like mad, hurried by plane to Moscow to get relief from red tape and delays. Everywhere—noise, dirt, stench, confusion.

But steadily out of seeming chaos emerged the outlines of the huge metallurgical combine. Blast furnaces now light up the long winter night and stain the snowfields with their fumes. The howls of wolves are drowned by the roar of rolling mills. Long trains of ore-laden cars rumble off to the Kuzbas and Karaganda, bringing back coal to smelt the iron of Magnitogorsk. Out of the river, dammed into a five-mile lake, the water pours to cool the masses of molten metal. On the once barren, windswept plain now stands this Soviet Gary with its huge steel mills covering twenty-seven square miles. It turns out half as much steel as all Russia did under the czars. Constantly expanding, it is slated to become the biggest in the world, with an annual output of 4,000,000 tons of coke, 4,500,000 tons of iron, and 5,000,000 tons of steel.

This is what the Soviets call the "bread of industry," the raw material for cannon, tanks, armored trains in the present; for bridges, rails, radios, and telephones in the future—"the wings of steel by which we lift ourselves to the sun." Magnitogorsk is but one of a hundred new enterprises established in this mid-continent—based not only on metals, coal, and oil but on the virgin forests, the fisheries of the big Siberian rivers, the rolling wheat and cattle-grazing lands of the steppes. They form here a second Soviet state, self-sufficient and as large as Western Europe. On its western fringe the city of Sverdlovsk, where the Czar was executed, is now the center for the making of machines, turbines, and submarines in shops three miles long. Two thousand miles to the east is Novosibirsk, the Chicago of this new West, a second "Stacker-of-Wheat, Hog-Butcher, Forger-of-Metals for the World."

Between these two cities, each with about a half-million inhabitants, are scores of others growing up out of small towns and villages, or straight out of the wilderness, around the coal of Kizel, the oil of Ishimbayev, the potash of Solikamsk, at Kurgan, Chusovaya, Kirovgrad.

The story of this great venture has been told in scores of novels, plays, and epic poems by Soviet writers. Now they have a bigger, more exciting, and more heroic story to tell. For what happened in this region in the ten years prior to the outbreak of war in June, 1941, is quite dwarfed and overshadowed by what happened here in the ten months following.

From "An Atlas of the U. S. S. R." by Jasper H. Stenbridge. (Oxford University Press)

INDUSTRIAL RESOURCES OF THE U. S. S. R.

On July 3, eleven days after the Nazi invasion, in his celebrated "scorched-earth" speech, Stalin declared: "To the enemy must not be left a single engine, a single railway car, a single pound of grain or gallon of fuel." That meant the evacuation of rolling stock, cattle, grain—everything usually deemed movable—and the dynamiting of mills and factories. That is what people in the outside world thought. And that is what the Soviets intended them—especially the Germans—to think. Only in October, 1941, when the economic experts came to the Three-Power Conference in Moscow was the full intent of Stalin's speech revealed.

The visitors found that scores of plants in the Nazi-occupied regions, instead of being blown up, had been uprooted from their foundations, loaded on trains, and, along with their workers, shipped a thousand miles or more into the east, where they were in full operation. While the Red Army slowly retreated before the advancing Nazis, keeping its forces intact, the industrial army of the nation, with the same skill, made a parallel retreat, keeping its forces and equipment intact. Night and day the trains moved east, laden with the turbines of the Dnieper dam, the stamp mills, the forges and presses of Kerch, the textile looms of Mozhaik.

For the evacuation of a single plant, the Kirov Works on the Neva, thousands of cars were required. An armament works like Krupp or Skoda, it covered 400 acres, with 40,000 employees, 9 rolling mills, 15 open hearths and electric steel furnaces, 310 forges, 420 heating furnaces, 3,500 metal-working lathes. Most of this was loaded directly upon long strings of flat cars backed into the shops and some days later was unloaded at its new home in the Urals.

The same feat was repeated with the giant tractor works of Kharkov, the farm-implement plants of Rostov, the aircraft factories of Moscow and Taganrog. Along with the giant plants from the big centers were evacuated hundreds of others from smaller cities and towns. And accompanying them on the long trek to the east went millions of workers with their families, engineers and directors, technical schools with teachers and apprentices. The speed of their removal was equaled by the speed with which they were put into action again. A few months, sometimes a few weeks, after they arrived in their new homes, their output was as high as in their original locations and in many cases actually higher than it had been before.

To grasp the scope and significance of this unique exodus, transfer the scene to America. Imagine Nazi armies, already in control of the Atlantic seaboard, steadily pushing into our industrial Middle West. To all centers is given the signal to move. Dismantle most of the big factories along the Ohio River and the Great Lakes, the plants of the Fisher Body in Cleveland, Wright Engine in Cincinnati, Martin Aircraft in Baltimore, the steel works of Pittsburgh and Youngstown. Add to them some hundreds of enterprises producing chemicals, rubber, textiles, shoes. Assemble the plant personnel—engineers, technicians, and workers—together with their families. Load all these people and plants upon trains—for in Russia motor trucks are scarce and good roads scarcer. Then, over the same railway lines on which two million soldiers with guns and munitions are moving east, ship this huge aggregation of machinery and men into states as far west as Colorado and Kansas. Set up the enterprises anew, adjusting them to existing supplies of water, fuel, and power or finding new ones. Then, when most of the able-bodied men have been drafted into the army and half the women are toiling in the fields, get them going full blast, and in a short time run their output up to their former level or beyond.

No wonder that the evacuation of Soviet industry was hailed abroad as stupendous, almost incredible. Hard put to explain it, commentators said that Russians are always doing strange, inexplicable, mysterious things, and this was just one more of them. Without doubt it was a remarkable feat. A little investigation, however, reveals nothing very mysterious or incredible about it.

The flight to the east was not an improvisation, a sudden, last-minute, desperate measure. It was carefully planned and prepared for long years in advance—in many cases down to the last detail. For example, machines, lathes, and forges, instead of being imbedded in concrete, were bolted on to timbers. When the time came, they did not have to be torn away but simply unbolted and lifted from their bases. Similar ingenious devices facilitated their reestablishment in their new homes. In some cases they had simply to be set up in new buildings awaiting them—the so-called "shadow plants," complete in everything but the machinery. When the machines from the old plants arrived at their destination, they were lifted from the cars and set on the foundations prepared for them. In many cases they actually worked better than in their old homes, thanks to better planning of new shops, the rationalization of processes, the introduction of later models.

If there was a duplicate factory, the area of the "double" in the Urals was expanded, and the two enterprises were merged into a single big unit. Other factories, like orphans, came to their journey's end with no place to shelter them. Often in the trains that brought them were flat cars with building materials and lumber. With these, and the stone, lime, and fire clay that abound in the Urals, a new structure was soon under way. Meanwhile, on the chosen site, the machines were often set up in the open air, and while belts whirled, forges blazed, trip hammers pounded, on either side rose the walls and roof that would protect them from the autumn rains and winter snow.

And they rose quickly, in as many days or weeks as months were needed in time of peace. In construction, as in most other fields, all previous records were broken, thanks to the mobilization of the best brains and energies available for this resettlement of industry in the east. The ablest engineers, architects, and draftsmen in the country, among them Iofan, designer of the Palace of the Soviets, contributed their best efforts; as did the leading geologists and scientists for locating new resources, headed by the academician Fersman, and the veteran transport workers, directed by Kaganovich. The railroads were compelled to double and triple the already dense traffic.

In the coordination of all these forces, spurred on to the utmost endeavor by the urgency of the situation, and in their application to very carefully thought-out plans lies the explanation of the success of the evacuation. But this, of course, does not explain it away. It remains a stupendous national achievement—to the United Nations a cause of marvel and rejoicing, to Hitler a source of bitter disappointment.

In Hitler's plans these Soviet mills, factories, and arsenals, as in France, were slated to be a part of the war economy of the Reich. But just as they came within his grasp, either they blew up like the Dnieper Dam or they slipped through his fingers. Before the Nazis advancing across the land, one by one like gigantic grasshoppers they leaped up and took flight a thousand miles into the east. From this safe vantage ground they at once set to work again, turning out projectiles, planes and tanks—how much no outsider exactly knows.

Before the war this new industrial region in the Urals and beyond accounted for about a sixth of the Soviet output, a fourth of its coal and iron. Now, augmented by the arrival of these evacuated plants, its output probably amounts to a third, a half, or even more. One thing, however, is certain. The new plants and workers will for the most part never return to their former homes in the west. Added to the old enterprises, these new centers and hundreds of others in the making, constitute a solid base for that great civilized state which Lenin in his vision of twenty-five years ago, saw rising in this hinterland.

A mighty factor in the war, it will be equally powerful in the years following. In the event of a bad peace, it will continue to function as a colossal arsenal, backing the Soviets in the game of power politics. If the peace is a good one, bringing security to all nations, this new industrial empire will be a vital factor in building up a good life, not only in the Soviets but in all the lands of the East.

The "New Poor"

A NEWLY arrived English friend said to me the other day: "You simply cannot conceive the contrast between the ease and comfort and color of life here and the inconvenience and drabness of life in London. Everything there is shabby and run-down. We get enough to eat, it is true, but the diet is monotonous in the extreme, and our houses are colder even than we like. Most of us cannot afford modest comforts, let alone luxuries, and if we could we would probably be unable to buy what we wanted. Traveling is a nightmare of discomfort. And after the completeness of our blackout, New York in the dim-out looks positively radiant."

It was just after this talk that I sat down to read a series of articles on the tribulations of the "new poor" which have been appearing in the Wall Street Journal, and perhaps my mood was less sympathetic than it should have been. At any rate, I was able to restrain my tears while considering the cruel problem of "Mr. R," a Middle Western executive who cannot figure out how to make ends meet next year when his income will be considerably stunted by the $25,000 salary ceiling. As president of a big corporation, Mr. R has been receiving a salary of $95,000 and in addition an unspecified amount in dividends, but as he explained to the writer of the article, this wasn't so much, in view of the expenses involved. His position requires that he maintain a "front," including an imposing home where he can entertain lavishly and "several high-priced automobiles."

If, as one has been led to believe, there is only one "front" which it is essential to maintain in war time, it would seem that Mr. R can easily reduce the strain on his pocket-book, his digestion, and his country's supply of man-power by cutting out business entertaining for the duration. Probably his company is solely or largely engaged in filling government contracts, and lavish hospitality to government procurement officers is, or ought to be, unnecessary. But even if his business is confined to civilian goods, he must be enjoying a sellers' market which should obviate the need for reducing prospective customers to a state of alcoholic receptivity.

Mr. A, another example of the "new poor" (1941 salary, $100,000 plus), finds in fact that the simple life is being forced upon him by the fuel-oil shortage and the difficulty of retaining domestic help. So he and his wife are going to squeeze into a wing of his large Detroit home and hope to keep "two or three servants insulated from the siren song of the war factories." By means of such economies and with the aid of a substantial income from investments, Mr. A hopes he can worry along.

I have an idea that should these tales of woe reach the ears of Messrs. R and A's opposite numbers in Britain, they would not inspire much sympathy. There is no ceiling on salaries in Britain, but a more steeply graduated system of taxation than our own has left only a handful of persons with an income exceeding $25,000. Here a man with an income of $67,000 has $25,000 left after paying taxes; there a gross income of $400,000 shrinks to $23,000 after the Exchequer has received its cut. Most country houses in England have been handed over to the government for the duration for use as evacuation centers, hospitals, barracks, and so on. And the domestic servant, once far more often a feature of the English than of the American home, is almost an extinct species.

It would seem, therefore, that our better-paid executives are not being asked to accept an exceptionally austere war-time standard. On the other hand, the $25,000 salary ceiling is certainly open to criticism, primarily on the ground that it discriminates unfairly between earned and unearned incomes. The distinction between these two categories in the upper ranks of the business world is of course sometimes obscure, but this fact will increase the inequity by providing a loophole for executives who also own the whole or a large share of their business. They will be able to cut their salaries and make up the difference in dividends.

According to the Wall Street Journal, the storm of protests that the ceiling scheme has aroused is due to the widespread suspicion that it is intended as a permanent social reform. If, it suggests, the same objective had been approached by way of increased surtaxes, there would have been no such outburst of disapproval. As to this, remembering the attitude of the Wall Street Journal toward higher taxes for the upper brackets, I keep my fingers crossed, but I hope Congress will take the tip and by employing taxation to limit all net incomes to $25,000 will remove the occasion for a ceiling on salaries.

It is perfectly true that such a measure would not yield an impressive amount of new revenue in relation to total war expenditures. Nevertheless, in a period when the whole national scale of living is in process of being radically reduced, we must cut the superfluities of the few before we bear too hard on the necessities of the many. Any other course would have a shattering effect on morale. Those swollen pay envelopes we hear so much about mean in many cases that a very modest standard of comfort has replaced bare subsistence. And not always that, for too many war workers are discovering that even good wages cannot buy decent housing for their families.

Taxes are beginning to weigh heavily on the wage-earners in the low brackets, and the burden will have to be increased further. They will take it, but only if they are assured that their bosses are making at least faintly equivalent sacrifices.

UNTIL A FEW WEEKS AGO a writer who called himself Paul Toal was working at the German desk of the New York branch of the Office of War Information. His real name is Paul von Lillienfeld-Toal, and in 1934 he admitted before the McCormick-Dickstein committee that he was the liaison between William Dudley Pelley's Silver Shirts and the National Socialist Party in Germany. His past came to light last month, and he was dropped from the pay roll.

ANOTHER IMPROVEMENT at the O. W. I. is a teletype service which will answer Nazi lies and distortions as soon as they come over the short-wave. Hitherto the German stories have appeared in the newspapers pretty much as they were received, though attributed of course to Axis propaganda sources. From now on, however, they will be analyzed by O. W. I. experts a few minutes after they appear, and comments will be immediately teletyped to the press services.

FRED C. KELLY, the father of the gossip column, has founded the League to Enforce Monkey Business on the Radio. As Acting Temporary Emergency Secretary of the League, he has dispatched hundreds of postcards urging radio listeners "to compel news announcers to quit calling New York 'New York' and to refer to it as 'our nation's metropolis.'" They never call Washington anything but "our nation's capital," says Mr. Kelly, or the President anything but "the Chief Executive."

AIR-RAID WARDENS are being unionized in Great Britain. Full-time A. R. P. workers have already received two pay raises, won through the intervention of the Trades Union Congress.

A MAKE-UP MAN'S FANTASY is page 14 of PM's Sunday Picture News for November 15. Column One, under the head "Good Writing," is a condensation of a solemn and eloquent letter by Dr. Edouard Heimann, which first appeared in this magazine, to the effect that only "under God" can "this nation . . . have a new birth of freedom." The rest of the page is devoted to a lush full-length portrait of Dorothy Bigby, showgirl of the "Star and Garter" cast, clad only in brassière and bespangled G-string.

"HELL LOCATED" is the title of a series of lectures now being delivered throughout the country by Robert L. Boothby, an itinerant evangelist. In an advertisement in the Washington Star Mr. Boothby promises to tell "just where hell is; how many are in hell now; whether hell will ever burn out; whether the fire burns the meanness out of people, or if they go on burning forever; whether it can be seen through a telescope."

Sidelights on North Africa

Goebbels in a Jam

FOR the guardians of German morale the invasion of Africa brought on the worst crisis they have yet been through. Not only was it evidence that the enemy too was capable of waging a Blitzkrieg, hitherto considered a German monopoly, but it demolished with one stroke the propaganda "line" that had been followed for the past several months.

Ever since the deadlock in Russia confidence in victory had been distilled out of the shipping situation. The argument ran as follows: The overseas powers can do nothing to us because they have lost so many ships and are losing more every day. Even if a real army should be built up in America, which is not likely, it could not possibly be brought over to Europe. On the European continent we have everything we need, and not one of our enemies is capable of an offensive. Lack of ships prevents any attack on us from overseas.

There we find the defensive theory of victory of the last few months in a nutshell.

With the appearance of a great American army in Africa the whole theory collapsed. Here was clear proof that the enemy had enough ships to transport a large force across the ocean. During several days the confusion of the Berlin morale strategists was complete.

For the first two days they attempted to belittle the whole affair. North Africa, they said, is a distant waste land which does not concern Germany. That the Anglo-Saxon powers were not ashamed to seize the territory of their former ally, in violation of all law, shows their maniacal greed, their "imperialism." Roosevelt was referred to with especial venom as the "scamp" (Strolch) or "scamp-in-chief" (Oberstrolch).

On the third day this line was abandoned. "We must revise our judgment," said the radio voice. From then on it was no longer a question of a trifling hold-up and robbery on the periphery of Germany's interest. With a bold leap the propaganda heads again sought comfort in the tonnage stringency. The overseas powers had pounced on Africa in a mad attempt to make the Mediterranean safe for their shipping. For they were so desperately short of tonnage that they could no longer use the route around the Cape of Good Hope. That took too long. The strangle-hold of the German U-boats had forced them to make a convulsive effort to open up a shorter route which could be served with fewer ships. Thus an act of the Allies which proved that they had enough ships to transport an army was twisted into proof that their lack of ships was catastrophic. "It shows to what a pass in respect to shipping England and America have been reduced," exulted the star radio commentator Hans Fritzsche.

But the public could not swallow this absurd inconsistency; and on the fifth day the subject of shipping was dropped and a new idea introduced. The undertaking in Africa, it was now said, was the overture to an intended invasion of southern France. The walls of the "European fortress" which Hitler had constructed had "one weak point—southern France." The French, "poorly armed and politically and psychologically backward," could not offer an adequate defense. Therein lay the last chance of the Anglo-Saxons. At Marseilles and Toulon and Nice they hoped to breach the fortress. But they had laid their plans in vain. The Führer "made a lightning decision to defend Europe." With a "magnificent gesture of European solidarity," he came to France's rescue, sent his divisions to its southern coast, and saved it from assault. And thus the last weak spot in the ring of armor around the Continent was made strong. "Now Europe has become an absolutely impregnable fortress. Indeed, through this development good has come out of that scamp Roosevelt's evil purpose."

After three false starts, this was the aspect in which events in Africa were finally presented to the German people. Africa, namely, is a matter of indifference to Germany. We Germans are interested only in Europe, the fortress of Europe. The enemy tried to break in through the last remaining gap in its walls but was repulsed with great loss. The fortress stands more impregnable than ever.

After five days of confusion the general staff on morale had fallen back on what was perhaps the best position it could have chosen, though the allusion to European solidarity could have deceived no one. Most Germans learned long ago from their relatives in the army, if not from other sources, how much solidarity the conquered nations feel. But that is a side issue. The central question for Germans is: Can the European fortress be breached? After the African performance uncertainty on this point must have increased sharply. Germans are not children in military matters. They understand perfectly that it makes quite a difference whether the American military machine is 3,500 miles from the edge of Europe or suddenly only 400 miles away.

The minority which wants an invasion has had its hopes strengthened, but we must not imagine that this minority is anything but very small. In contrast to the Italians, most of whom, it is thought, would welcome invasion, the majority of Germans have their hearts set on victory. The slogan of Europe's invincibility is in harmony with their desires and will therefore be believed, in spite of undercurrents of doubt, for some time yet. Probably until it is disproved by deeds and events.

ARGUS

Martinique and Vichy

IN ADDITION to the authority given to Admiral Darlan by our representatives in North Africa, we have in our own back yard another hangover of the old Vichy appeasement policy. The radio transmitters on the islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe continue to spew forth their pro-Axis poison, not only to the French Antilles, French Guiana, and Frenchmen on the American continent, but also to Haiti.

For half a year the State and Navy departments have been carrying on mysterious negotiations with Admiral Georges Robert, Governor General of the French Antilles and Guiana. (This pro-Pétain stalwart has in his possession half a dozen warships, a naval base, a hundred fighting planes, and a quarter-billion dollars in gold, cached there when France fell.) The invasion of North Africa and the ending of relations with Vichy might have been expected to put a stop to such by-play. But on November 9 Secretary Hull said that the North African campaign did not change the status of French possessions in this hemisphere.

Now, our policy toward the French Antilles is said by the State Department to depend on the "effectiveness with which the [local French] authorities endeavor to protect their territories from domination and control by the enemy." Therefore the reaction of Admiral Robert's radio transmitters to the North African campaign is significant. A fragment of the record follows, as monitored by the Federal Communications Commission:

On November 11 Admiral Robert responded to Secretary Hull's assurances by saying over the Martinique radio, "No matter what course events take, the Marshal is still our leader—the symbol of French unity and faith in the destiny of the nation. . . ." On November 12 these amazing statements appeared in a gloomy broadcast of the Martinique Central Information Bureau, the official voice of Admiral Robert's government: "Neither France nor her empire will be returned to us. . . . France has been invaded by Germans, our colonies by the British and Americans. . . . Foreigners have taken everything. All of them flood us with promises of restitution. All of them promise to defend us. All of them love us." The broadcast continued along the Nazi-Pétain line of self-flagellation: "We believed in reconstruction. But you cannot reconstruct what is rotten. . . . Twenty years of politics deteriorated the French soul. . . . We chose the way of collapse. . . . Today there is no France, there is no empire, soon there will be no Frenchmen."

But the Martinique radio went even farther as the North African offensive developed. On November 12 it broadcast an "announcement to the crews and officers of the merchant vessels now on the high seas or in the Mediterranean: 'Turn back immediately to a French port in the Mediterranean or in Corsica. London is inviting you to commit treason. Do not let yourself be deceived. Your duty is clear. Marshal Pétain demands that you return to French ports and continue to serve France.' " On November 16 both the Martinique and Guadeloupe radios transmitted in full Pétain's declaration forbidding General Giraud to act in his name. Coming from Vichy, these messages might have been blamed on the Germans who have taken over that radio; in Martinique Admiral Robert must bear full responsibility.

Spain's "Neutrality"

IT SEEMS to be the unanimous conclusion of various press services and unidentified "reliable European sources" that Generalissimo Francisco Franco has suddenly veered toward neutrality since the occupation of French North Africa. But the evidence from European short- and medium-wave broadcasts in the first week of the campaign points in exactly the opposite direction.

The broadcasts, as made available by the Office of War Information, show two things clearly: first, that the Axis is putting pressure on Spain, possibly to assure its cooperation in any counter-attack which the Nazis may decide to make by way of Spain and Spanish Morocco; second, that Spanish domestic propaganda, scrupulously neutral during the first three days of the occupation, swung back toward the Axis line when German troops took up stations along the entire Pyrenees frontier.

Direct Nazi radio pressure on Spain has consisted largely of propaganda to turn the people against the United Nations. There have also been implied promises that Spanish ambitions to annex French Morocco and Algeria might best be realized by collaboration with the Nazis. Indirect pressure has been exerted in broadcasts to other nations designed to swing United Nations opinion away from Franco. Berlin Transocean reported in English Morse code, for use in American and British papers, as early as November 8 that there was great tension in Spain and that the "war undoubtedly is closer now to Spain." The Nazis told France the next day that "Spanish public opinion in general feels that the Anglo-American guaranty . . . is an insufficient safeguard of Spanish national independence." A whole barrage of items came over the Axis radio from Berlin to Tokyo telling of military preparations in Tangier and Spanish Morocco and of conferences between Franco and his Cabinet and Portuguese, Vichy, and Spanish Moroccan officials.

Spain's first radio reaction to the Allied offensive was to give favorable publicity to the American and British notes to Franco. Late on November 10, however, a Phalangist broadcast from Valladolid on a domestic network said: "Never in the whole course of the war has there been such an extraordinary example of cold calculation. . . . The Axis General Staff, as always, has its plans scrupulously worked out, and at the right time Roosevelt will learn the answer of Europe's defenders."

Mihailovich and the Partisans

BY RALPH BATES

THE fact that the Yugoslavs were the first to revolt and are still the only people among the so-called conquered nations to wage organized war against the Axis makes recent events in that country doubly tragic. Fighting has broken out between the two main sections of the movement of liberation, with the result that not only has Yugoslav liberty been placed in dire peril, but Axis troops, thereby disengaged, have been released for the Russian front. Though the problem is primarily one for the Yugoslav people, it is not exclusively theirs. The United Nations have before them the lesson of Spain, through whose defeat—largely due to the negligence of world democracy—the entire democratic world suffered disaster.

That minor difficulties had arisen between the partisan battalions and the regular forces organized around General Mihailovich, we knew as long ago as March of this year, but it was not until July, when the controversy between the two wings was aired in the press, that we learned how grave the matter had become. On July 18 it was reported from Ankara that General Mihailovich had launched a campaign against "Communist" partisans accused of banditry and pillage in reconquered territories. A few days later it was announced that the General had previously made inquiries in Moscow and, having been assured of the Soviet government's lack of interest had begun to repress the "criminal" bands. Mihailovich was specifically named as the authority exercising repression. It should be pointed out, however, that had the partisans been mere criminals, or had they been acting in defiance of law, General Mihailovich would hardly have needed to consult Moscow. The inference is clear. The partisans were not criminals, and a political principle was involved.

Almost simultaneously we learned from an Istanbul cable transmitted by Inter-Continent News and published in the New York Daily Worker that a small conference of Yugoslav patriots, meeting in Istanbul, had accused Mihailovich of treasonable collaboration with the Axis. From other sources it was learned that Mihailovich troops had not only attacked partisan battalions but had carried out reprisals against the villages and valleys that provided the peasant volunteers with their bases. Incidentally, it should be said that the fact that Inter-Continent News and the Daily Worker are the sources of this report may be taken as proof that Moscow is very far from being uninterested in the fate of the partisans—but does not wish to make a diplomatic issue of the matter.

Pertinax, the French commentator, next took up the matter, declaring in the New York Times (July 31) that Mihailovich objects to "roving bands of Communists" because they and he do not see eye to eye about the use of sabotage in anti-Axis warfare. A few days later the well-informed and discreet London correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor said that while the partisans are not Communists, "they are certainly left wingers." Four days later the New York Times correspondent in Ankara, Ray Brock, in an extremely misleading cable, reported that Mihailovich had driven the "Communist partisans" out of Montenegro. At the same time, staggering those who had been following events closely, he credited the General with the bitter anti-Axis campaigns which the partisans were waging.

That a quite considerable civil war was going on became clearly apparent when the New York Times (October 5) published another Ankara cable denouncing the Daily Worker's charge—originally made by the Istanbul conference—as false and preposterous propaganda "aimed at creating disunity among the fighting Yugoslavs." Mihailovich, the dispatch asserted, at the head of 160,000 men and women, had been waging a six months' battle "against 30,000 partisans, whose ranks include scores of criminals, renegades, bandits, and dissident Croats and Moslems."

DARLANISM

A Balkan minister to Vichy who used to boast at Geneva of his liberal ideas and his passion for collective security was asked some six months ago how he could justify his support of Hitler. He answered: "If I am against Hitler and he wins, I will be shot. If I am for Hitler and he loses, there will be time enough to come over to the other side. I will be accepted. I have nothing to lose by being for Hitler."

By October 9 we see a new slant given to the anti-partisan propaganda. According to a Washington story appearing in the New York Times, it is no longer Mihailovich who is repressing the "Communists" but the people themselves, who in "spontaneous uprising" have killed "thousands of partisans." Evidently the General, the official servant of a government in formal relations with Soviet Russia, cannot be allowed to take the responsibility. No issue is said to be involved between the Yugoslav government and the Soviet Union. But Moscow now begins to defend the partisans by issuing news releases, picked up from the partisan-controlled Free Yugoslavia radio, about their anti-Axis activities.

The discerning eye will perceive the main outline of the problem in these confused reports. What is going on in Yugoslavia is a struggle for political power within the recreated nation. That struggle was initiated by General Mihailovich, who for some months has done little fighting against the Axis. The General's apparent intention, and the royal government's, is to preserve as large an army as possible in order to control the country when the Axis has been finally overthrown by the major forces of democracy. The natural result of the General's inactivity is that his forces, which at their peak numbered perhaps 120,000, have already begun to dwindle, large numbers of them—the "renegades" of the October 5 cable—having transferred themselves to the vigorously combatant partisans. As for another charge that has been made against the partisans, it is certainly true that a few of them are not Yugoslavs. This, surely, is one of their greatest glories, that men of conquered lands—Hungary, Rumania, Greece, and Czecho-Slovakia—hungering for vengeance and liberty, should have made their way to the village committees which organize the partisan battalions and there have found arms and comrades-in-arms.

But while Mihailovich is far from blameless, the charge that he acts in calculated collusion with Nedic, the Serbian Quisling, is certainly unfounded. Many Yugoslavs to whom cooperation with the Communists seems perfectly natural resent this attack upon a man who, however great his political folly, was the first to rise up against the enemy. The report arose when Nedic and Mihailovich forces made simultaneous, though wholly separated, moves against the partisans.

Liberal supporters of the Yugoslav cause here and in Britain are of the opinion that one of the root causes of this strife is the political ignorance and inexperience of the General, who is a soldier, not a statesman. That may be so, but it is impossible to overlook the fact that the royal government-in-exile is in no sense a representative body, but consists largely of court nominees, military men, clericals, bureaucrats, individuals of the privileged classes, and old-time politicians of various nationalist schools. Though some of these conservatives are sincere patriots, the royal government has failed to show any understanding of the revolutionary nature of the war. And since an inactive front is a decomposing front, another cause of the civil strife is the United Nations' early failure to provide Mihailovich with arms.

That Communists play an important part is agreed by competent sources. Their numbers are not great, but their vigor and discipline and in many cases their special experience have given them considerable influence. They have also served as a useful coordinating element in a land where the great diversity of parties and regionalist sentiment make good liaison very necessary. But it cannot be too strongly insisted that the presence of Communists in the partisan movement is not the real issue. The issue is the demand for a democratic administration made by a large section of the Yugoslav people-in-arms, a demand which is resented by the far-off royal government and its chief representative in Yugoslavia. On the other hand, the dropping of such demands would not remedy the situation. One fears that the royal government regrets the very existence of the peasant militias. But these forces are absolutely necessary if the fight against the Axis is to be waged in its fullest intensity.

There always remains the fact of pan-Slavism, with its deepening political significance. After patriotism it is the most powerful sentiment in Yugoslavia, but it is more or less frowned upon by the royal government, principally because of the social structure of the Soviet Union, but also because its growth might limit or qualify Yugoslav foreign policy in the post-war period. On the other hand, the Kremlin has been making pan-Slavist propaganda for a long time now, with the probable intention of organizing a Russian-Balkan "defensive bloc" after the war. But even if one finds Moscow's plans unacceptable, it is manifestly absurd to circumvent the danger by tactics like those of Mihailovich, which play directly into Axis hands. Reconstruction of the Yugoslav government-in-exile is long overdue. A firm recommendation from Washington would do much to persuade it to reform itself.

BOOKS and the ARTS

ON REREADING THE MODERN CLASSICS

BY JUSTIN O'BRIEN

IT HAS been said that the classics of only yesterday do not bear rereading, that the reprint editions are designed for the very young or for those otherwise prevented from reading the "masterpieces" of twenty years ago when they appeared. But of three such books I have recently reread, two stood the test; if that is an average, it is not a bad one. Probably it is quite fortuitous that those two books were French novels, André Gide's "Counterfeiters" and Proust's "Remembrance of Things Past." The other was "Point Counter Point" by Aldous Huxley.

This is neither the moment nor the place to attempt to reevaluate Proust's work. For years it has suffered from the shortsighted attacks of the socially conscious critics, blinded by its almost exclusive preoccupation with aristocratic society to the bitterly ironic view it takes of that society.

Proust revisited still charms: his vision of the world is still new, and Combray and Paris and Balbec live in even fuller detail than on the first reading. The poet who sees and creates by metaphor becomes more apparent, as does the classic observer of men's foibles, and when I was not admiring the universality of the maxims and reflections in the manner of La Rochefoucauld I found myself pausing on almost every page to savor the beauty and variety of the imagery. Time only helps the Baudelaire and the La Bruyère in Proust to emerge.

Gide claims that he writes to be reread, hoping to win his case on appeal. What stupid things we have all said of him on a single reading! No one should ever talk about Gide—in print at any rate—without having read all of his major works at least twice. "The Counterfeiters" bears a third and fourth reading even better than it does a second. The ideal is to approach it afresh after a lapse of a few years, with the action still fairly clear in one's mind and the characters still answering to their names. Then the multiplicity of plots and the corresponding abundance of characters—à la Dostoevski—cease to be elements of confusion, and one can fully appreciate the art of the novelist. Then only does one see, in spite of Gide's explicit desire never to take advantage in one chapter of the impetus carried over from the preceding chapter, the subtle balance of chapter against chapter and incident against incident. One comes to understand the role of such characters as La Pérouse, Armand, Sarah—half-effaced by their more dazzling neighbors. And finally, through the confusion caused by the initial critics back in 1926 who disagreed as to the primary subject of the novel, Gide's purpose becomes clear. "The Counterfeiters" gives, first of all, a picture of the struggle between the generations: this is the reason for the introduction of little Gontran de Passavant, of the many members of the Vedel family, and of the old musician's misunderstandings with his son and grandson.

This is why Edouard, who belongs by age to one generation and by temperament to the next, stands at the center of the action. But "The Counterfeiters" is also the story of a novel's creation in its author's mind, the very novel we are reading, in fact. And since the one subject is a story of flux—the decaying of one generation and the growing up of another—what is more appropriate than that the novel itself should be in a state of becoming? Beneath this double subject lies the conflict between reality and its representation, its counterfeit, both in social life and in art.

For full enjoyment—let it be said at the risk of making Gide appear discouragingly difficult and thus incurring the just rebuke which Joseph Wood Krutch addressed in these pages to modern criticism—the rereader of "The Counterfeiters" should also read both the little daybook kept by Gide during the composition of the novel and certain pages of Gide's own diary of the last fifty years, both as yet untranslated. Those supplementary texts will greatly enlighten him as to the novelist's problems and will correct any false impressions he may have formed from identifying Edouard too closely with Gide. In the diary, for instance, he will find under the date of August, 1893—Gide was then not quite twenty-four—this significant note:

I wanted to suggest in the "Tentative amoureuse" the influence of the book on the one who is writing it, and during that very writing. . . . In a work of art I like to find, transposed into the scale of the characters, the very subject of that work. Nothing throws a better light upon the work or more solidly establishes the proportions of the whole. For example, in certain paintings by Memling or Quentin Metsys a little mirror reflects the interior of the room in which the painted scene is taking place. Likewise in Velasquez's painting of the Meníñes—but somewhat differently. And in literature, the dumb show in "Hamlet" and in many other plays. In "Wilhelm Meister" the marionette scene. In "The Fall of the House of Usher" the story read to Roderick. But none of these examples is just what I want. What would give a better idea of what I attempted in my "Cahiers," in my "Narcisse," and in the "Tentative" is a comparison with the device of heraldry which consists in setting in the escutcheon a smaller replica en abyme.

This composition en abyme, which like the triple mirrors at the tailor's opens a staggering abyss before our eyes, has preoccupied André Gide from the first; in addition to the very early works he mentions, he has used it in "Paludes," in the "Caves du Vatican," and most effectively in "The Counterfeiters"—where the novelist within his novel is himself writing a novel with a novelist as the central character.

Huxley does much the same thing. And his novelist, Philip Quarles, sees this form of composition in terms of the Quaker holding a box of oats pictured on the Quaker Oats box. This is why the rereader of "The Counterfeiters" should also read "Point Counter Point" if only to enhance his admiration for Gide's achievement. Despite Ruth Temple's easy dismissal of Gide in her very full study of Huxley's debt to France (Revue de Littérature Comparée, January, 1939), Huxley's best novel is directly inspired by, not to say frankly imitative of, Gide's. Nor is his use of the novel within the novel at all effective. Unlike Edouard, Quarles does not stand at the very center of the action. Out in India at the beginning of the novel, he never catches up with events, knowing nothing directly of Burlap's seduction of Beatrice, of his father's affair with Gladys, of the satanic evolution going on within the Baudelairean Spandrell, or even of Walter Bidlake's abandoning of Marjorie for Lucy, which is to figure in his novel.

To be successful, the novelist used thus as a character must be a meeting-point for all the currents—a fuse box, as Edouard is—and hence preserve the real author from the necessity of omniscience. Gide can afford to let his creatures get out of hand, even—in the eighteenth-century English manner—to interject ironic comments on their antics. But Huxley, who has hurriedly seized upon an original discovery and badly used it, must maintain the Olympian attitude of the traditional novelist. Like his prototype Edouard, Quarles keeps a notebook, but, unlike Edouard's, his jottings neither advance the story nor reproduce from another angle events already related in the form of action or conversation. Quarles's notebook most often serves simply as an excuse for the essayist to elaborate ideas set forth by Rampion. Just as Gide did, Huxley wants to seize all the layers of reality—"multiplicity of eyes and multiplicity of aspects seen." Nevertheless, he attempts only rarely, and then quite mechanically, to view the same problem or event through different eyes, as, for instance, when Webley's fascist speech is reported directly by the author, described in terms of Elinor's emotions, and noted by Quarles in one of his little essays.

Gide, who calls for the reader's collaboration and expects him to remember what he has read, is a master of indirection. As in life, his characters often remain ignorant of details that appear clear to us outsiders, but Gide has permitted us to make the deduction ourselves. When Olivier becomes enthusiastic over Passavant's knowledge of marine biology, we know that the latter has simply handed on facts he had learned from Olivier's brother Vincent. Likewise, the moment we learn of Strouvillhou's sojourn at Saas-Fee we guess the source of Bernard's counterfeit coin. But even when Huxley has a chance to let the reader add two and two, he steps in and shouts the answer—as when Molly d'Exergillod thinks Elinor a fool for not noticing how much Philip is attracted to Molly. Forgetting that the preceding chapter has told us how Elinor regularly pushed her husband into other women's arms to humanize him, Huxley tells us all over again.

Does Huxley really forget? On the contrary, it would seem deliberate, this unwillingness to permit the reader that little thrill of recognition akin to creation. Like the old-fashioned school teacher, Huxley must always show himself more intelligent than his readers, and this he does by always being painfully explicit. In consequence his novel is repetitive, wordy even.

Even Huxley's contrapuntal composition ("All you need is a sufficiency of characters and parallel contrapuntal plots") comes directly from Gide, whose Edouard claims that he wants to write a novel based on Bach's "Art of the Fugue." Indeed, many of the characters and the situations they find themselves in have their parallels in "The Counterfeiters." In addition to the Quarles-Edouard parallel, Lucy Tantomount corresponds to Lady Griffith, Walter Bidlake to Vincent Molinier, Marjorie Carling to Laura Vedel, Spandrell to Strouvillhou, John Bidlake to La Pérouse, Burlap to Passavant, and so on. Finally, both novels—which opened with a family "scene" and with the novelist character traveling to the point of action—close with scenes of violence abruptly related in the Dostoevskian manner. With a similar group of characters Gide depicts the decay of the bourgeois family; Huxley, a society that is rotten to the core. But in Gide's novel, so much of which deals with the young who are aiding the dissolution of their families, there is hope in youth. Huxley's world shows no element of hope.

Both works have frequently been classified as immoral. A moralistic and myopic critic early called "The Counterfeiters," the novel of uranism and onanism; "Point Counter Point" offers a society in heat in which adultery is the normal practice. In Gide's work there is a greater dosage of positive evil, creative evil—which Gide would attribute to the collaboration of the demon—whereas Huxley's world from Burlap to Spandrell is shoddily immoral. But as for the immorality that lies in the attitude of the author, and which D. H. Lawrence particularly castigated in "Point Counter Point," no comparison is possible.

In his diary for March 18, 1931, Gide recorded:

For the third time I gather my strength to read "Point Counter Point," for I have been told that you must get beyond the beginning. But what can I think of a book whose first seventy pages I read attentively without finding a single line rather firmly drawn, a single personal thought, emotion, or sensation—not the slightest bait for the heart or the mind which might invite me to continue?

And later that day he drops the book definitively at the 115th page. Imitation may be the sincerest form of flattery, but André Gide has never been susceptible to flattery.

For a First Birthday

Hang at my hand as I write now
My small one whom the dogs follow
That, nuzzled in my stomach once,
Like lions at her laughter dance.

The roaring forties in the bed
Beat up disaster on her head,
And on the wall the calendar
Always enumerated war.

Thunder in the teacup and Prognostications in the sand
Menaced her amusement with
The abracadabra of death.

She who kisses prettier than
Two breezes meeting round a fan,

November 28, 1942

What shall she hold in her arms
But the catastrophes like lambs?

And when, among the temporal Ruins of her landscape shall
The giddygoat and the Cupid chase
All but Disney from the place?

On the rag of a single summer
She dried all tears of the future;
The vernal equinox was up her sleeve
When the winter made her grieve.

Happily the unhappy shall lie down
By her, and bounty be her own
Bubble: the hitherto inconsolable
Find solace at her first syllable.

The dove, in its code of coos,
Will carry abroad her good news:
That it was Love, and not
Law kept the Ark afloat.

For the desire, and the daughter,
And the dog chasing its tail
Renew all things in Nature,
And Nature renews it all.

I WUZ ROBBED

Fearless Reporter Battles Censors

BY GILBERT HIGHET

CAIRO, September 19. I am feeling quite sick. Stupidity infuriates me. Today I wrote out my broadcast for next Tuesday, and took it round to Captain Plinkett-Drax, the British censor. This is what I tried to say:

Britain is losing the war here in North Africa. The idiocy of her senior officers, the poverty of her equipment, the class-conscious, hidebound inadequacy of her social system, and the poor training of her troops make it virtually certain that Marshal Rommel will walk through the few battalions now struggling against him on the desert front. Behind the lines morale is low. I heard reports this morning that General Staff Headquarters is moving to Aden. The superior training, material, and will-power of the Afrika Korps make it look like a black day for the British Empire.

I was kept waiting for ten minutes, cooling my heels in Plinkett-Drax's outer office. Surely, I thought to myself, he realizes that his most important duty is to read and pass my broadcasts. What is wrong with these people? Can't they understand how much a broadcast like this will help the British war effort?

When at last I was admitted, I was amazed to find the censor looking coldly at my script as it lay there on his gold and ivory desk. He said: "Do you think it is right to use our radio to tell the world that we are losing the war?"

At once I was up in arms. I retorted: "Don't you see it will encourage the Americans to come in and save you?"

"I don't quite see how it will do that," he replied with deliberate obtuseness.

"Well, anyhow," I shouted, "it happens to be true."

Then he actually called me a liar, in his hateful clipped accent. At least, he said: "There are two sides to that question. It is possible that you are overestimating our weakness and the enemy's strength."

I was so furious that I picked up my script and stormed out of the office.

September 21. I have been ill for two days. The heat and worry of this place gets me down. I haven't been able to do more than two hours' work. I laid off at three today and ordered a drink in the Ritz bar.

It infuriates me to see smart British officers of military age stop working at seven o'clock and sit down lazily to have whiskey and soda in hotel lounges. Don't they know there's a war on?

September 22. Another brush with the British censors. I had written a wonderful script exposing the ghastly situation in Malta, and submitted it to the ineffable Plinkett-Drax. It said, and I quote:

The situation in Malta is critical. Of the last consignment of forty-eight Spitfires, only four remain airworthy. The others have been either shot out of the air or destroyed on the ground. The anti-aircraft defenses are woefully inadequate. If the Germans and Italians attack by sea with good air support, particularly on the northeastern sector where the safeguards against a landing are virtually nonexistent, there is grave danger that this bastion of the British Empire may fall. Most of this has come about by the stupidity of British officers and administrators.

I had never written better, for I felt the truth of every word as I put it down. What was my astonishment to hear Plinkett-Drax say that I was to be prohibited from reading it on the air. I told him: "Perhaps you don't understand. I am an American reporter. The people in America want to hear the truth. How can I give it to them through a smoke screen of censorship?"

He actually suggested that the broadcast might help the enemy. I was mad. I shouted: "You are accusing me of trying to help the fascists! You must be criminally crazy as well as just plain dumb. I'm not talking to the Axis. I'm talking to the people of America. Nobody listens to these broadcasts here. How could they possibly help the fascists?"

He muttered something about the Germans having listening-posts and picking up hints, but I paid no attention and stamped out.

I have such a terrible headache. I wired Bertha: "SWEETIEPIE LOVETHINKING BACKCOMING IMMINENTLY." Then I went out for the evening with Wun Lung. Wun Lung is an enchanting Eurasian girl, cultured and intelligent. To talk with her is like a cool bath after the heat and struggles of the day. She doesn't like the British either.

September 24. Astonished by a cable that arrived this morning. It read: "YOU HAVE BEEN AWARDED BIG MEDAL BY ETA BITA PI FRATERNITY OF REPORTERS FOR YOUR WONDERFUL STORY ON ABYSSINIAN EMPEROR." I remember taking the story down as some sissy-pants British liaison officer gave it to us. I thought for a minute I might write to thank him for giving me the material, but when I remembered his accent and his monocle, I decided not to. He was too conceited already.

I spent the evening talking to Wun Lung about my medal. I cabled Bertha too. Ah, how I long for her.

September 26. Another instance of the stupidity of censors. I just heard today that when the British were evacuating an advanced post in the desert, they absolutely refused to help the wretched Ababa tribesmen to escape. Of all the selfishness and shortsightedness! I wrote a stinging denunciation of the British for not loading these poor "natives" into their armored cars; but Plinkett-Drax made an issue of it, and I had to change my script at the last moment and talk about Rommel's supply lines.

He said it would discourage the natives. What nonsense! What abject nonsense!

September 27. Hot news today. I sat up in my bedroom all morning typing it out. It seems that the British war effort in the desert has been gravely impeded by the fifth-column work of Ababa tribesmen. For some reason I was not allowed to broadcast this either.

Why won't the British let me tell everyone about the Ababa tribesmen?

October 1. I spent four hours, from nine till one this morning, arguing with Plinkett-Drax about my next script. I noticed his desk was heaped with untidy papers. The trouble with these British officials is they are afraid of work. An American would have had those papers cleared off by 11 a. m.

I got no satisfaction out of him, despite all my efforts to be cooperative.

October 4. Rommel is still advancing. Everything is finished here. I am getting out. I cabled Bertha again: "HONEYBUN UPFIXING EXIT SOONEST."

I took my typewriter to a British store to get the capital "I" renewed, on Saturday afternoon. They told me it couldn't be done till Monday, because people stopped work on Sundays. What abject, nauseating nonsense! Don't they know there is a war on? I had to wait till Monday before I could write any letters or scripts, without my capital "I."

October 5. Today news came through of the fall of Singapore. The reason is obvious. The British never expected the Japs to attack them. This is because of their smug, aristocratic Eton-and-Harrow mentality. Democratic Americans would never make the mistake of not expecting the Japs to attack them.

October 6. I was surprised to hear that Captain Plinkett-Drax had been taken to hospital with a complete breakdown. The nurses said he kept raving about brownies that wouldn't let him attend to his work. The trouble with these British is, they are soft. I tried to cable an interpretative story on the general collapse of morale of which this is symptomatic, but was prevented by the usual eggbound asininity.

All the censors, except Plinkett-Drax, came down to see me off. I can't think why. They have never been so cooperative before. Perhaps they are beginning to realize the truth. Rommel will be in Cairo in ten days, I feel, and I want to get out to tell the world whose fault it is.

O boy! I could write a book!

Soliloquy

For Creative Artists in War Time Designed to Help Them Keep Up Their Morale.

It's up to us while the young are fighting
To keep up our music and art and writing;
It's for us to keep lighted God's timeless taper;
Freedom needs us to put words on paper.

All culture would end save for us creators;
To have us stop would delight dictators.
There is more to a war than just to win it;
Pleasant thought, and I hope that there's something in it.

Mann's Political Essays

ORDER OF THE DAY. By Thomas Mann. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

THOMAS MANN'S WORLD. By Joseph Gerard Brennan. Columbia University Press. $2.50.

IF THE collection of Thomas Mann's political essays had appeared alone, without the almost simultaneous publication of Mr. Brennan's excellent study of Mann's whole spiritual history, it might have been sufficient to accept the essays with grateful admiration for the noble proportions of Mann's thought, for the elevated and slightly tragic mood of his style, and for the depth of his understanding of the issues involved in the world crisis. Mr. Brennan's analysis of the development of Mann's thought, particularly of the tension between the artist and the exemplar of bourgeois respectability in Thomas Mann's novels, naturally prompt one to ask some more fundamental questions about the relation of Thomas Mann to German culture and the relation of German culture to Nazism.

Yet it may be well to begin more simply with the essays and to express the satisfaction which any sensitive reader must feel in reading Mann's moving defense of democratic civilization. Though some of the essays have been published before, the most important ones—particularly those written in Germany before Hitler came to power—are new to us. The first essay in the book, The German Republic, was delivered as a lecture in Berlin in 1923 and represents Mann's first explicit defense of democracy. He was obviously speaking to a hostile youthful audience, already deeply infected with the virus which would bring disaster to them, to Germany, and to the world. He responds to their jibes with the dignity of a patrician and a great humanist, and in the process of countering their hostility he expresses forebodings which have since been tragically justified. The whole chapter, and many subsequent ones, contain the vitality of living history and are more than the mere words of a wise man.

In all of his various appeals Mann is defending something more than democracy as a form of government against the rising tide of obscurantism, militarism, and mystic nationalism. He speaks as a protagonist of the common element in the classical and Christian tradition which has informed the culture of Europe for ages; and he seeks vainly to stem the tide of synthetic barbarism which the youth of Germany so pathetically regarded as the resurgence of German vitality.

It is not possible to do full justice to all the facets of Mann's thought in his polemic against Nazism. One may say, however, that no one has been able to express disgust for something loathsome with so nice and calculated a contempt. His essay on Hitler entitled A Brother, in which he measures the man as a perverted artist and perverse genius, is a perfect piece of irony.

Thus while one may hail Thomas Mann as the most authentic voice of the "true" Germany, as the most persuasive exponent of a culture to which Germany made as many significant contributions as any other Western nation, one may be pardoned if one detects in Mann's spiritual history some clues to the pathos of Germany's genius. He protests eloquently against the degradation of Nazism. He sees it as a perversion of the romantic tradition in German culture. Yet he is himself deeply indebted to the romantic tradition. He is quite right of course in not holding Schopenhauer or Nietzsche responsible for Nazism; and equally right in detecting a closer affinity between Wagner and Hitler, despite his own honest admiration for Wagner. Yet one wonders whether the Nazi dregs could be what they are if the best wine of German culture had not been what it was and had not been a little too heady. Mr. Brennan makes much of the tension which Mann felt and expressed between his tradition as a Bürger and his vocation as an artist, between the solidity, respectability, and conservatism of a scion of a patrician family and the freedom and creative irresponsibility of art. Yet it may be that the difficulty of German culture lay in an insufficient tension between characteristic bourgeois virtues and artistic feeling in the German middle class.

In other parts of the Western world the rise of the bourgeoisie was concomitant with the destruction of feudal traditions and loyalties and the establishment of political justice based upon careful rational discrimination. But for Mann and for Germany bürgerlich had other connotations. The point of Mann's original disavowal of politics in his Reflections of a Non-Political Man was that Germany was a land of music and not of politics. His preference for music as the highest art was prompted by his conviction that it expressed depth of feeling without the conscious intellectual discrimination other art forms demand. In his debate with the youth of Germany, after he had renounced his former indifference to politics and had come to the significant conclusion that an intelligent interest in politics was synonymous with concern for democratic politics, he states the position of those who oppose him thus: "Literature and art, I am told, romantic literature at least, German art, are they not dream, simplicity, feeling, or better yet temperament? Whatever have they to do with intellect, which like the republic is more the concern of sharp-witted Jews and to be disapproved of on patriotic grounds?" He refutes this position, which was once his own, and his whole volume of essays does handsome penance for his previously avowed indifference to politics. But they can scarcely hide the original mistake. It would be ungenerous to call attention to the mistake had it been unique rather than typical. It was not the mistake so much of a German artist who was in conflict with his middle-class traditions as the mistake of the German middle classes. They were informed by romantic traditions which might be universalist or nationalistic, individualistic or Völkisch, but which scorned the plodding, discriminating social and political disciplines which bore the fruit of political justice.

What would have become of democracy in the non-German world if only Rousseau and not John Locke had informed our tradition? It is significant that even after Mann espouses democracy he makes much of the similarity between the thought of the German romantic, Novalis, and our own romantic, Walt Whitman. Rousseau, Novalis, and Whitman may persuade us to love the people en masse, but more is required to save the people from themselves and each other.

In short, the tragedy of a non-democratic Germany slipping into the morass of tyranny and obscurantism which the democratic Thomas Mann tried so nobly and so futilely to avert may be partly explained, or is at least illumined, by the thought of the non-democratic and non-political Thomas Mann. The futility of his later efforts is, at any rate, partly determined by the typical, rather than unique, character of his early position.

It is necessary to make this indictment of German culture for the sake of refuting such indictments as those of Lord Vansittart, which attribute a congenital defect to German character. Nazism is not merely an accidental aberration in German life. But neither are its cruelties typical of German character. Nazi tyranny is the bitter fruit of a congenital political ineptness in German culture; and that ineptness is at least partly derived from the romantic tradition.

All this does not derogate from the stature of Thomas Mann. Only a very great man could rise to the height of his noble disavowal of Nazism and his humble and ironic recognition of Hitler as "a brother." Hitler is of course a brother to all of us, in so far as his movement explicitly avows certain evils which are implicit in the life of every nation. Yet it is not unfair to regard him as, in a special sense, the evil fruit of the German romantic movement. The greatness of that movement is not refuted by the fact that Nazism is really its fruit; but neither can the relation of the fruit to the tree be denied. The most tragic aspect of German culture is that it frequently illumined the ultimate issues of human existence more profoundly than any other culture. But meanwhile it scorned all the proximate issues. In a sense all Thomas Mann's arguments since his conversion to the importance of politics are a plea to the artist and the philosopher to deal with proximate as well as with ultimate issues of existence, lest failure at this point wipe out the ground upon which men stand when they concern themselves with the ultimate.

Life of Victor Hugo

VICTOR HUGO: A REALISTIC BIOGRAPHY OF THE GREAT ROMANTIC. By Matthew Josephson. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

ONE may wonder if a thoroughly realistic attitude provides the best possible approach to an impenitent romantic and visionary poet like Victor Hugo. The naturalistic talent of Zola was successfully analyzed by Mr. Josephson in a previous biography. The genius of Hugo, however, presents complexities and problems going far beyond the scope of a merely realistic critical process.

They cost $65,000,000 apiece—yet even battleships are expendable!

No naval war was ever fought without the loss of important ships. Not how vulnerable, but how useful, is the measure of a warship today. Here, in plain language, is the whole story of ships, guns, torpedoes, and bombers and their strategic functions in naval global war.

BASED on the actual results of sea warfare in World War II, A LAYMAN'S GUIDE TO NAVAL STRATEGY gives the layman an entirely new conception of naval war. Here is the answer to the question: "What have battleships done in this war but sink?"—and the answer will astonish you. The principles on which a navy operates, the tools and methods used, what actually happened in sea engagements from the sinking of the Graf Spee to our victory at Midway—here are facts which show that, in naval war, the wisest strategy is simply an intelligent choice of risks . . . all presented in plain everyday language.

Naval strategy—in plain language
A LAYMAN'S GUIDE TO NAVAL STRATEGY will add a world of meaning to every news story you read about the war at sea, yet there is nothing in it to confuse or mystify you. Only professionals can decide when and how our ships are to be used, but A LAYMAN'S GUIDE TO NAVAL STRATEGY makes it possible for anyone to understand why they are so used. Bernard Brodie, the author, is an engineer, artilleryman, political scientist, and the Historian of the Navy's Bureau of Ordnance. This is the most complete, most interesting book on naval strategy ever written for the people of a democracy at war.

Victor Hugo's mind received its first impressions from a world almost as tragically disjointed as our own. After the disastrous sacrifice of several generations of men on the battlefields of Europe, after two humiliating invasions of French soil by foreign armies, the youth of that day found themselves bewildered in the midst of a disintegrating social order, with nearly all support from respected past ideals irretrievably swept away. For almost two score years these victims of circumstance strove pathetically, groping their way out of a swamp of unending moral distress, sustained only in their efforts by a longing for some far-away dreamland of peace, for some harmonious, if utopian, solution of their perplexities.

Hugo himself went through all the devastating moral pangs of a lost, despairing generation, and he remained up to the very end a divided, anxious, and profoundly tormented soul. The incredibly rich, intense, variegated hues coloring the whole pattern of his life proceed, to a large extent, from the confused struggle of forces which disrupted all accepted values in France during the early part of his life. Hugo contrived eventually, it is true, somehow to attain a measure of outward balance and calm. His inner life, however, continued to be a center of storm where violently opposed elements constantly met and clashed. The poetical fulgurations which illumine all his work bear witness to the tremendous power and influence of his underlying mystic and emotional conflicts.

In presence of such a complex, enigmatic, tumultuous, often incoherent personality, the staid, realistic method used by Mr. Josephson appears inadequate. His casual, matter-of-fact account of outside events and his picturesque anecdotes do not convey at any time the impression of getting close to the soul of Hugo the man, still less of disembroiling the tangled skein of his emotions, aspirations, and moods.

In spite of the foregoing strictures, the present biography is not without serious merits. Mr. Josephson is evidently well acquainted with most of the scholarly works treating the various phases of his subject's life. Out of heavy, ponderous material he has made a fluent and extremely readable narrative. He does not, of course, go far beneath the surface, but the surface is easy, pleasant, and smooth. The reader's attention hardly ever flags, and, if at the end of the volume he has not succeeded in establishing a true contact with the great French poet, he has been, at least, entertained and amused.

Further, there is on the part of Mr. Josephson a most creditable attempt to deal with Hugo impartially and honestly. Hugo's fate at the hands of many modern critics has been, in this regard, extremely singular. During the last part of his life Hugo took a vigorous stand in favor of democratic ideas. These ideas aroused then, in certain French quarters, the most virulent antagonism. Soon it became almost a fashion among conservative critics to revile on every occasion the man who had identified himself completely with the cause they hated. Since many of these critics were truly outstanding in their own field, they succeeded in swinging a large part of public opinion to their side, and while conceding the value of Hugo as a writer, they managed to create against his person and his opinions a strong and lasting prejudice. Even an André Gide, after acknowledging that Victor Hugo was the greatest French poet, felt obliged to add apologetically "Alas!" Mr. Josephson has no ax to grind. No systematic disparagement, no undue glorification is to be found in his book; and it must be admitted that if the realistic method proves disappointing when it comes to puzzling out the intricacies of a poet's soul, it offers the advantage of insuring, on the part of a conscientious author like Mr. Josephson, an attitude of most commendable fairness and objectivity.

The only important blemish in Mr. Josephson's work is its factual inaccuracy. I am not referring to occasional slips, which would come out in rather large number if the book were passed through the fine comb of pedantic, meticulous criticism, but to very grave mistakes in the presentation of the nineteenth-century French historical background. Hugo's life was so closely associated with the political developments of his time that his biographer has, willy-nilly, also to delve into history. Mr. Josephson, who as a rule knows the facts of Hugo's life well, shows himself poorly informed when he attempts to place him in his environment. In particular, the pictures of the Second Republic, of the Roman question, and of the Second Empire present glaring errors which could have been avoided through simple research in easily accessible books of reference. The layman will of course never notice these many distortions, which come not from any discernible bias but from inadequate documentation. The integrity of the book, however, is somewhat marred by this unaccountable insufficiency.

On the whole Mr. Josephson's work can be called, in the best and worst sense of the word, a popular book. It will appeal to the large public through its superficiality and its entertaining liveliness. It is commendably impartial and fair. A most regrettable ignorance of essential historical facts, however, makes it fall below the standard previously set by Mr. Josephson in his study of Zola.

They were diligent and dogged, shrewd though sometimes slightly touched by romanticism, unlearned in the social sciences, rather boring and rarely conscious of the real problems that confront governments and peoples. There is little in their books that we have not read in their columns, and almost nothing that we have not read in the works of the scholars, the men of purpose, and the well equipped exiles. They write more popularly than the scholars, of course; that is to say, they garble things to suit the common taste. They stuff their long-winded manuscripts with the selfsame time-worn facts, critical banalities, small-scale learning, unrevealing revelations, and hearsay conjectures. There was perhaps a need for one good correspondent's book a year—Mr. Shirer's in 1941 and Howard K. Smith's in 1942. Unfortunately all the publishers had the same idea.

Mr. Lochner, chief of the Associated Press in Berlin, begins his lengthy effort with a sort of revelation. At least, had he published it in August, 1939, it would have been slightly sensational. Mr. Lochner enjoyed the confidence of a highly placed informant. A week before Hitler's invasion of Poland this man gave Mr. Lochner what purported to be a three-page report of a speech delivered by Hitler to his generals on August 22, 1939. This document, which contained a rough outline of Hitler's projected campaigns, was taken by Mr. Lochner to the American embassy, which refused to accept it because it was dynamite. Later his informant told the A. P.'s chief the exact zero hour of the assault on Crete. Having thus suggested that he really was in the know, Mr. Lochner then lets us down. Chiefly he rewrites his articles. For the rest he does little more than arrange his informational bric-a-brac around the central idea that we are fighting a powerful and unscrupulous enemy who does not respect democracy. If you are in any doubt about this truth and think one more book may help you, Mr. Lochner's will do.

Or, spurning the A. P., you might favor the United Press. "This Is the Enemy" has been compiled by the five members of the U. P.'s Berlin staff. It is a better book than the A. P.'s, being briefer and better written and having less of personal reaction in it. It contains among other things a fairly useful account of German military technique and perhaps fifty new facts that will make your cocktail partner nod his head in acceptance. But it is very uneven and sometimes infuriating. Hitler's sweetheart was a lass named Eva Braun, God bless her. One of the U. P.'s men "learned on reliable authority that Hitler contemplated marrying" this Braun girl. The same foreign correspondent tells us that he doesn't know why Hitler did not do so. "Perhaps," the foreign correspondent suggests, "the opening up of new vistas in his 'historic mission' during these momentous years relegated marriage to its position of previous unimportance in his plans." There's prose for you—all to say the so-and-so reneged and went off to bomb Warsaw.

Then Mr. Riess. Mr. Riess is an anti-fascist exile. I accept his politics and reject his book. The central theme of "The Self-Betrayed" is that the German generals, in dealing with Hitler, have betrayed their caste. It is thus at oblique variance with Mr. Fried's scholarly and documented "Guilt of the German Army." Much of the material of the present book can be obtained elsewhere and is beyond question. But Mr. Riess's specialty is revelation. "The Self-Betrayed" is crammed with sensational accounts of private conversations and conspiracies between leading Nazis and soldiers of the Third Reich, reported as if Mr. Riess or his informants had been eyewitnesses. He provides "factual" explanations of a quite Alexandrine complexity, set down with the finality of the "Cambridge Modern History." He will give you an inside version of the Blomberg affair, with the complete history of the movements and private thoughts of the participants, or he will recount the very details of an alleged plot, headed by Von Runstedt, to overthrow Hitler. Mr. Riess even knows the names of the S. S. officers who called on Reichenau half an hour before his mysterious death.

It is best to be frank. Mr. Riess may believe what his contacts tell him, but for my part I believe about one word of it. Obviously, Mr. Riess's informants are so close to the works that they ought to be able to tell us where Hitler will strike next. Whether it is believable or not, however, its verbosity, absence of logical order, and lack of selective discretion make the book a rococo horror for this reader. One admits that there is some diversion in it. The author is good on the love life of the insects. Former Big Shot Alfred Rosenberg plotted against the Soviet Union with the Ukrainian basileisk Skoropadsky and with certain hyphenated Red Army generals. Every time Producer Rosenberg and Director Skoropadsky went into a huddle over their invasion story, Herr Rosenberg's beautiful and brilliant mistress, Veta Schuster, was present, by permission of Warner Brothers. Too bad for Alfred! Mr. Riess will tell you why: "Intelligence officers of a Western power found out that Vera Schuster was an agent of the OGPU and had kept Moscow informed of everything Rosenberg and Skoropadsky were planning." Sure, that's what he says! I agree with the Hays office.

The American Color

CURRIER & IVES: PRINTMAKERS TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE. By Harry T. Peters. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $5.

THE Currier and Ives prints represent the transition from the handicrafts to industrialism in popular graphic art, being the equivalent, perhaps, of the player-piano in music. They were run off in black and white from single stones on hand-operated presses and were colored by hand by a "staff of about twelve young women, all trained colorists and mostly of German descent. They worked at long tables from a model set up in the middle of the table. . . . Each colorist applied only one color, and when she had finished, passed the print on to the next worker, and so on until it was fully colored." A factor that shortened the career of the firm of Currier and Ives was its reluctance to adopt chromolithography, by which the print is colored directly from the block, until almost thirty years after its introduction into this country.

The text Mr. Peters supplies to his beautifully made book gives this information and much more—and excuses the apparent defects of some of the color plates: hand-coloring accounts for the discrepancies between different copies of the same print. Mr. Peters makes little attempt to discuss the aesthetic value of the prints, implying somehow, in spite of his love of them, that they are beneath it. That is a question. Anyhow, it is time someone examined the nineteenth-century mind through them, noting what an appeal to the

The new Archbishop of Canterbury was appointed by Prime Minister Winston Churchill against the wishes of Tory reactionaries in Britain. A huge audience in the Albert Hall, London, heard the Archbishop declare for transference of taxes from productive equipment to ground values. (See Christian Century, October 7, 1942.) Churchill himself, in a volume recently issued in New York, says: "Who could have thought that it would be easier to produce by toil and skill all the most necessary or desirable commodities than it is to find consumers for them? It is certain that the economic problem with which we are now confronted is not adequately solved, indeed is not solved at all, by the teachings of the textbooks, however grand may be their logic, however illustrious may be their authority." Churchill is also for the taxation of ground rental values.

THE HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
30 East 29th Street New York City, N. Y.

American imagination the railroad once made and how sex managed to get into pictures of slaves being branded, sailors making rescues at sea, and anything in general combining violence with women.

The work of some of the most respected American painters of the time was reproduced by Currier and Ives, but it seems dull compared to the run-of-the-mill prints designed by the firm's staff artists. The latter may have been a little awkward or naive, but their product was almost always lively. Where the academicist, like Eastman Johnson, muffled recesses in shadow and dwelt upon the texture of a barn door, the staff illustrator put in additional details of interest and information or executed a neat decorative passage. Also the reviewer finds the stars of the Currier and Ives staff, such as the English-born sporting artist Arthur Fitzwilliam Tait, less stimulating than those who had practically the status of hacks, like Fanny Palmer, also English-born. Her want of the finish which Tait had was more than compensated for by her candor and her strong feeling for composition in depth. She specialized in landscape, panorama, and scenic effects, and filled in backgrounds and color in pictures by other artists. I never tire of admiring, in her famous "Rocky Mountains: Emigrants Crossing the Plains," the recession leading from the stream and tree in the right foreground corner through the groups of trees and winding of the stream in the middle distance to the cliffs and peaks in the farthest center background. The features of the landscape are largely imaginary, as Mrs. Palmer never saw the Rocky Mountains. It is too bad that the particular copy of this print reproduced in the book is so crudely colored.

Hardly anything is presumed to be more typically American than the Currier and Ives prints; yet of the six artists responsible for most of the better-known ones, only two were born here: Thomas Worth, cartoonist and limner of race horses, and George Henry Durrie, who so affectionately described New England farm life. Three of the four others—Tait, Mrs. Palmer, and Charles Parsons, the marine specialist—were born in England, where the first two lived until they were adults; while Louis Maurer, centenarian painter of horses and outdoor life and the father of the artist Alfred Maurer, was born and raised in Rhenish Germany. The good majority, too, of the principal lithographers of Currier and Ives were born abroad. The definitely American stamp of the work of these immigrants is to be explained, it seems, by the power of American environment to change quickly anything that comes within it. Not that it possesses this power any more than any other environment, but it is surprising that, never having had and still not having a marked national style, our country should have been able at all to distill such a pervasive and stubborn color of its own. There is nothing in the Currier and Ives prints which cannot be found, conceivably, in English, German, and French traditions of popular illustration; yet almost every one has a tone, a tempering, a shading, or a grain—sometimes no more than a hint—that is enough, quite apart from its subject matter, to distinguish it as American.

The prints were popular in Europe. One wonders how they were regarded there. Were they quaint and exotic in their gaucherie, or were they the latest bit of progress from America? Paradoxical as it may seem, there is something glossy and packaged about them. After all, their mode of production was rationalized as far as possible, and the result was arranged and corrected with a view to its sales appeal to a public whose interest in art pertained only to incidentals.

The House of Fureno

THE THREE BAMBOOS. By Robert Standish. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

THE peoples of Europe have written about each other with sympathy, assurance, and perception for many years. When Frenchmen and Germans appear in our literature, they are not caricatures unless caricature is intended. But very little is written about the Orient in which the Oriental appears as a human being sympathetically understood and snugly fitted into an environment known to the reader. "The Three Bamboos" is one of the first novels about Japan which draws an acceptable picture of Japanese character and stems from a firm understanding of the economic and social environment of modern Japan.

"The Three Bamboos"—the title is taken from the sign of the House of Fureno—is based upon an important phenomenon in the rise of modern Japan—the growth of a financial oligarchy. The book might be a description of the rise of the House of Mitsui or Mitsubishi. It begins with the pre-Meiji period and shows how complicated were the factors bringing about the revolution. The elder Fureno is merely anti-Takugawa. He leads his sons in the pirating of a Takugawa treasure ship out of feudal ambitions; but the sons he sends abroad with this wealth to learn the secrets of the West return to Japan with other ambitions. From this very time begins the conflict between the older Samurai traditions of Japan, as represented in the novel by the elder Fureno, and the capitalist instincts of the great houses which together form the financial oligarchy. The invention of bushido, a doctrine which consolidates a position of considerable ambiguity, helps the capitalist-minded generals and the military-minded capitalists to bridge the gap between old and new Japan.

A good story, rapidly and subtly told, works out in the private lives of eminent Japanese the basic conflicts of Japanese society. This is a historical novel in the best sense of the word.

Against a strong structural background Mr. Standish can use quite safely those elements in Japanese life—ultra-nationalist societies, and secret assassination—which in the hands of others are often little more than melodrama. He keeps his feet on solid ground.

It would be a mortal error to assume that the Japanese are entirely vile, for nothing entirely vile could have survived, untouched by other influences for several thousand years. No creature that is brave is wholly bad. Common fairness, furthermore, demands that one admit that much of the vileness of modern Japan is of Western origin. That the Japanese seized it avidly is also beyond dispute.

As far as history goes, Mr. Standish begins much better than he ends. The destruction of the Furenos in a bomber at Pearl Harbor is artistically fitting. But the historian might well wonder whether, as Mr. Standish represents, the finan-

Economic Problems of War

by GEORGE A. STEINER, Editor and a staff of economic specialists

Price control, taxation, raw materials . . . problems in the headlines . . . problems in our minds! Here they are answered . . . in terms understandable to the layman . . . by men most qualified to discuss the pertinent questions of the day.

Objectively and analytically, ECONOMIC PROBLEMS OF WAR discusses the impact of total war on our economic and social institutions. Without bias, it gives the experience of other warring nations, and suggests the ways in which our nation can meet and overcome the disrupting influences of the present emergency.

An unusually thorough book, called by the New Republic "the most comprehensive study of war economics yet published," ECONOMIC PROBLEMS OF WAR is directed to every intelligent person who would have a far-reaching conception of total war in all its phases.

cial oligarchy swallowed the military, or whether it was swallowed by the military. Assassination, used so skilfully by the last of the Furens against some of the older representatives of the Samurai tradition, was a weapon widely used by the new military against the financial oligarchy. Mr. Standish in his last chapters is truer to his characters than to history, but that perhaps is merely one of the difficulties of writing a historical novel.

Mr. Standish deserves high praise for writing an exciting story from such an eminently sane and objective point of view. He has contributed in this novel to our understanding of the Japanese ruling class. He has given little comfort to those who insist on making no distinction between that ruling class and the impoverished, exploited peasantry of the Island Empire.

American Letters: A Restricted View

AMERICAN HARVEST: TWENTY YEARS OF CREATIVE WRITING IN THE UNITED STATES.

Edited by Allen Tate and John Peale Bishop. L. B. Fischer. $3.50.

IN PUTTING this anthology together, Mr. Tate and Mr. Bishop are prepared to show that American writing between 1920 and 1940 constitutes—as it never did in any previous period, even when there were a few giants in the land—a real literature. A literature in the French sense of the word, they punctiliously add, which means in translation that between 1920 and 1940 enough serious-minded writers learned their trade to produce a real body of sound and accomplished writing. That some such thing is true almost no one would deny, though perhaps many people would offer somewhat different proof, and perhaps most people would feel that complete proof is impossible in an anthology restricted to the shorter forms of writing. A real literature, even on its technical side, must reveal a mastery of larger forms and more complex artistic problems than anything offered here. If it is to be more than a purely minor art, it must show a certain size and sustaining power as well as a certain skill.

I would not labor the matter if I didn't suspect that for Mr. Tate and Mr. Bishop a literature does tend to exist simply on the basis of skill. Mr. Tate and Mr. Bishop are among those American critics whose standards of judgment are severely aesthetic, who see literature as art or nothing, and who not only care passionately about form and craftsmanship, but refuse the name of literature to whatever does not have them. The extremism of their point of view is salutary and even valuable in a nation whose critics have for too long a time been over-concerned with mere content, or with the sociological and psychological implications of that content. Mr. Tate and Mr. Bishop are not interested in writing for what is tendentious or personally revealing about it, or for what is produced as a convulsive necessity of the Zeitgeist. They are interested in writing as an art—as a thing that endures when the conditions it arose out of have disappeared from view. In an absolute sense, they are of course dead right; in any relative sense, the matter is perhaps more debatable. For in any body of literature that is not wholly first-rate—and few bodies are—it too often becomes necessary to choose between form without sufficient content and content without sufficient form. The choice, as a personal decision, will doubtless be a matter of temperament and taste; but as a critical one it may be influenced by the need to restore a balance. Certainly we have had enough of literature in the raw to feel that there is something special to be said, right now, for literature sous cloche.

But too much can be said for it, and I think that too much is said for it in the present anthology. "American Harvest," with its few lapses from skill and its many examples of adroitness, is proof enough of America's artistic coming-of-age. But it does not strike me as a wholly adequate or sufficiently rounded representation of the literature produced in America between 1920 and 1940. The omission of certain writers—and not merely Dreiser, Sinclair Lewis, and James Farrell, but equally Scott Fitzgerald, John O'Hara, Elizabeth Roberts, Ellen Glasgow, and, among the poets, Elinor Wylie—is decidedly worthy of comment; but it is more important that by no means all the included writers are represented by their most vital work; while it is most important of all that "American Harvest" is too single in tone and minor in tone, and falls short of that maturity of feeling and depth of insight that release literature, when it has done its job, back into life. Much, very much, of the prose in this book deals, for example, with nostalgic themes—the nostalgia for childhood, youth, far places, home: and even as we realize that there is no more natural or charming or fruitful impulse for art, we know too that there is none more facile or, at times, more escapist. The editors, in their introduction, have laid down a kind of critical canon, but the anthology itself, like almost all anthologies, is no more than a reflection of their taste. If it is very good taste, it is also very restricted. What we gain from its being fastidious we lose from its not being robust.

Much in "American Harvest" is, understandably, well known: such good stories as Hemingway's The Undeclared, Conrad Aiken's Secret Snow, Silent Snow, Lardner's Haircut, Katharine Anne Porter's Flowering Judas; such good essays as Edmund Wilson's The Ambiguity of Henry James and Eliot's Tradition and the Individual Talent. There are equally well-known things, like Faulkner's brilliant but tricky A Rose for Emily, which are less satisfactory; and some not well-known things, like Caroline Gordon's The Captive, which rank with the finest work in the book. The selections from Sherwood Anderson, Erskine Caldwell, and Willa Cather are particularly weak; and not all the poets are represented at their best or in the right proportions. But there is not a great deal to cavil at within the limits of the compilers' taste; it is rather those limits themselves that reduce the importance of the book, turning, as they do, the field of American literature, not to be sure into a hothouse, but into too trim and pretty a garden.

The book has also been published in Spanish and Portuguese for wide distribution in South America. It should make a popular missionary—one who woos the natives with beads rather than Bibles.

BROWDER

Speaks out on

VICTORY
-and- AFTER

A keen political thinker discusses with power and clarity the problems of the war, explores the nature of the war, a program for war economy, national unity, the role of Republicans, Democrats, Communists, the Fifth Column. Finally, the book examines the policies of the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union, China, India, Africa, Latin America, shows their interrelation, and the profound effect this relationship will have on the kind of peacetime world which will follow victory. For every intelligent reader who wants to become familiar with the views of a thinker whose utterances are too often misquoted or distorted. $2.00

DRAMA

Philemon on Main Street

THERE are, I am sure, a great many people who do not under any circumstances want to see a play about a man who planted himself in his own back yard and grew there into a very handsome tree.

A few of these people, namely, those whose taste was formed during the nineteen-thirties, will no doubt base their lack of interest on the fact that the hero of such a tale must be, as he actually is, an escapist of the most abandoned description and therefore outside the range of human sympathy. They may even go so far as to point out that the dendroid tendencies of Philemon and his spouse were involuntary rather than the result of any deliberate nay-saying to life; that even Daphne, though she was undoubtedly escaping from something, was nevertheless not an escapist in the technical sense of the word; and that a modern who deliberately plants himself is setting a very bad example to an age trying to develop a social conscience. An even larger group will, I suspect, base its determination to stay away from "Mr. Sycamore" (Guild Theater) on rationalistic rather than moral grounds. The old saying that what is too silly to be said on the stage is sung, is, they will maintain, not strictly true. Sometimes it isn't even set to music. Instead, it is simply labeled "a Fantasia."

With either of these groups it is obviously not worth while to discuss the present play. Their members take their stand on the unassailable declaration "Even if it were good I wouldn't like it"; and I confess that their point of view can be understood. I myself approached the evening with considerable misgiving. Indeed, I am not even certain that a man who actually saw "Mr. Sycamore" and still remained unimpressed would completely forfeit my love and respect. But I did, nevertheless, find the play quite delightful in its own way, and I think that it can be recommended with some confidence to all not too firmly convinced in advance that they could not possibly like it.

Both the action and the theme of the piece are precisely those which this outline would suggest, and there is no pseudo-profundity, no attempt, after the manner of Russo-German non-realistic plays, to imply some weighty significance that isn't there. Neither, for that matter, has either the author of the original short story or the author of the very skilful dramatization attempted to equal Mr. Saroyan's romantic arabesques. Instead, they have told quite simply the story of a village postman who is weary both of his own endless peregrinations and of the strife which seems to dominate the village almost as hopelessly as it does the international scene. Having always admired the peaceful, contemplative existence of trees and having heard from the village poetess about the sort of thing which seems to have been fairly frequent in Greece, he decides that what the ancients could do ought not to be beyond him. Despite the derision of his neighbors, he stands in a hole in his own back yard until the roots begin to sprout and the leafy twigs emerge from the ends of his fingers. When we last see him he is spreading his protective branches over his loving wife, who is seated, as he hoped she would be, beneath them. And when she inquires concerning his happiness, he shakes his leaves in a most contented fashion.

The overtones of satire and irony are pleasantly struck without being pretentious, labored, or in any way overdone, with the result that the play goes off in the pleasantest fashion imaginable. On the whole, the tendency is to emphasize the fun; the sentiment, which might easily have been mawkish, is very discreetly underplayed, with plenty of attention to the skeptical village wits who make the inevitable jokes about the danger of termites and the indignities likely to be offered by wandering dogs. Instead of striving to make the whole credible by subdued lighting, either literally or metaphorically, action is made to take place in plain daylight, and we believe as much as we need to because everything is so concrete and so matter of fact. The result demonstrates once again that nine times out of ten the method of Defoe works better than the method of Maeterlinck and that nothing is more likely to make us doubt than too obvious an effort to be eerie and portentous. Add to the good writing equally good directing and acting, all harmoniously in the same key, and you get a production which is obviously not "important" but very agreeable indeed. Stuart Erwin plays the postman with exactly the right mixture of gentle stubbornness and single-minded faith. Lillian Gish is also excellent as the loving wife who begins by being greatly concerned lest her husband catch his death of cold and ends by deciding, as good wives should, that though men want strange things they ought, once it is clearly established that they do want them, to be helped toward even the strangest of goals.

Somewhat belatedly I should report that "The Damask Cheek" (The Playhouse) is a thoroughly artificial but literate comedy about how an admirable but unobtrusive woman had to maneuver before she could attract the attention of a man back in 1909—though I must say that the time was not, so far as I can remember, quite such an age of innocence as it is here represented. The authors, John Van Druten and Lloyd Morris, handle the story well, and so does a cast in which the accomplished Flora Robson is the star. "The Damask Cheek" is not going to tax anyone's mind and neither is it going to raise anyone's blood pressure, but it furnishes an agreeable evening.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MUSIC

WHEREAS Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" was a completely achieved masterpiece which nobody had any right to tamper with in the ways that Rimsky-Korsakov and now Shostakovich have tampered with it, his "Fair at Sorochinsk" was left a collection of sketches and composed fragments which had to be filled out into some complete form before it could be given on the stage. For the New Opera Company's production the conductor Emil Cooper has combined part of the Tcherepnine version with material of his own composed on themes by Mussorgsky; and the result sounds as though it had been done by Rimsky-Korsakov—which is to say that the music is individual and beautiful and moving in the way that even Rimsky's revision of Mussorgsky's music is, though not in the way that Mussorgsky's original is. As for the production, excellent conducting and staging achieve an over-all style which creates musico-dramatic illusion and impressiveness where these might have been destroyed by the youthful appearance, the unauthoritative presence and movement of most of the singers, and by the English words that clash with the music when they are intelligible.

Offenbach's "Vie parisienne," the company's greatest success last year, suffers this year from lack of precision and assurance in the performance of the music, and from several disadvantageous changes in cast: Paul Reed works ten times as hard as George Rasely, in the role of the trainer, to achieve one-tenth of the humor; the engagingly youthful Hugh Thompson plays the elderly father with the insufficient help of a little cornstarch and a mustache. What saves the production is the staging, which in the Café Anglais scene is nothing less than brilliant.

"The Fair at Sorochinsk" was preceded, after the opening night, by Balanchine's "Ballet Imperial," one of the works that he created for the South American tour of the American Ballet in 1941. It is composed to the music of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 2, which I have not heard since Yolanda Mero played it in the early twenties, but which is vastly superior to the popular Concerto No. 1, and is in fact one of Tchaikovsky's best works. And Balanchine's choreography is a superb illustration of what Lincoln Kirstein—who has written so discerningly about Balanchine—describes as "his mastery of the poetry of dance pattern in a symphonic form. I do not mean by his utilizing the symphonies of Brahms or Tchaikovsky, but in his orchestrating dancers to move in his given space, as sounds exist in their given time in a symphony." But this orchestrating of movement in space produces textures and patterns of constantly moving points, lines, groups that are highly complex and not easily followed even when executed with precision. And in these performances they were executed by an insufficiently trained or rehearsed group with lack of precision that smudged what needed to be clean and sharp.

Schnabel's first New York appearance of the season was made in a recital at the Frick Collection. There was no mistaking the fact that a great musician was playing, even though there was no mistaking the fact also that much of the time he was playing badly—with over-emphasis that was hard on the ear and the mind in so small a room, and occasionally with a curious loss of rhythmic control that sent the music skidding for a few measures. I am speaking of what happened in the performances of Beethoven's Sonata Op. 7 and the Mozart A minor; but in Mozart's D major (K. 576) there were the poised clarity and sharpness of outline, the coherent proportions of Schnabel's playing at its best; and even with its excesses the performance of Beethoven's Op. 109 retained its greatness as an interpretive achievement.

On December 6 Webster Aitken will play Bach's "Goldberg" Variations at the Frick Collection; on January 3 the Budapest Quartet is to play. The first hour of the concerts is broadcast by WNYC. Also, on November 28 and December 12 at Town Hall Kurt Applebaum, in whose playing one hears the operation of a first-rate musical intelligence, will give the remaining two of his series of recitals of Beethoven sonatas. I did not like the over-emphasis and plastic distortion of his performance of Op. 57 at the first recital; but the performances of Op. 14 No. 1 and Op. 78 were those of a man whom you would do well to hear.

Columbia's December list offers the long-awaited set (526, $4.73) of Mozart's great G minor Quintet for strings performed by the Budapest Quartet and M. Katims. The performance is a superb statement of the work in living sound; but as reproduced by the records the sound is muffled in its lower and middle range, and nasal and cutting in its upper range.

England and Russia

After the War

Dear Sirs: May I add a note to Ralph Bates's review of "Europe, Russia, and the Future" by G. D. H. Cole? Cole starts from the assumption that after Hitler's defeat a return to the old status quo in Europe will be impossible, since the revolutions after this war will be much more widespread than they were after the First World War. I agree that there can be no return to the status quo, but it will be chiefly because instead of four great powers in Europe—Germany, Italy, France, and Soviet Russia—there will be but one, Soviet Russia. English foreign policy before the First World War and in the period between the two wars was directed toward maintaining the balance of power in Europe. Hitler destroyed this balance, but his defeat will not mean that it can be restored. England will be unable to take up its former role because there will be no approximately equal forces in balance. Soviet Russia will be the sole great power in continental Europe.

Whatever developments may take place later, Germany at first will be disarmed and occupied, and it will have no voice in Europe's affairs. Italy is neither militarily nor industrially a great power—if further proof were needed this war has furnished it—and in an age of mass-production it cannot become one. France is now only a medium-great power; by a process that has been going on for a generation it has lost its position of hegemony.

Before the war the population of the Soviet Union was 170,000,000; the annexation of parts of Poland and Rumania brought it up to 200,000,000. Other states with predominantly Slav populations will be drawn into the Russian orbit after the collapse of Nazi Germany. Agrarian revolutions may be expected all over Eastern Europe and the Balkans, and the regimes subsequently set up will be more strongly inclined toward the Soviet regime than toward any other in Europe. Half the people of the Continent, a Continent without any other leading power, will be in Soviet Russia. This fact, according to Cole, will determine Europe's future development. (In view of this fact it is extremely important, though it may not be decisive, that the Soviet Union at the present time is placing greater emphasis on nationalism than on socialism, or revolution, and that immediately after the war it will have its hands full feeding its people and repairing the worst of the war's ravages.)

Moreover, the position of England, independent of European developments, will be fundamentally changed. Before the First World War England's foreign investments were as large as those of the rest of the world put together. After the war it was still a creditor country, but it shared its position with the United States. After the present war England will probably have lost most of its foreign investments, and the United States will be the leading capitalist power in the world. Further, whatever India's status during the war, its independence cannot be held up for long after the war is over. Thus England, having lost the greater part of its foreign investments and having learned that it cannot continue its colonial imperialism, will stand before two possible courses: it must become more than ever a European power, or it must play second fiddle in an American-English alliance.

To what extent the future of Europe will be determined by American-English interference is a question Cole leaves open. In England, he emphasizes, all positions of real power will still be in the hands of the Tories. It is significant that though Labor holds many Cabinet posts, no representative of the party accompanied Churchill to either Washington or Moscow. The party lacks, he believes, the unconquerable will to power—and he may be right. Perhaps this will develop only after the war, when the great dislocations in the whole English body politic become more visible than they are today.

But even if the Labor Party is not now a decisive political force in England, its weight may turn the scales when Continental issues are to be decided. Before and after the First World War the party was certainly weaker than it is today, but even then it was strong enough more than once to block intervention against the Soviet Union. Perhaps after the Second World War English Labor will play the same role in relation to Europe that it played in relation to Russia after the First.

A Fear Well Founded

Dear Sirs: I opened your issue which reached me last Friday with a curious interest to see whether you, unlike most of the other critics of the State Department's Vichy policy, had been frank enough to admit that the American and British offensive in Northwest Africa had proved that you had been mistaken and the department amply justified. But I found no such admission; on the contrary, I read your shrewish attempts to defend your attacks on the department and your somewhat imperious warnings to Mr. Hull and his associates that they should follow your recommendations in their attitude toward the Fighting French movement.

And now that General Eisenhower, doubtless for military reasons which are convincing to him and his superiors, has recognized Admiral Darlan's authority in French North Africa, we can, I fear, anticipate a new campaign by The Nation against Mr. Hull and his colleagues. I venture to suggest that aspersions on the motives of members of the State Department are unworthy of The Nation. JAMES G. McDONALD

Write to George Norris!

Dear Sirs: The unwarranted defeat of Senator George W. Norris at the polls in Nebraska is cause for sorrow on the part of every liberal in America. His post-election statement indicates that he believes his defeat to be a repudiation of his forty years of public service.

George Norris has given his whole life to fighting privilege, bossism, and corruption. Whenever civil liberties were abrogated or minority rights threatened, the friends of liberty always could depend upon the Senator from Nebraska. From the beginning of his long career in Congress to the hour of his defeat, he was a foe of reaction and retained a youthful zeal for political and economic reform. Party lines never affected his determination to serve the people according to the dictates of his own mind and conscience.

Every liberal in America should write a letter to Senator Norris expressing gratitude for his long years of devotion to the very highest ideals of public service. J. OWEN GRUNDY

The Shape of Things

A MAJOR CABINET SHUFFLE, THE FIRST IN ten years of Roosevelt's Administration, is at least a possibility as we go to press. The plan calls for Secretary of the Interior Ickes to head a revitalized Labor Department, enlarged by the inclusion of the man-power program within its jurisdiction. With the disappearance of the independent War Manpower Commission, Paul V. McNutt would succeed Ickes in the Interior Department and Frances Perkins would take over the Federal Security Administration. The two main divisions of organized labor, as well as the chairmen of the five Congressional committees working on man-power legislation, support the proposed shift, which would satisfactorily settle a number of pressing problems. The man-power program should from the start have had the advantages of an established agency headed by an official of Cabinet rank. The President obviously did not feel that Secretary Perkins could cope with the task—one of the most exacting in the whole war effort—and improvised the new agency out of sheer reluctance to part with her services. This duplication in agencies has become a common device in Washington, and while it has its diplomatic uses it does not make for administrative efficiency. If the man-power program is to be rescued from the threat of military control, and if it is to be conducted with an eye to its far-reaching social implications, it should be headed by a Cabinet member who is also a fighter, a thinker, and a good administrator. Harold Ickes answers the specifications better than any other man in Washington. If necessary, he should be drafted.

THE UNITED NATIONS ARE ENJOYING THE refreshing experience of offensive action on all fronts, but optimism is only justified so long as it acts as a spur to greater effort. In Russia the ability of the Red Army to seize the initiative in two widely separated sectors, after standing up to heavy punishment all the summer, is truly impressive. It must be remembered, however, that the elasticity of defense afforded by the vast Russian spaces is now benefiting the Germans, and that recapture of territory is not decisive in itself. To some extent the advances of the Red Army may have been facilitated by Nazi withdrawals to prepared winter positions. Last year's bitter experiences have probably enabled the Germans to make better preparations for sub-zero warfare this time, and the Red Army is likely to find itself tested by a perfected "porcupine" defense system. On the other hand, this year Hitler has another front to worry about—a front, too, making heavy demands on his air transport, which played so important a part on the eastern front last winter. Reports from Africa are encouraging, but again the achievement of immediate objectives will not necessarily produce decisive effects. Tunis may well have fallen by the time this issue appears; Bizerte will almost certainly prove a tougher nut to crack. And while the Axis forces fight a delaying action there we must expect Hitler to make an effort to regain the initiative. Where is he likely to strike? A winter campaign in Turkey seems improbable; an air-borne attack on Syria would require a heavy drain on the overworked Luftwaffe. The omens, therefore, point toward Spain, torn between its fascist obligations and its fears of Allied victory.

WITH THE SHIFT IN THE TIDE OF BATTLE have come the first responsible, if tentative, gropings toward the peace. In Toronto Wendell Willkie hurled the challenge: "We cannot fight this war in silence, whatever our experts say. Because if we fight in silence, those same experts in the end, even winning the war, win nothing but blood and ashes." And in London Winston Churchill picked up the gage: "Certainly the most painful experiences would lie before us . . . if we fell to quarreling about what we should do with our victory before that victory had been won." But these were only the outside limits of the debaters' respective positions. Within them the protagonists edged cautiously toward an area of compromise. Willkie conceded the existence of "details which cannot be judiciously worked out under the pressure of war," and asked only that we "know what our line of solution will be." This seems to us a far greater concession than Mr. Churchill's. The British Prime Minister merely hazarded the guess that the war in Europe would come to an end before the war in Asia and suggested that while Britain and the United States then proceeded to finish off Japan, they could at the same time, and in conjunction with the other United Nations, be "shaping the international instruments and national settlements" of a free Europe. We are glad to hear Mr. Churchill use such terminology, at least with respect to Europe, but presumably he would leave the shaping of instruments and settlements for a free Asia until the end of the struggle against Japan. In that case peace plans for both Asia and Europe would have waited on the cessation of hostilities. We believe with Mr. Willkie that we can win in the future peace only what we consciously set out to win in the war. We hope President Roosevelt shares this view and that he will not much longer allow himself to be outdistanced by his Republican critic in this vital area of discussion.

IF CHURCHILL'S SPEECH HEDGED ON THE peace, it was both ringing and realistic with regard to the war. For anyone who is inclined to sit back and breathe easy we prescribe the sentence: "I know of nothing that has happened yet which justifies the hope that the war will not be long or that bitter and bloody years do not lie ahead." Despite this brake on runaway optimism, the speech was buoyant in tone and frank in its outline of things to come. Africa is not to be regarded as a stable front, but merely as a "springboard." Italy is to feel the full brunt of the United Nations' air power, which already far exceeds that of the Axis—unless its people contrive to rid themselves of the regime that has brought them only "measureless calamities." What has already happened to Genoa, Turin, and Milan "is only a foretaste." Even while Churchill spoke, Turin was being blasted by four-ton bombs and a hundred thousand incendiaries. Nevertheless, Italy's elimination from the war would seem to be a long way off, not because of what the Italian radio describes as the "stoic calm" of its people, but because Italy is already an occupied country. Since November 15 five German divisions have streamed through the Brenner Pass, and the total strength of the occupying force is now reliably estimated at 300,000 men, not counting some 90,000 Gestapo agents and civil administrators.

✱

THE PRESIDENT'S REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY powers to suspend any provisions of the tariff and immigration acts that interfere with effective prosecution of the war has met with unjustifiable delay in both the House and the Senate. No one seems to question the necessity for prompt action in giving the President power to conclude special trade agreements with Latin America to speed the delivery of vital war materials or in cutting down the red tape in admitting foreign troops or persons engaged in behind-the-lines activities against the Axis in Europe, Asia, or Africa. But there is a substantial minority in Congress which is opposed to giving the Chief Executive additional war-time powers as a matter of "principle," regardless of the war. Newsweek points out, moreover, that behind the scenes "the ugly truth is that anti-Semitism was a definite factor in the bitter opposition to the President's request." Some House members have expressed fear of a large influx of refugees from Europe. It is unlikely that the President, in view of the State Department's notorious reluctance to facilitate the escape of European refugees, has any intention of pushing the door wide open, but it would be folly not to avail ourselves of the knowledge and experience of the men and women who have risked their lives fighting Hitler within Europe, and it would be inhuman not to give them sanctuary.

WE BELIEVE THAT CIVILIAN CONTROL OF the war program must be maintained for sound social reasons as well as for reasons of efficiency; but the civilians who run war-production agencies must inspire confidence, and we find it easy to understand why the armed forces are hostile to the WPB under Donald M. Nelson. Like its predecessors, the WPB has never had any real influence over procurement, although there were areas in which it had both power and responsibility—in the curtailment of civilian output, conversion to war production, and the rationalization of production to insure maximum results—and in each of these fields the steps taken by the WPB were belated and inadequate. The record of the armed services in their own sphere is no better. The bungling of priorities by the Army and Navy Munitions Board is one example of their inefficiency; another is the chaotic situation in production scheduling. The armed services ought not to be burdened with the problems of industrial mobilization. But they will be doubly reluctant to give up their powers over procurement until we have civilian agencies that can deliver the goods. The struggle between military and civilian agencies dramatizes the need for passage of the Pepper-Tolan-Kilgore War Mobilization bill. Nelson may swing to support of the bill in the hope of emerging as head of the civilian supply ministry it proposes to establish. It would be a pity if the kite of so poor a candidate were to be tied to so excellent a bill. Nelson must be supported in his attempt to establish civilian control, but the fact that he is on the right side in this dispute ought not to distract attention from the fact that in failing to do a good job he has given the military a strong argument.

ALTHOUGH THE STATE DEPARTMENT SAID formally on November 23 that the question of Martinique and other French possessions in the Caribbean had been settled by an agreement with Admiral Georges Robert, the Martinique radio continues to send out pro-Axis propaganda. On November 26 it used a dispatch from Tangier painting this gloomy picture of the situation in Algiers following the American occupation: "Algiers finds itself in the midst of an economic, military, financial, political, and social crisis. The port is almost entirely destroyed. . . . There is no more train service. . . . The markets have no food to sell, the stores are empty. Two young naval officers were executed for an attempt to kill General Giraud. . . . Many persons have been sent to concentration camps. . . ." On the same broadcast a Bordeaux item quoted a Moslem spokesman as exposing "the leading part played by the Jews in the treason of the principal leaders who were charged with the defense of the empire." Said he, "North Africans now turn to France for aid from a legion of patriots [Laval's African Phalanx] who will free them from the yoke of foreign domination." Will such obviously Nazi-dictated "news" continue to be broadcast to the French Antilles, Guiana, and Haiti with the tacit approval of the State Department?

GASOLINE RATIONING HAS BECOME effective throughout the country, despite the ill-considered efforts of a Congressional minority to block it. Rubber Director Jeffers, Price Administrator Henderson, and the President deserve credit for standing firm in the face of unsavory political pressure from the anti-rationing group. Henderson in particular has been singled out for Congressional attack because he had the courage to put the country's interests ahead of short-time political considerations. The attitude of the Middle West Congressmen is difficult to understand in view of the fact that their constituents, and the American people as a whole, have accepted gasoline rationing as being in their own interest. And while a few persons may have felt that they were already being as careful as possible in the use of their tires, these same persons are likely to be pleasantly surprised at the further savings made under gasoline rationing. In the East, where the amount of gasoline available for an A coupon has recently been cut from four to three gallons, the only complaints are against loopholes that permit a small minority to abuse their privileges.

A BRITISH SEA CAPTAIN MUST "NEVER NEVER swear with a d," according to the Hays office, which is seeking to purify the British moving picture "In Which We Serve," due for release shortly. Some of The Nation's editors have had the privilege of attending a preview of this film, and they can testify emphatically that this is a case where Mr. Hays should forget his shears. "In Which We Serve" is the story of a heroine—a British destroyer—and some 200 heroes—her crew. Although fictional in form, it is essentially a documentary picture, giving a grimly realistic account of the life of a fighting navy in which a sprinkling of the milder sailor oaths figures quite naturally. But it is ridiculous even to raise irrelevant charges of blasphemy about a work of art which, more than any other war film we have seen, provides a deep emotional experience. We associate Noel Coward, who in addition to writing the dialogue, composing the music, and directing, plays the chief role, with more frivolous themes, but on this occasion he has dedicated his technical brilliance to the service of democracy. He plays the part of the captain superbly, but his emphasis is not on the individual but on the democratically led team—the force which is going to break the totalitarian team. This picture should help to dispel the illusion fostered by our enemies that our British comrades-in-arms are spiritless proletarians officered by simpering aristocrats. Any interference with its showing would be sabotage.

A YEAR AND A HALF AGO THE PRESIDENT set up the Committee on Fair Employment Practices and charged it with investigating discrimination in war industries. Its authority was limited by its inability to punish offenders, but it carried the prestige of the President's name, and it did as good a job as could be expected under the circumstances. When the War Manpower Commission was created last summer, however, the CFEP was made responsible to Paul V. McNutt, who does not seem greatly interested in that phase of the manpower problem. According to A. Philip Randolph, no agency is now doing anything effective to check discrimination, which is consequently on the increase. The CFEP has had to wait four months for action to be taken on a small appropriation. And now that it has funds, it is in the difficult position of having to investigate an agency of which it is a part, since the McNutt office, or any that supersedes it, will direct employment policy for all war industry. It would seem necessary, as Mr. Randolph says, to restore the CFEP to independent status and to strengthen it.

France After Toulon

SUNK beneath the waters of Toulon Harbor, along with the French navy, is a myth that bedeviled our foreign policy for more than two years—the myth that it was necessary for the United States to play ball with Vichy in order to keep the French fleet out of Hitler's hands. We know now that orders to destroy the ships rather than let them be employed to fight for the Axis were issued when France fell. It was the only order that could have been given, for if the majority of French naval officers were bitterly anti-British, the rank and file were no less anti-German. Thus the fleet could not be used by either side; it could only fight if attacked and commit suicide if its position became hopeless.

In the meantime, however, it was valuable as a phony trump card in the Vichy hand. It could be used against the Germans in an attempt to make "collaboration" a little more a matter of partnership, a little less a state of vassalage. It could be used against the British and Americans as a threat to tilt the scales of sea power in the Mediterranean against them. Once North Africa was invaded, with the support of an Allied armada strong enough to overwhelm the French fleet, the game was up. Darlan knew it and ratted. Hitler knew it and postponed his occupation of Toulon only long enough to complete his arrangements to prevent all possibilities of flight. Suicide was the only way out, and the French sailors faced that bitter fact calmly and courageously.

With its fleet sunk, its army disbanded, and the whole country occupied, the Vichy regime has lost the last shreds of legitimacy. The whole administrative structure of France is disintegrating visibly. While Laval's special police carry out the orders of the Gestapo, the army is melting away without waiting to be demobilized, and civil officials are leaving their posts. Laval stands revealed as a complete Quisling, shaking in his shoes for fear the Nazis will hold him responsible for their disappointment at Toulon. Pétain, the toothless symbol, seems more likely to be retained on his shadow throne. So long as Darlan professes to rule Africa in his name, he has some value as a political pawn whose name can be used to promote disunity and foster confusion among the French people.

Darlan's own position has perhaps been weakened by the scuttling, since his alleged influence over the fleet proved powerless to persuade it to attempt a break from Toulon. But by virtue of our support he is consolidating his hold on North Africa as head of the civil administration and chief of the French armed forces. The French have a saying that there is nothing so lasting as the provisional, and the De Gaullists' fears that Darlan will prove hard to shift if he is allowed to dig in are far from baseless.

It is reported from London that General de Gaulle himself wishes to come to Washington for a frank discussion of the whole situation. We hope that no obstacles will be put in his way and that mean attempts which are being made in some quarters to belittle his status and influence will be silenced. We are aware that De Gaulle has at times proved a prickly ally and that some of his political judgments are questionable. The fact remains that he risked all by repudiating the armistice with Germany and raising the banner of Fighting France. He has brought to our side many French colonies which have proved immensely valuable to the war effort; he has attracted to his committee representatives of all parties in France; he has become the symbol of resistance to the Axis among democratic Frenchmen everywhere. Maybe these facts do not establish his "legitimacy" in the eyes of the State Department, but his claims to represent France are certainly more valid than those of Darlan, the repudiated heir of an illegitimate sovereign.

Our action in adopting Darlan was, it is said, based entirely on military considerations and has justified itself in those terms. Perhaps so, but we do not purge that action of political significance by professing lack of interest in French politics; nor can we rid ourselves of responsibility for its results. For willy-nilly we must intervene in politics when we choose our collaborators, today in North Africa, tomorrow in Italy. By accepting Darlan's price for a cease-firing order, the weight of American support was thrown to the reactionary group he represents—to the men whose cry was "Rather Hitler than Blum," to the small but powerful faction who sold France, hoping to keep their great possessions.

We cannot in this manner promote unity among the French; rather we insure the outbreak of civil war when the Axis is overthrown. As Walter Lippmann pointed out recently, we must be prepared "to choose correctly and swiftly, as territories are liberated, the authority which the great powers will back to restore order and negotiate the peace." In making these choices, he continues, "what we have to build on are those elements in each country who have proved by their actions that they have the character and strength to remain true to their country's institutions and to its engagements, and to have cared more for honor and loyalty and freedom than for their lives and their fortunes." If we are to adopt this farsighted principle, we shall have to find means of scuttling Darlan.

Is China Forgotten?

THE recent victories in the Solomons and the gradual progress of Australian and American soldiers against the Japanese base at Buna in New Guinea have made a good many of us optimistic about the war in the Pacific. For months Japanese troops have been held to a standstill along the vast Pacific front. In the past few weeks they have been forced back. This turn in the tide in the Pacific, coupled with the dramatic developments in North Africa and Russia, have all but convinced the man on the street that victory is just around the corner.

A realistic appraisal of the situation in the Pacific is, however, by no means so encouraging. When the Allied gains in the Solomons and New Guinea, achieved after months of fighting and at great cost, are viewed in relation to the tremendous areas overrun by the Japanese in the first few months of the war, they appear wholly insignificant. At the rate that progress is being made in the island-by-island campaign of reconquest, the war could last for decades, and there would be little hope that any of us now alive would see the liberation of the Philippines. To make matters worse, the Japanese are threatening a drive on Yunnan province in southwestern China which, if successful, would cut China off completely from the rest of the United Nations and probably result in its being forced out of the war.

Most military strategists recognize that the only way that Japan can possibly be defeated is by combined land and air operations from China. Undoubtedly our own High Command shares this view. Last week a dispatch from China quoted General Chennault as declaring that preparations have been under way for such operations for months. A great new airport is said to have been prepared—possibly one of those regained from the Japanese in August—for a direct attack on Japan. But the fact remains that China has received very little in the way of air support from the United States; the few planes sent seem to have been largely of obsolete types. There have been no reports of the delivery of Flying Fortresses or other heavy bombers, although these are the types that could most easily be sent in from India. The remarkable achievements of the Flying Tigers and their successors in the American air force show what might be done if planes were rushed to China as they were to Australia or the Solomons. That they have not been sent on anything like a comparable scale cannot be attributed to the lack of importance of the Chinese front. Nor can it be blamed wholly on transport difficulties. Months elapsed after the outbreak of the war before the Burma road was closed. During that period planes were sent in vast numbers to almost every place but China. Moreover, many experts believe that if half the forces which were sent to Australia and New Zealand had been used in Burma, that country might have held and the transportation of supplies to China would not present the difficulties that it does today. Under the circumstances the Chinese cannot be blamed for wondering whether the color of their skin, rather than strategic considerations was the chief factor in the decision to defend Australia at the expense of China, and whether that same factor did not influence the decision to launch offensives in the Solomons and New Guinea rather than an early drive to retake Burma.

The recent arrival of Mme Chiang Kai-shek in this country is in all probability a reflection of concern over the present situation. The Chinese have long been adroit in combining politics and medical attention. Civilian morale in Free China is said to be lower than at any other time during the war. The food situation is extremely bad and has been aggravated by graft and speculation among officials. Leaders of known pro-Axis sympathies have taken advantage of the widespread disillusionment with Great Britain and the United States to press home a campaign against the pro-democratic elements within the government. It would be easy to overemphasize this trend. The situation is by no means hopeless. Cable reports indicate that the recent American naval victories in the Solomons and the successes in North Africa have had a tonic effect on Chinese public opinion. But they probably have only deepened the feeling that China is being treated as the country cousin among the United Nations. This feeling could be quickly counteracted by an offensive in Burma designed to reestablish an effective supply route between China and the Western world. But American prestige in Asia will be hopelessly shattered if we continue to devote our efforts exclusively to the recapture of a few minor Japanese bases in the South Pacific and allow our last tie with China to be severed by a Japanese offensive launched from Burma.

Reunion Far from Vienna

IF THE farce of Otto had been invented by a master ironist it could not have exposed more effectively the dangers and confusions that lurk behind our government's appeasement policy. Just to recall the outline of the plot is to sense both its comic qualities and its sinister implications.

Our readers will remember the beginning of the story. An article by Freda Kirchwey published on October 24 disclosed the Hapsburg Archduke's plan to create a "Free" Austrian Legion to be headed by himself, and reported that informed persons believed the idea would "soon receive some sort of 'unofficial' approval in official Washington." The article went on to point out that "any indorsement of Otto—open or sub rosa—would be taken as an unfriendly act" by most of the governments-in-exile, especially those that once bore the Hapsburg yoke and including several of our fighting allies. This fact, the article concluded, is one that "should be considered by the pragmatists of the State Department before they decide on the resurrection of the Hapsburg dynasty."

Why should officials bother to deny facts which events are about to substantiate? A few days after the article appeared, a letter was addressed to its author by a busy official of high rank in Washington. Since it was marked "personal," its source will not be revealed here. Nor will the text be reproduced except for a few words which contribute to the humor and meaning of the story. Said the official, himself falling into the mood of irony: "In the same issue . . . you intimate that the State Department is backing a Hapsburg restoration! I have no objection to imaginative fiction; but circulation of it as news is rightly regarded as dishonorable." The official is known as a solemn fellow, and he may be excused for building a "restoration" out of the "resurrection" suggested by Miss Kirchwey. But since her comments were directed at the approval apparently about to be given Otto's plan for a legion, the story could hardly be dismissed as fiction.

For the plan devised by Otto and his monarchist followers did meet with favor in both the War and the State Department. And when the army decided to form an Austrian battalion, Otto's "military committee" was solemnly authorized in a letter from the Secretary of War to act as the official recruiting agency. That Mr. Stimson acted without any clear realization of political consequences is easy to believe. It is impossible to believe that the State Department was equally innocent. And the letter from Mr. Stimson—addressed to "Otto of Austria," as though the Archduke were, in fact, the ruler of his great-grand-uncle's unhappy empire—was approved by the State Department before it was dispatched.

The climax of the farce takes place in the Archduke's suite in Essex House in New York City. The occasion is the Pretender's birthday; he is thirty. Around him are gathered his retinue, his lesser followers, and American hangers-on of royalty in exile. There are uniforms and medals. Toasts are drunk. (Remember the grand reception in "Reunion in Vienna"?) The future has suddenly begun to look more hopeful—nearer. For Otto, who has never for a moment accepted as permanent the collapse of the empire or the loss of the throne that would have been his if war and republicanism and dictators had not stood in his way—Otto read to the assembled guests the document which was his best birthday present, the letter from Secretary of War Stimson accepting his services in building the Free Austrian battalion.

No wonder Otto's ambitions soared above the paltry handful of Austrian monarchists who might enlist at his call. The statement he gave to the press describing his plans spoke of "10,000,000 Americans of Austrian descent" from whom recruits could be drawn, a figure which clearly included Americans of Yugoslav, Polish, Czech, Slovak, Hungarian, and Rumanian descent, numbering several million human beings whose countries repudiated Otto's family forever at just about the time Otto was celebrating his sixth birthday.

Poor Mr. Stimson, in indorsing Otto, had picked up a red-hot issue that he could easily have avoided. Protests came pouring in, as we had not too cleverly foreseen. Every ministry of every recognized succession state wanted to know the reason for this official collaboration with the Austrian monarchists. Every unrecognized free group from Central and Southern Europe protested. Mr. Hull, in a press conference, said Otto was only a refugee. But the State Department's approval of the Stimson letter robbed that brush-off of its intended effect.

And the sad part of it all is that no practical purpose whatever, no higher "expediency," was served by extending favors to the Archduke. For essentially Mr. Hull is right. Otto is just a refugee. He is not a leader, for he has no popular following. He was brought up in exile and so has shared none of his country's bitter vicissitudes. He is a monarchist and the aspirant to a throne that will never be restored. He is considered a symbol of "reaction and darkness," as a Yugoslav official expressed it, by every state that emerged from the demise of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Darlan at least had influence with Vichy officials and generals in North Africa. He was supposed to have power to command the French fleet. But Otto is all liability. And any favors shown him are interpreted in just one way by democratic public opinion; they are interpreted as another and even less excusable sign that some of our responsible officials, however violently they may deny it, are irresistibly attracted to representatives of upper-class reaction—preferably with clerical leanings.

Brass-Hat Production

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, November 29

AS THIS is being written, the undercover struggle between military and civilian agencies for control of the war program is in the open again. Before the article appears, there will have been important announcements. The fighting is on two fronts. One is man-power; the other is production scheduling. I can offer some background observations which may help the reader to judge pending changes. These observations represent the sum total of talks with many officials.

1. The problem of man-power is somewhat simpler than that of production scheduling. The armed services, through Selective Service and enlistments, have grabbed man-power recklessly. Little thought has been given to the question of deferments, which are still regarded as somehow unpatriotic, although a skilled worker may be more useful at his machine than in uniform. There has been little planned training of replacements. Selective Service must be brought under civilian control. Any solution that compromises this basic point will prove to be no solution at all.

2. The man-power chief must be fighter enough to stand up and slug it out with the armed services. He must be satisfactory to labor, for an anti-labor man-power chief would be an unbearable irritant. Secretary Ickes, who has been offered the job, fills the bill on both scores, but it is not certain that he will take it. The Department of the Interior means a great deal to him. For at least two years he has been thinking of the contribution he might make to the war effort if the department were allowed to work on ways to expand the production of all mineral raw materials.

3. The problem of materials is more important than either man-power or production scheduling. Ferdinand Eberstadt, the WPB vice-chairman in charge of materials and the army's candidate to succeed Nelson, approaches the problem as a banker approaches a receivership. He sees his task as one of cutting down claims, pro rata, to assets. The "assets" are what his materials branches tell him is the maximum possible output of steel, copper, and aluminum. Eberstadt's method is to cut the war-production program down to fit. There is some indication that the process of reduction has gone farther than necessary; trade journals are talking of more steel for civilian business while the WPB shuts down on power projects, tank arsenals, and armorplate pools. Eberstadt's basic estimates come from materials branches dominated by the big concerns and monopolies in their respective fields. These companies are restrained in their pioneering; new methods may easily upset old investments. There is need for an independent metals and minerals administrator to develop new ways of getting more aluminum, magnesium, copper, iron, and steel. This idea is already bubbling in Congress and helps explain the reluctance of Ickes to take the labor-man-power post.

4. Production scheduling is necessary if there is to be effective control of materials. This means scheduling the output of planes, tanks, and other armament so that parts and gadgets come along the national assembly line at the right time and in the right quantities. Neither a plane nor a tank can be used until it is complete, though it may serve to pad production figures in the meantime. At the same time there is no sense in making 10,000 of one particular part of a plane if you plan to assemble only 2,000 planes. Synchronizing the flow of parts and components is not an easy job because rates of production tend to change unevenly. The British (civilian-controlled) Ministry of Supply has done an incomparably better job on this than our army.

5. Vice-Chairman C. E. Wilson, who is theoretically but not actually in charge of production, wants to take over production scheduling. Wilson is an able, progressive business man. Nelson, after many fits and starts, is backing him, but may relapse into compromise at any time. Here we have a typical civilian-military clash. What does it mean? The "military" is made up of big business men in uniform plus professional military men. The civilians are big business men plus a leavening of public servants and New Dealers. The latter combination is a little more efficient in this field than the former, and more susceptible to public pressure. From all I can learn, the armed services have been very sloppy as industrial managers, and able business men in uniform are often bulldozed by the brass hats. This is true in aircraft. In addition, in the matter of production scheduling the profit motive may run counter to efficiency in a war program. In a private business, if one produces 1,000 bumpers for only 500 cars, waste eats profit. But in a war it may be more profitable to keep on pouring out easily made gadgets and articles even though production is thereby unbalanced. The automobile industry shows this in its fondness for making trucks and jeeps. We probably have enough of both for several second fronts.

6. If the military win the production-scheduling fight, they win. If the civilians win, they still have a long way to go. Production schedules cannot be rationalized without canceling some contracts, modifying others. But so long as the armed services sign the procurement contracts and checks, so long as the procurement power rests in their hands, theirs is the final control of war production and scheduling, whatever victories are won on paper by the civilians. This was demonstrated under the OPM when there were civilian tank and ordnance branches. Civilian and military instructions to contractors often clashed, and the latter were obeyed because the manufacturer was dependent on the military for payment and further contracts. I have recently had an opportunity to examine records which show how often the orders of the WPB's top committees and executives are ignored by its industry branches. How much more difficult for Nelson or Wilson to get their orders obeyed by men in uniform whom they have no power to reward or punish!

7. The President gave Nelson general power over procurement and production scheduling in the executive order establishing the WPB. Within a few weeks Nelson signed these powers away and gave them back to the army. Now he wants to assume them again, but the President, though Commander-in-Chief, may hesitate fully to support him against the wishes of the armed services. For army-navy power over procurement stems from appropriation acts of Congress, and Congress might cause trouble.

8. The drift is toward further compromise. We may muddle through on the basis of the temporary improvements possible through a Cabinet shift and another patchwork agreement between military and civilian agencies. But such changes cannot provide a real overhauling of the war-production setup. The only change that will make a fundamental difference is one that will give us unity of command on the home front, co-ordinated civilian control of man-power and procurement, action to break the restrictions imposed on the output of materials by monopoly and conventional thinking, and democratic leavening of the war bureaucracy which must carry out the orders.

Dry Rot and New Life in Britain

BY TOM WINTRINGHAM

London, November 16

THE defeat of General Rommel and the landing of American troops in North Africa will have a powerful effect on British politics. These military events set directly before us the problems of a European revolution against fascism and therefore the question of war aims, of what sort of world we are asking the people of Europe to join with us in building. Is it to be the kind of world we know—empire and unemployment, the rivalry of great monopolies and the clash of nations that will not yield any of their sovereign powers? Or is it to be a world of economic, ethnic, and educational democracy?

In my view the political struggle over these questions now released in Britain will not be resolved by British action alone; it will be resolved only if the forces leading the left in Britain link up with representatives of the peoples of America, Russia, India, and China. The United Nations can become really united only through a liberating revolution; for that revolution they need a new International.

The defeat of Rommel and the American invasion gave the British people almost their first taste of victory in this war. We might have expected as a result a feeling of satisfaction, a strengthening of the prestige of the Churchill government. In fact there are few signs of this; rather there are signs of the opposite, that a taste of success may release the deep dissatisfaction of the bulk of the working and middle classes in this country. Any expression of that dissatisfaction in the political field has been held in check by a very real fear that disunity in Britain might lead to Hitler's victory. It is true that some of the critics of the government are silent now, or are even attempting to climb on the bandwagon. But these are critics from the conservative right or center, whose alliance with critics of the left in the House of Commons or in the press has made it difficult for the left critics to gain a national hearing or position. After Tobruk fell, in June of this year, the motion of censure for the government was moved and seconded by Tory critics of this sort, and the main feeling of the nation was that there would be no point in destroying Mr. Churchill's government only to put this motley crew in power.

Opposition to Mr. Churchill's government from individuals of the right has now largely disappeared. But if the feeling in the country is to have expression, a much stronger opposition from the left must appear. It will concern itself not only with war aims, the European revolution, Indian independence, and a closer unity of British policy with that of the other United Nations, but also with the key questions of post-war policy—nationalization, social security, and the like. This opposition from the left will face three main problems. The first is how to carry on effective political activity of any sort in a country living under our war conditions. The second is how to get that political activity reflected in a Parliament for which no general elections are held. The third, and perhaps the most important, is how to link up with political forces outside Britain that have the same general aims.

How do we organize a political meeting in Britain now? This hall has been bombed. The next one has been taken over as a canteen for the forces. A third is occupied by auxiliary fire services and can only be used for political purposes if we can get the approval of bureaucrats whose connection with the government is close. A fourth would be available, but the restricted transport services mean that the audience would never get home—buses stop at 9 p. m. in most places now. The shortage of paper limits the use of posters or handbills to advertise our meeting; the uncertainty of war-time travel means that the speaker from London may arrive a couple of hours late. People are working three shifts and fire watching four nights a month, and they have the Home Guard and half a dozen other war activities to fill their spare time. There is practically no private motoring, and if a speaker opposed to the government manages to get a car for a speaking tour, the Tories ask ugly questions about it in Parliament.

Under these conditions normal political activity has fallen to zero. In half our towns it is almost impossible to find the Labor Party. In others there is a skeleton organization of tired old people, mainly trade unionists, supported by trade-union and cooperative funds. The Communists are alive and active, but not in opposition. Their larger meetings are held in alliance with Lord Beaverbrook or with the Ministry of Information. Their line has been one of support for the Churchill government combined with pressure to remove some of the members of that government; they have also been vociferous for the second front. But except for them there has been a blackout of progressive politics as complete as the darkening of our cities that prevents so many people from getting to committees or public meetings.

Americans, accustomed to the regular holding of elections, may find it hard to realize the British position. Our Parliament was elected more than seven years ago, in 1935, at the time of the Abyssinian war. It was elected largely on the Tory government's promise to support the League of Nations, enforce sanctions, and check fascism. A month or two after the elections came the Hoare-Laval pact. The British author of that pact is today our ambassador at the key post of Madrid. Most of the 400-odd Tory M. P.'s elected in 1935 gained their seats on the promise that they would keep the peaceful Mr. Baldwin in power and have nothing to do with that dangerous fellow Churchill. All of them supported Mr. Chamberlain and Munich. Even when the plain evidence of defeat in Norway led to a change, a majority of these

M. P.'s voted still for Chamberlain, and Churchill had to take him into his Cabinet. The Parliament dominated by these men renews itself—on the motion of a Labor minister—every year, and every year it becomes a more tired, more stale, more decrepit collection of men and women. I first saw the British House of Commons in 1916, and after a good look at it went straight off to join the army. I have had a look at it at intervals since then, but I have never seen it so pathetically unrepresentative as it is today. Yet it has been officially decided that there shall be no renewal of it during the war, except in so far as members die and are replaced at by-elections.

And even when this happens, the "political truce" implies that there shall be no contest between the old parties. If a Tory dies, some other Tory is nominated. If he is opposed by an independent, the Labor and Liberal parties support the Tory, somewhat tepidly. The Communists support him actively and noisily and in the interests of "national unity." They sometimes find this very difficult: during the period when their paper, the Daily Worker, was suppressed they had to support, at Wallasey, a Tory who openly stated he approved of the paper's suppression as against a Socialist independent who condemned the suppression. But they managed it. They have managed even more difficult things—for instance, support for the ex-members of the Anglo-German Fellowship, the Link, and other semi-fascist bodies, put up as by-election candidates by the Tory party machine. For this machine is still Chamberlainite or worse; of scores of Tory candidates put up at by-elections none have come from the progressive wing of the party and only a very few can even be considered supporters of Mr. Churchill within that party.

When a Labor M. P. dies he is usually replaced by the trade-union official next on the list to be pensioned off. The average age of the Labor members in Parliament is even higher than that of the Tories: it is nearly ten years above the average age of the Parliament of 1914, and that was above the age at which human beings cease normally to learn anything.

It is possible for America, Australia, New Zealand, and other countries to hold elections in war time. The actual disturbance to the war effort of holding an election in Britain would be small compared with its benefit if it made people feel that they were again democratically represented. But an election here is impossible—not for physical reasons but for psychological reasons. British politicians are hypnotized by the political truce. This truce as first agreed on in 1939 meant only that the older parties would not oppose each other at by-elections. Then when independents began to emerge and one or two got elected, it was held to mean that all three parties should actively support the government candidate. Now it has undergone another extension: the government has announced that no "controversial legislation" will be debated. This means that no post-war planning is possible, even if, as in the case of coal, nationalization is clearly needed for the purposes of the war. An even more extraordinary extension of the truce occurred this month when the Labor Party through its normal machinery chose as its spokesman in the important debate on the King's speech a progressive member, John Parker, secretary of the Fabian Society. The Tories objected that to allow him to speak would be a breach of the political truce, and on Mr. Churchill's own intervention he was tamely replaced by an elderly gentleman acceptable to the Tories.

A general election might of course be sprung on us by those in power if the victories in Africa seemed considerable enough to wipe out the past from the minds of the people. Until this occurs there is no parliamentary outlet except through by-elections. And no Tory members of Parliament have died since May of this year. My friend Sir Richard Acland proposed in the House of Commons last month a "staggered election," a renewal of Parliament by gradual stages, so many M. P.'s retiring at stated intervals. Half the speeches made in the debate echoed the need for some form of renewal of Parliament, but the united party whips won and only seventeen members voted for it.

Under the conditions I have described, the formation of a new political movement is an enormous task. People are restless and frustrated; the feeling that a change is needed breaks out in all sorts of ways. There is a sudden rush of new members into the Fabian Society; all sorts of political pamphlets enjoy large sales; the most popular feature on our radio is the "Brains Trust," an occasionally serious "any questions?" hour; the army is discussing current affairs. And in spite of all the difficulties a new movement, called Common Wealth, is getting on its feet to shape a left-wing movement outside and inside the old parties against the present government and the policy of keeping things as they are.

In The Nation for June 27, 1942, I described some of the hopes on which this new movement was founded. Fulfilment of many of these hopes is not yet within sight. A few months after its formation in July, 1942, J. B. Priestley dropped out of the organization and out of politics. The unusual longevity of the Tory M. P.'s has prevented the Common Wealth group from appearing at by-elections, for it has so far chosen not to oppose Labor candidates indorsed by the government. But it is gathering members and building up considerable support for an immediate policy that includes independence for India (with mediation by the United Nations), nationalization of coal and some armament industries, and a program for greater equality between soldiers and civilians, workers and owners.

This movement, though largely composed of people as insular as the average in Britain, is beginning to feel the need for contact with political forces tending in the same direction outside Britain, particularly in America. The peoples of the United Nations need a new International, a body outside the various governments that will unite the common people. If this war is in fact part of a revolution, the forces on the same side of the mental barricades need to work together. How far have you got toward this in America?

Jim Crow Goes Abroad

BY JOSEPH JULIAN

THE Negro brigadier general, Benjamin O. Davis, was recently sent to England to investigate reports of trouble between white and Negro American troops stationed in the British Isles. After an inspection that lasted only a few days he issued a statement to the effect that the situation had been greatly exaggerated, that generally the boys were getting along fine together; occasionally a few social difficulties might arise, but so far as the army was concerned there was no problem—"white and colored troops are treated as equal, having exactly the same rights and privileges."

It is hard to reconcile General Davis's report with my own observations during my recent two months' stay in England or with what Negro soldiers told me. Technically, it is true about the equal rights and privileges, but prejudice never respects technicalities. Equality cannot be created by a manual of army regulations; the men must feel it and think it and act it. The social difficulties mentioned by General Davis are not isolated cases and should not be considered of no concern to the army. Bad feeling between colored and white troops has military consequences.

Perhaps General Davis did not get around as much as he should have, or perhaps he did not consider it wise to make an issue of the matter at this time. An ugly and dangerous situation does exist, and it impairs the efficiency of the troops and depresses the morale of the entire American Negro population, already near the breaking-point.

It is particularly shocking to observe the Jim Crow bacillus being injected into England, a country without color prejudice, where the people regard Negroes not as menials and comics but as human beings, and are guided in their relations with them by their natural reactions to them as individuals, not as Negroes. The prejudiced white American soldiers are not the only carriers of this germ. Sometimes it seems to have been introduced in England by order of the A. E. F. In a recent issue of the London New Statesman and Nation a correspondent writes:

... orders or requests have been issued by the American military authorities to the townspeople to the effect that white and colored troops should not be permitted in the same civilian canteens. In some cases the townspeople have refused to comply. Partly as a result of this the latter have become extremely annoyed at what is regarded as discrimination against the colored soldiers. As a further result scuffles between white and colored Americans have occurred when Negroes have entered, or tried to enter, dance halls or bars where the white Americans were already disporting themselves. Apparently in one case the white Americans remonstrated with a landlady for serving colored customers. The reply of the woman is significant: "Their money is as good as yours, and we like their company."

The average Briton appreciates the complexities of the Negro question but sees it as purely an American problem. He resents being told that he must develop prejudices.

One night I met an American Negro corporal in Piccadilly Circus, and after I left him jotted down our conversation almost verbatim. I think he simply and eloquently expressed the thoughts and feelings of the average Negro soldier with the A. E. F. in England. Our dialogue ran as follows:

"Got a light?"

"Here y'are."

"Thanks. You American?"

"Yeah."

"So am I. Where you from?"

"Pittsburgh. Where you from?"

"New York."

"I worked at the Savoy in Harlem for a while."

"Oh, I was up there just before I left."

(Brightening) "Yeah? Whose band was playin'?"

"I forget."

"They sent me first out to Oklahoma, an' then back to Fort Dix. I gotta gal out in Brooklyn I went to see one night, just before I come over here. I was a sergeant an' they busted me for it."

"Why?"

"A. W. O. L. She had a kid from me an' I wanted to see 'em both before I came over here. I didn't know if I'd ever come back again, so I wanted to see 'em. I made out an allotment to her."

"That's tough, being busted for that."

"Well, they gotta have rules in an army. I don't blame 'em. I'm a corporal now."

"How do you like it here?"

"Awright—'cept not many colored boys over here. Ya get lonesome sometimes."

"How do they treat you over here?"

"Who, the English?"

"Yes."

"Oh, hell, they treat ya fine. It's in the camp and around we get all the trouble and riots."

"You mean with American soldiers?"

"Yeah. We had three officers resign last week. They just didn't want nuthin' to do with us."

"White officers?"

"Yeah. Lot a them white boys still look at us like we ain't nuthin'—just to shine their shoes. They walk away from me when I walk down the street. They go out when I come into a pub for a drink. They change their seats when I sit down in a movie. Hell, sometimes I think maybe sometime one of these guys'll be needin' a drink from my flask—maybe lyin' wounded an' bleedin' and dyin'. I told one of my white officers that, and he growled at me and said, 'You just leave 'em there bleedin', don't touch 'em.' So I'll leave 'em. I'll leave 'em bleed and bleed till they die."

[At this moment two drunken white sailors staggered up to us. One of them plopped his arm on the Corporal's shoulder and said, "Darky, we're absolutely broke; could ya let us have something? We haven't a shilling t'our name." Without a moment's reflection he reached in his pocket, took out a half-crown, and put it in the sailor's hand.]

"I have a friend [he continued] came over here in 1936 with a band—white fellow—married an English girl. I was talkin' to them one day. He went across the street to get a paper. I stayed talkin' to his wife. Three white American soldiers come by—seen me talkin' to a white girl, and they ripped her fur piece off an' tore it up to pieces."

"Do you go into any of the American Service clubs here, Red Cross Club, and so forth?"

"I just keep by myself. I don't go lookin' for trouble no more. But sometimes when I have to stay in London overnight, see I drive a truck down here from where I'm stationed in Birmingham 'bout once a week, an' when I gotta stay over, I go over to the British soldiers' club an' they put me up. They treat you much better than at the American clubs. When the Americans do give you a bed, they make you feel they don't want to give it to you."

"How do most of you boys feel about the war?"

"I think most of us feel it don't matter much what happens. We just know we have to fight, so we fight."

"I know there's a lot more that has to be done, but don't you think some progress is being made? Negroes are being trained as pilots now, and many more branches of the services are open to them than ever before."

"Yeah, that's right, an', well, maybe after America gets a little messin' around, and gets bombed up some, it'll be better. They just been having it too easy, too much to eat an' everything. Maybe after they get messed up some, they'll begin to understand, maybe it'll come out awright."

"You feel much more comfortable with English soldiers than Americans?"

"Sure man, they drink with ya, they talk with ya. There ain't no difference with them. I'd like to stay here after the war, except the United States is still your home and you have a feelin' you wanna get back to your home no matter how bad things are there."

"Well, I hope it will work out better for you fellows. That's one thing this war's about—equal rights for all people. So long, soldier, I have to run along."

"So long."

It was the same story with each of the many Negro soldiers I talked to: "The English treat us fine—it's in the camp and around we get all the trouble and riots."

Apparently nothing is being done by the army or any other government agency to remedy the situation except some clumsy attempts at segregation. Instead of some kind of educational program designed to eradicate the color bias by driving home to white soldiers how silly it is to talk about fighting for democracy when they don't mix with colored troops in their own ranks, official policy seems to be, "Keep them apart—as far apart as possible."

Both Russia and Germany have effectively used their ideological commissars to help build their powerful armies. Though we reject their systems of government, we could strengthen our own army tremendously by a similar technique of indoctrination. Let us have in our army commissars of "applied democracy" to keep our own ideology alive in the minds and hearts of soldiers. There is a vital need for such a department, not only as a means of overcoming Jim Crowism but generally to keep the original humane motives of our fighting men alive and integrated with their job of killing.

How Africa Changed the War

BY HERBERT ROSINSKI

ALIGHTNING-LIKE transformation has been wrought in the strategic scene by the events of the past few weeks. Seldom in history has the course of a vast conflict been so dramatically changed by a single, judiciously applied blow. How was it possible that the limited, if brilliantly executed, operations in Africa, the defeat of a fraction of the enemy's forces in an outlying theater of war, could alter so radically the position of forces a hundred times greater than those engaged? The explanation lies in the peculiar strategic pattern of the war.

Viewed in its broadest perspective, the war is a struggle for the great centers of population and production in Europe, Russia, India, and China; for the areas connecting them—the Near East, Burma, and Australasia; and for the control of the sea lanes leading from Great Britain and the United States to their allies and the various sectors of the front. Of these three great objectives the first is obviously the most important. It is in the struggle for the great centers of population and production that both sides have used the bulk of their forces; it is here also that the Axis powers, thanks to the advantages of initiative and interior lines, have scored their main successes over their inadequately prepared and coordinated opponents. They have overrun large and valuable areas and been able temporarily to consolidate them under their rule and for their benefit. In a global war, however, these successes, imposing as they must appear, are less important than the fact that neither in Russia nor in China has the Axis been able to push its victories to a decisive knockout and liquidate the struggle in that sector. As the Axis offensives have bogged down and the decision has been found unattainable in the main arenas, the struggle has tended to shift to the second group of objectives—the pivotal connecting region.

These are inferior in population and resources and offer fewer facilities for the deploying and maintenance of mass armies but have outstanding importance as links between the main areas. Whichever side controls them is more or less able to isolate its opponents in their home bases. To the Axis powers, their occupation has held out the prospect of cutting off Russia and China from outside support and, beyond that, of carrying out a gigantic pincers movement against the central bastion of India. For the Allies, retention of these pivotal areas is a vital necessity if they are to defeat Axis attempts upon the coherence of their front, keep the activities of the two parts of the Axis in separate spheres, and possess springboards for their own eventual counter-offensives.

In this struggle the odds against the Allies have been as heavy as in that for the main centers, for the extent and configuration of these areas have imposed upon the defenders a fatal dispersal of their forces of which the Axis powers have not been slow to avail themselves. In an analysis printed in this journal on November 9, 1940, I pointed out that the conclusion of the military pact between Germany and Japan clearly foreshadowed such developments and that a German offensive in the Near East would try to exploit the unavoidable dispersal of British defense in that area in conjunction with Japanese operations against British positions in the Far East.

That despite these exceedingly favorable conditions Germany and Japan have failed to break up the central Allied position around the Indian Ocean must be ascribed mainly to the energy of the Viceroy of India, Lord Linlithgow, whose skilful statesmanship has not received the recognition due it. Whether the fall of Burma could have been prevented if his efforts for the construction of a strategic railway between Burma and India had met with better success it is difficult to say, but there can be no doubt that it was his acute realization of the danger and his energetic insistence upon prompt and adequate counter-measures which brought about the successful reduction of Axis-fomented intrigues in Iraq and Iran. Why Hitler failed to follow up his successes in the Balkans, Crete, and Libya by pushing on into the Near East, overwhelming the weak and badly shaken British defense, and isolating Russia on the south, before he launched his main offensive against Russia in the west, remains the greatest strategic mystery of this war.

Even so, Rommel's threat to Egypt and the possibility that the Axis main forces would drive down through Turkey or the Caucasus left the Allies in a most precarious position in the Near East. And the situation was made worse by the ascendancy established by Axis air power in the central Mediterranean, which seriously restricted any assistance that might be expected from the naval forces in the eastern Mediterranean. In addition, the closing of the Mediterranean to merchant shipping and the consequent necessity to use the route around the Cape imposed a heavy strain upon the Allies' already overburdened shipping facilities.

With this strategic framework of the war in mind, we can see clearly the significance of the new move. By eliminating the western arm of the Axis pincers menacing the Near East the Allies have finally secured their grip on that vital area. Once the Axis powers have lost their foothold on the southern shore of the Mediterranean, they will be in no position to attempt to regain it in the teeth of Allied sea and air superiority. Behind that safe moat all North Africa will become one huge Allied base. Moreover, the reopening of the direct route through the Mediterranean under an umbrella of Allied air power will release several million tons of shipping and speed up the reinforcement of the entire Indian Ocean sector. Thus reinforced and with their Western flank made safe, the armies in India will be able to prepare for the reconquest of the vital Burmese area.

By this consolidation of the central belt from Morocco to Burma the Allies will not only have secured themselves against the destructive strategy of the two Axis groups but have gained the power to turn that strategy against its authors with a vengeance. Safely based along the African shore and protected by adequate aerial support, Allied sea power for the first time in this war will be able to pass to the offensive on a large and effective scale.

The advantages of the Mediterranean region over the Atlantic coastline of Europe for the launching of the Allied counter-offensive are not restricted to the absence of those formidable fortifications with which in the north access to all likely landing points has been barred to the invader; nor are they to be found in the less tenacious resistance to be expected from the Latin member of the Axis. They consist above all in the incomparably greater opportunities offered by the Inland Sea for the isolation and separate annihilation of the enemy's forces. In the north any major Allied offensive, wherever attempted, would run into a continuous block of enemy territory stretching from the Pyrenees to Norway, an area served by a most highly developed system of roads, railways, and waterways, permitting the enemy to concentrate greatly superior forces at any threatened point in a minimum time. In the Mediterranean area, on the other hand, communications between the various sectors of the enemy's front line are severely limited, owing in part to the deeply indented coastline and in part to the paucity of means of transportation. Conditions are favorable for the isolation and capture of a large number of important Axis positions—Sardinia, Sicily, the Peloponnesus, Crete—by the judicious exploitation of Allied naval and aerial superiority.

From the vantage-points thus gained it should prove not too difficult to extend the offensive to sections of the mainland and thus, step by step, to force the enemy back in a series of strictly limitable operations, without committing the outcome to a single, irretrievable action as would inevitably be the case in the north. Through these moves, plus the constant menace of an invasion from Great Britain, the enemy can be subjected to a continuous strategic squeeze play and shorn of the power of effective retaliation.

The military possibilities of thus turning the enemy's own methods against him are perhaps no greater than the psychological repercussions that may be expected. Of the effect on Italian morale few will entertain much doubt. In Germany too, although that country will be less immediately threatened, the memory of the sudden collapse of German resistance in the summer of 1918, when the imperial armies were still standing far in enemy territory, must haunt many millions, undermining their determination even though desperation makes them go on.

As the Allies advance in the Mediterranean and Axis defeat in the West becomes more and more imminent, the leaders of Japan will have to choose between preparing to sell their hides as dearly as possible or trying to reach a negotiated peace while they still have something to offer. The militarists at present in control are unlikely to decide on the latter alternative, but the situation must surely look different to the court circles, bureaucrats, and representatives of big business who have been temporarily pushed into the background by the militarists. These groups retain sufficient influence to be able to step forward and reassume leadership in an emergency, and in the sacred person of the Emperor they would command the only authority capable of reconciling the Japanese people to the collapse of all their expectations.

While the perspectives opened up in every direction by the new development are great enough to justify the wave of enthusiasm which has swept over the United Nations, the road to victory will still be long and hard. What has happened is this: a fraction of the German-Italian forces, separated from the bulk of their strength by the Mediterranean and half-isolated by Allied sea and air power, has been overwhelmed and through the simultaneous landing of Allied forces in French North Africa threatened with complete annihilation or ejection. If this can be achieved, the Allies will have gained an excellent base for the launching of their main offensive against the bulk of the enemy's forces. Success here will offer them the opportunity to utilize their superior sea power to impose battle upon the enemy under disadvantageous conditions in a series of isolated or semi-isolated encounters. To follow up these advantages, however, and press them home against the enemy's main forces near the centers of his strength will require an effort incomparably larger than that of the present preparatory campaign, an effort that will tax the strength of the Allies to the utmost. The main task lies before us, and we should not forget that in war, until the final decision has been won, every success counts only in so far as it is exploited to secure the final victory.

AUTONOMOUS

BY MARK VAN DOREN

In jealousy of cause and pride of plan
He thinks he made himself, this happy man.
He was the decider; picked a year,
A womb to grow in, and a hemisphere;
And when he walked was master of the choice
Who fathered his first gait and tuned his voice.
Of all earth's people to its oddest ends
He summoned these few to be his natural friends;
From out the mist of women he contrived
The stepping forth of one whom then he wived;
And now that sons repeat him it is skill
Rewarded, it is accident of will.
The maple where it stands is proof of seed.
He knows it, and can measure by its need,
Among so many neighbors, a trunk's tallness;
And by its shade the after comer's smallness, Dwarf to its sire. Such things, he says, must be
If soil decides. But he is not a tree;
And thinks that he was present in the dark
When skin was chosen over root and bark.

A PETITION is being circulated in South Carolina requesting the state legislature to make the public display of a picture of Abraham Lincoln an offense punishable by a fine of $50 or thirty days in prison. "You wouldn't hang a picture of Hitler or Tojo in a public building, would you?" asks the Anderson Independent, which favors the idea. "Any person guilty of such a thing would be tarred and feathered. But neither Tojo nor Hitler has done as much damage to the South as Abe Lincoln did." The man who started the petition, incidentally, is named Lynchfield.

FROM A LETTER in a recent issue of Time: "In the event of a Japanese invasion of the Pacific Coast what would be the effect in the occupied territory upon: (1) the titles of real estate; (2) equities of corporations in occupied territory; (3) United States currency and bank accounts?"

FERDINAND EBERSTADT, vice-chairman of the War Production Board, was urged to add some labor representatives to his staff. "I don't need to," he said. "If I want to know anything about labor, all I need to do is ask my old friend Matthew Woll."

MARSHALL FIELD'S Chicago Sun has not broken Colonel McCormick's hold over Chicago, but it is standing the gaff better than the Tribune's former competitors, all now extinct. The Sun's circulation is at present about 200,000, and it is rising at the rate of about 10,000 a month.

FROM AN ARTICLE in the American Mercury called Credo of an Old-Fashioned Conservative, by George Barton Cutten, ex-president of Colgate University: "I suppose if God had 'the open mind' and should become a radical instead of the conservative He is, the girl babies would now be born with hair-line eyebrows, purple fingernails, and crimson toenails. But no, the girl babies come along no different from what they were ten thousand years ago. . . . What a jaundiced muddle this world would be if God should cease to be conservative and permit acquired characteristics to be transmitted."

ACCORDING TO the London News-Chronicle, the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce is opposing a proposed municipal regulation because under it "women would be compelled to go out in the blackout and fight fires with strange men."

THE CHRISTIAN FRONT in Boston, one of the largest centers of Coughlinite agitation, became the Citizens' Constitutional Committee during the recent election and will carry on under that name. The Committee was set up chiefly to fight against a token resolution on world federation which was on the ballot in forty-two Massachusetts districts.

Crisis of Confidence

NEARLY a month has passed since the democratic front found itself favored with the presence of Darlan as one of the new fighters for the Four Freedoms, and it is time to assay calmly the value of so hotly debated a maneuver. As in every operation of this kind, two aspects are involved: the military and the political. On military grounds the Eisenhower enthusiasts have been strongly supported by the facts. That Dakar and West Africa have come over to the bicephalic Admiral, who with one eye smiles at the Allies and with the other at Marshal Pétain, has given them an apparently unanswerable argument. Those who still see in the acquisition of Darlan some dark spots, even in the purely military field, have been overwhelmed by the fabulous record of thousands of square miles of ports and bases, of richness in ships and rubber and other raw materials—won overnight, without a single shot.

It might be claimed that the African campaign is not yet over, and that the difficulties ahead are considerable. A certain restraint might be justified in anticipation of new developments which may test severely the loyalty of the new allies. But we are not qualified to discuss this point. And it is not even our desire to try to moderate the joy of the generals whose job is to win a battle in the least possible time and with the fewest possible losses. Let us, therefore, assume for the sake of argument that from a military point of view the winning of Darlan was a master-stroke.

But if, in the military field, the apologists of the Darlan collaboration can cut down every critic with the testimony of the facts, in the political field the facts speak with equal eloquence on the other side. Wherever it has been possible to register popular reactions, the effect produced by the Darlan appointment has been calamitous. Perhaps the country in which the reaction has been least bad is the United States itself. This is a phenomenon worthy of a lengthy study, but one in which it is not difficult to perceive powerful reflections of isolationist thinking. People who on the eve of Pearl Harbor did not realize the danger coming from Japan can hardly be expected to realize today the danger involved in taking an undesirable like Darlan and investing him with superior authority.

Everywhere else depression and bewilderment have been dominant. A Council of Political War—had there been one—would have registered the tremendous damage already done to the cause of the United Nations in the occupied countries, in the few neutral countries still

To measure accurately the political damage, we must take into account the fact that from the beginning the cause of the United Nations has carried the dead weight of a very deep mistrust in regard to the character and objectives of the present struggle. If that mistrust has not expressed itself more strongly, it is because the hate of Hitler and the clear conviction that to destroy him is a matter of life and death have restrained people from any criticism which could affect adversely the course of the war. But there are millions who greeted with enthusiasm the Atlantic Charter and the noble speeches of the President and of Vice-President Wallace, yet felt mercilessly shaken on the following day by all the contradictions which cloud the policy of the United Nations. For, as Mr. Willkie said in his Toronto speech, "this war is either a 'grand coalition' of peoples, fighting a common war for liberation, or it is nothing."

The truth must be courageously spoken. And the truth is that even today, in the midst of the struggle, millions of people are tortured by the idea that out of this war may come, not a better world than followed the last war, but perhaps a much worse one. They look around. They see men in the ministries, in the foreign offices, speaking publicly about democracy and enjoying the double game of collaborating with all the half-fascists while ignoring or discarding altogether proved anti-fascists.

For the cause of the democratic fight it was a great risk to leave such men, compromised by years of mistakes, hesitations, and, in some cases, pro-fascist inclinations, in prominent posts in the democratic front. But from the moment that those same men defied the democratic feeling of the peoples of the democratic nations by indulging in all kinds of small Metternich-like tricks, the crisis of confidence acquired the most disquieting proportions.

The war is not yet finished. The Allied troops are not yet nearing the German border. The moment has not been reached when the diplomatic technicians and the professional politicians can risk a cynical shrug as their only answer to the disappointment of the people. Difficult crises lie ahead of us in which the people will be needed quite as much as all the war materials that all the United Nations can produce. And for the people it will not be a Darlan, even as an occasional guest of the democracies, that will keep alive their enthusiasm and restore their confidence.

Political Value of the German Emigration

[There can be no serious talk of political war that does not take into account political war inside Germany. Information on Germany's internal situation is hard to check, but the consensus of opinion as to the likelihood of an effective opposition is most discouraging. It should be possible, however, to gauge the political value of the German emigration. We have asked a political refugee, at present not associated with any party, to present the problem and to formulate a few questions. Representatives of the various groups will be asked to reply.]

HITLER'S war on his adversaries inside the German state has reproduced in exile the whole range of political creeds whose confusion speeded the downfall of the Weimar republic. In the ranks of the emigration are such diverse elements as early National Socialists who complain that Hitler has betrayed socialism and industrialists whose urge for conquest never went beyond the subjugation of the labor unions, Social Democrats who blame the fall of the republic on the Communists and Communists whose single criterion for any action is its effect on the Soviet Union, defenders of capitalist democracy and Catholics of the center who expounded democracy by decree.

It seems strange that in the turmoil of wars, invasions, surrenders, and escapes the original cleavages of these political groups should have been so little affected. All political emigrations are burdened with internal dissensions, but in most a strong common purpose acts as solvent; for citizens of the conquered countries the unifying element is the fight for national deliverance. Why is it, then, that the common hope of all German anti-Nazis—the collapse of Hitler's power—has proved so weak a bond?

In no other country is the national destiny so closely bound up with the solution of its social problems. Every German political émigré knows that the great social conflicts which the Weimar republic pretended to ignore—and which Hitler has pretended to resolve in his caricature of a people's state—will come to the fore again the moment the Nazi fiction of the Volksgemeinschaft breaks down. But the émigrés are preparing no answer. They refuse to recognize that the fight against Hitler is a fight on the issue of socialism. Having themselves no common social goal, they have no basis for common action.

To hope that from the ashes of the Third Reich there will arise a new Germany free from all links with the past is sheer romance. But to assume, on the other hand, that the German people are only awaiting the day when they will again be led by the statesmen of the Weimar coalition is the privilege of political rentiers who see in the Hitler dictatorship nothing more than an unfortunate episode. Post-Hitler Germany will present in a most acute form all the problems that the reconstruction of Europe will have to face. That is why a mature political leadership in the German emigration could help to clear a way through the fog of ideologies and emotions to a saner future.

But instead of meeting the challenge with conviction and courage, the leading groups of the German emigration are playing the diplomatic game. Where they should speak of the social prerequisites of a German democracy they repeat the reactionary nonsense of foreign education for the German people. Their contribution to any real comprehension of the phenomenon of National Socialism is nil; whatever has been done in this field is the work of a few independent men who have freed themselves from the time-honored clichés.

The more tenuous the home ties of the émigré groups become, the more shadowy the remains of their political influence the more each one endeavors to win official recognition as the chosen representative of the new Germany. They do not seem to know that their future position will depend not on their good connections in foreign government offices but on the confidence which their activities inspire in the German masses.

Ten years have not effaced the memory of the ignominious capitulation of the leaders of German anti-fascism. Nothing will bring back what they lost save their own will to fight for it, and they can draw strength only from the support of the workers and soldiers of Germany.

It is not surprising that fear, need, and cynicism have warped the fighting fiber of anti-fascist refugees. Perhaps it is only human of them to choose to speak the language that will please official ears rather than run the risk of losing their last refuge. But a people's war cannot be won or a people's peace prepared by such tactics.

FOUR QUESTIONS TO GERMANS

It might be profitable to invite discussion on certain basic questions which will have to be settled before the German left can hope to find a platform for political action. I suggest consideration of the following points:

1. What forces in Germany—besides the Nazi Party—do you consider a menace to the peace of the world and to the freedom of the German people? How would you propose to deal with these forces?
2. Are you for a unilateral disarming of Germany and the policing and reeducating of the German people from outside?
3. Are the German people responsible for the material damage caused by Hitler's armies in the occupied countries? Are they under moral obligation to make restitution?

DEMOCRACY'S NEW ALLIES

4. What kind of relations do you advocate between post-Hitler Germany and the Soviet Union?

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THERE is as yet nothing to indicate how the invasion of North Africa has affected the Stimmung in Germany—the mood and sentiments of the people. Internal propaganda shows a tendency to sheer away from the main point in peripheral arabesques. For instance, Herr Fritsche, the radio favorite, has thought up a fable in which the African campaign is linked to a dark money-making scheme. The English, according to this tale, arrived in Africa with billions of counterfeit French notes, secretly printed by the Bank of England. In some unexplained manner a quarrel will soon break out between Britain and the United States over whether French North Africa shall be joined to the pound bloc or the dollar bloc. Small fortunes will be made by the Algerian Jews, and of course great fortunes will be piled up in London and New York. This idiotic story gives an idea of what efforts are being made to conceal the character of the African dish with strange, highly spiced sauces.

When the present situation is touched on, the official theme is still the strength of the European fortress: it was planned to launch an invasion of Europe from Algeria, but the attempt was repulsed; the fortress has been proved impregnable. A new word has been coined to fit the case—South Wall, recalling the famous West Wall between Germany and France. By occupying the rest of France the Germans have erected an unassailable South Wall between the fortress of Europe and its would-be attackers. For the present it is impossible to say how well this not unskillfully elaborated thesis bolsters German spirits.

That the Stimmung is worse than ever before is certain. For if we have no concrete information about how the people took the news of the second phase of the African offensive, the American invasion, some interesting material is at hand showing how they reacted to the first phase, the British advance in Libya. The landings in Algeria and Morocco were made in November. Rommel was defeated some time before, in October. Now in October the Nazi press suddenly began to be filled with vehement attacks on the pessimists, the defeatists, the rumor-mongers. Analysis of a large number of newspapers shows that for every article of this kind printed in September, 4.2 such articles appeared in October.

For the most part the loose talk against which the articles were directed was not ordinary gossip about domestic matters, though that also came in for condemnation. The Thüringer Gauzeitung, for example, on October 8 declaimed against the many "strictly confidential stories about the household and clothes of high-placed personages." And in the Oldenburgischen Staatszeitung of October 11 a district leader denounced the habit of casting aspersions on the Winter Aid. "People are always wondering," he said, "what is done with all the money that is collected; the wildest rumors concerning it are going around." More of the papers loosed their thunder against rumors about the war. To illustrate:

The Freiheitskampf devoted its lead article on October 8 to the "perverse human scum whose pitiful vestiges of gray matter have so shriveled away that the miserable cowards dare to make a joke of our victory."

In the Rostocker Anzeiger of October 6 the district leader published this announcement: "Irresponsible elements in Mecklenburg are circulating rumors which must be stopped at once. Those who spread them must be rebuked, and all loose talk must be suppressed."

The Thüringer Zeitung for October 8 said: "A great many people are talking too much about the Stimmung in Germany. They think that the final round of the war will be decided by the Stimmung in the various countries. They examine Stimmung barometers and discuss the trend with gloating thoroughness."

The Oldenburgische Zeitung of October 10 complained: "We know our people. We know how their credulousness was shamefully exploited before. Once more our enemies are trying to undermine our faith." The Essener Nationalzeitung of October 10 warned against the "borers" and those "who listen to the broadcasts from London." The Rheinisch-Westfälische Zeitung on the same day referred to the "contagious disease caught by persons who listen to the London radio."

The Hakenkreuz-Banner on October 25 contained an outburst against people who can always see more than appears on the surface. "When they get a letter from the front they draw all sorts of conclusions from it. When they read a newspaper they look for what is said between the lines. If rations are increased, they know it is only done to boost the Stimmung; therefore the situation must be serious. If rations are decreased, it is clear that affairs must have reached a critical pass. They hear that troops are going through to the east, and assume disaster; or to the west—that looks very bad too."

Such quotations could be continued for several columns. Yet in October no one in Germany had any presentiment of Algeria or Morocco or Tunisia; only in Libya had anything happened. Rommel's defeat, however, was enough to bring to the surface the underlying mood of doubt and pessimism in all classes. The quotations merely confirm what we have long known from other sources. It cannot be doubted that an increasingly large number of Germans suffer from chronic gloom about the war.

Gandhi, Cripps, and Churchill

BY LOUIS FISCHER

[The following article is Mr. Fischer's rebuttal of the arguments advanced by Graham Spry in The Nation for November 14. These, in turn, were Mr. Spry's answer to Mr. Fischer's analysis of "Why Cripps Failed," which appeared in The Nation for September 19 and 26.]

GRAHAM SPRY'S reply is superficially clever but entirely unconvincing. Mr. Spry flatly denies my explanation of the failure of the Cripps mission to India in March-April, 1942. His denial was cabled from Sir Stafford Cripps's office in London to the British embassy in Washington, which submitted it to The Nation. Knowing that modern man is skeptical of official denials, Spry undertakes to prove his denial. That is where he fails.

Spry's chief point is that the Congress Party's rejection of the Cripps offer did not mention the promise of the Indian National Government, which I believe Cripps made and then withdrew. "This," Spry writes, "is itself conclusive that no promise was made at the beginning of the negotiations." It is in no sense conclusive. The Congress Party adopted its resolution rejecting the British War Cabinet's proposal on April 1 and gave the resolution to Cripps on April 3. The rejection was complete. Congress, nevertheless, suggested that the resolution remain unpublished and that the negotiations continue. But why should Congress have wished to continue the talks after having unconditionally rejected the offer which Cripps brought from London? Does this not show that Cripps had offered them something which was not in the London government's draft? The Congress resolution rejected the written draft, but it could not in the same resolution mention the promise of a National Government because it was not rejecting the promised government. It was going on with the negotiations because of that promise. On the part of Congress this was a very skilful way of conducting the negotiations: by rejecting the written proposals from London it indicated to Cripps that the success of his mission depended on his keeping the oral promise.

I hate to accuse Spry of disingenuousness, and I am not doing so. But he comes dangerously near it when he says: "The statements of the Congress resolution quite specifically deny Fischer's thesis. They read: 'The British War Cabinet's proposals are vague, altogether incomplete, and there would appear to be no vital changes in the present structure contemplated.'" This very text proves that Congress was criticizing and rejecting the British War Cabinet's written proposals and not the oral promise which Cripps made in New Delhi to Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, president of the Congress Party.

That promise was not made on March 25 when Azad first went to Cripps to receive the draft offer and, as Spry says, to listen to explanations. This was not a "talk." The conversations, according to Spry himself, came after this preliminary contact. First, on March 27, Gandhi saw Cripps. Gandhi, as he told me later, "found nothing good" in the written proposals and said so to Cripps. But he asked Cripps "to perform a miracle," to do something which would save the situation and lead to a settlement. Faced with the collapse of the mission to which he attached so much personal and political importance, Sir Stafford went beyond his written proposals and told Congress representatives that India could have a National Government which would function as a Cabinet and not be subject to the Viceroy's veto.

On March 29 Cripps gave his first interview to the Indian press. Scores of newspapermen were present, and a stenographic record of Cripps's statements was later given to the papers. All newspapers quoted Cripps as saying that India could have an immediate "Cabinet" government. Now especially in an Englishman's mouth, "Cabinet" means a responsible government of ministers and not an advisory council of men whose wishes the Viceroy might veto.

In the third paragraph of his reply, Spry asserts vehemently that "Cripps did not make, did not seek to make, to any Indian political leaders any promise of National or Cabinet government with full powers in the war period," and thereafter throughout his cabled article Spry stresses that there is no evidence of "a promise of full Cabinet government" having been made, that Congress leaders realized that "complete war-time powers had not been promised," "that Cabinet or National government with full powers was not under discussion." Is this what Spry is denying? He is wasting cable tolls. I never said anything about "full" or "complete" powers. Spry has set up a man of straw in order to knock him down. No Congress leader expects England to quit India during the war, and no Congress leader asked or expected a National Government with "full" powers. The entire course of the negotiations showed that. Congress negotiators said repeatedly, as Azad wrote to Cripps on April 10, that "the [British] commander-in-chief in India would have control of the armed forces and the conduct of operations and other matters connected therewith. . . . We have no desire to upset in the middle of the war the present military organization or arrangements." In view of the wide scope of the commander-in-chief's activities, it is obvious that Congress never anticipated "full" powers for the Indian National Government. The prolonged talks about a defense formula sought to demarcate the separate functions of the Indian Defense Minister on the one hand and of the British commander-in-chief on the other. Then why does Spry talk about a promise of "full" powers? Just to deny a statement I never made?

Hoping to salvage his mission, thinking that the reactionary imperialists in England who are his enemies had been deflated and frightened by the severe British military reverses in the Far East, Cripps offered the Indians a National Government which would try to enlist Indians in support of the war. Then he was subjected to pressure from behind the scenes. The dichotomy which resulted becomes manifest in Cripps's letter of April 7 to Azad (published with other documents in the Congress "White Paper"). In this letter Cripps says he hopes "it will be possible for His Excellency the Viceroy to embark forthwith upon the task of forming the new National Government in consultation with the leaders of Indian opinion." That is the way national governments are formed in European democracies, by a constitutional chief executive consulting the party leaders. But in the same letter Cripps also speaks of "the Viceroy's Executive Council." An Executive Council is not a Cabinet. Cripps was being pulled in two directions. The next day matters were cleared up for him. Cripps had received a Congress defense formula which used the expression "National Cabinet." On April 8, according to Spry, Cripps "deleted the term 'National Cabinet' and made his own position once again clear beyond any possible doubt by inserting the words 'Executive Council.' . . ."

If Mr. Spry will reread his own article he will find that this assertion contains a serious inaccuracy. For he says farther on that "this formula had been originally drafted by the Viceroy. . . ." Of course the Viceroy did not want a National Government. We are now in the area of the cleavage between Cripps, who wanted to bring about a settlement, and others who opposed real concessions to the Indian independence movement. Incidentally, I never charged Cripps with bad faith. He did not withdraw his promise because he had made it without sincerity; he withdrew it because he was stabbed in the back by Englishmen who differed with him.

On April 9, Spry says, Congress accepted the defense formula, and it looked as if Cripps's mission was going to succeed. He tells of the rejoicing of Congress people over this success. Then why did the negotiations break down? This is what Spry never explains. He rejects my explanation. But where is his? He declares that on April 9 Azad and Nehru called on Cripps to "convey their acceptance of the defense formula. In this long interview they raised the whole issue of the powers of the Viceroy and insisted that the Viceroy should act as constitutional monarch only." Naturally. Azad and Nehru explained that they were ready to defend India in cooperation with the British, but what about the National Government in which the Indian Defense Minister would function? In other words, they did not quite accept the Viceroy's defense formula. They accepted it provided there was a National Government. Then why did they rejoice? Because they had assumed that this would present no difficulties. Had not Cripps promised it to them? If Cripps had never spoken to them of a National Government and if they had all understood they were negotiating about their future roles in the Viceroy's Executive Council, how could the misunderstanding have arisen so late in the talks?

Among many reasons which I adduced in my original articles for believing that Cripps did promise India an immediate National Government, was that when Azad quoted that promise in his letter to Cripps of April 11, Cripps's letter in reply never denied the promise. Now Spry contends that Cripps's first letter of April 11—he wrote two letters to Azad that day—gave the reasons why a National Government was impossible. True. But it did not deny the promise. It merely explained why the promise could not be kept, and we are therefore entitled to think that Cripps had been convinced behind the scenes that he would not be allowed to keep it.

There are, then, two Azad letters to Cripps, dated April 10 and April 11. In both Azad quotes the exact words in which Cripps had promised an Indian National Government immune to the Viceroy's veto. Cripps answered both on April 11. In neither did he deny the promise.

In New Delhi, on May 24, I had a long conversation with Jawaharlal Nehru, a prince among men and a militant anti-fascist at a time when many members of the present British government—not Cripps, of course—were fawning on Hitler and Mussolini and appeasing Japan. Nehru said that Cripps, it seemed to him, "was not a free agent." Early in the conferences, Nehru told me, Cripps had spoken of a National Government with the Viceroy playing a role like that of the British King and not interfering in government affairs. "Later," Nehru continued, "Cripps withdrew this, I believe under threats of resignation which Wavell and the Viceroy telegraphed to Churchill."

In Wardha, on June 10, Azad said to me: "Cripps definitely told me that the new government would be a Cabinet with the Viceroy acting as the King did in England. We had not discussed the composition of the government, but we expected that the Viceroy would appoint it after consultation with the parties. Congress did not think it would have a majority in the Cabinet. When Cripps arrived in India, we asked him whether his proposals went beyond the Amery declaration of August, 1940, which promised an enlarged Viceroy's Executive Council, and Cripps replied: 'You don't believe I would have come all the way to India to bring you no more than that.' " Azad is the greatest authority on the Moslem religion in India.

In Bombay, on June 24, I interviewed Rajagopalachari, than whom there is no more honest man in Europe or Asia. He favored the acceptance of the Cripps proposals no matter how little they gave, and he differs so much with Gandhi that he is not supporting the current civil-disobedience campaign. He said to me: "Let me recapitulate the Cripps negotiations for you. He began by offering us a National Government."

I said: "Did you understand that Cripps was offering you a responsible Cabinet government not subject to the Viceroy's veto?"

Rajagopalachari: "Yes. We did not go into detail. Then we discussed defense. . . . When we returned to the question of the National Government, Cripps told us it would be subject to the Viceroy's veto. On this we broke."

Will Cripps say that Nehru, Azad, and Rajagopalachari lie? Do the documents lie? Did all the journalists who heard him say "Cabinet" government lie?

Spry contends that in war time it would have been impossible to introduce the constitutional changes necessitated by a responsible National Government. The Congress leaders would have preferred to see such changes, and they always cite Churchill's June, 1940, offer of union with France as contemplating a much more radical change. But they would have been satisfied with Cripps's own solution: at his March 29 press conference Cripps stated that "a good deal could be done by changing the conventions or adopting new ones—he particularly mentioned that the Executive Council could become a Cabinet." The constitution could remain unaltered for a while, but the Viceroy's veto would cease to exist. That would be the new convention. Why, Spry, was that Cripps suggestion not carried out?

Spry asserts that an Indian National Government would not have been a responsible government, since it could not have been overthrown or replaced. There is a difficulty here, but it is surmountable with British goodwill. The Cabinet might have been made responsible to the provincial legislatures of India, which are elected by popular vote. The Cabinet might have been made responsible to the several Indian political parties, and Cripps recognized the great influence of at least one of those parties—Congress—by conducting his key conferences in India with it. But to whom is the present British government of India responsible? Nobody in India. Who in India can remove it? And since when are the British in India so concerned about responsibility? Only a few weeks ago Mr. Allah Baksh, the Moslem Prime Minister of Sind, responsible to the popularly elected provincial legislature of Sind, relinquished his honorary British titles and criticized the statements of Churchill and Amery on India. The British governor of Sind immediately removed Allah Baksh from office. (I take these facts from the London New Statesman and Nation, edited by my good friend Kingsley Martin, who is now on a visit to the United States. Apparently the British censor in India did not think that the whole truth about the Sind affair was fit for print in America.)

Graham Spry and Kingsley Martin are at pains to prove that the pacifism of Gandhi and the shortcomings of Congress are chiefly or partly to blame for the obstacles to a settlement in India. Is this so? Gandhi urged Cripps to settle the Indian problem. He said to me that he favored an Indian National Government consisting of the Princes, Moslems, and Congress, which would sign an alliance with England or the United Nations to help prosecute the war. He said he does not wish the Axis to win the war. He said if India gets a National Government it may go "war mad." Gandhi knows that Nehru, Azad, and Rajagopalachari are not pacifists and do not believe in non-violence. Rajagopalachari told Herbert L. Matthews the other day (see the New York Times of November 12) that "if Nehru were in a National Government he would not let Gandhi's pacifism get control. He would help win the war." Gandhi is more important than anybody in Congress, but he is not Congress, and if he were sure that India could get partial independence now as a first instalment on complete post-war liberty, I think that though he would not aid the war effort, he would not obstruct it. I believe that pacifists and ex-pacifists are prone to exaggerate Gandhi's readiness to let his pacifism intrude on practical politics.

No, if Sir Stafford Cripps wishes to find the primary difficulty in the Indian situation he does not have to look so far as India. He need merely look across Whitehall to 10 Downing Street, where Winston Churchill lives and works. On November 10 Churchill told an audience in London that England has no desire for more territory, but "we mean to hold our own." That applies to India. "I have not become the King's First Minister," Churchill continued, "in order to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire." That is really why Cripps failed.

Constitutional Practices vs. Constitutional Revolution

A NEW CONSTITUTION NOW. By Henry Hazlitt.
Whittlesey House. $2.50.

THIS is another "now" book, although it would seem that Mr. Hazlitt intends his title to be taken in a somewhat Pickwickian sense, inasmuch as he admits that his proposal, besides being revolutionary in itself, would require a virtual revolution to put it across—and revolutions, even in such revolutionary times as these, are apt to take time.

The proposal which Mr. Hazlitt urges is by no means a new one in its general outlines, but it has never before been advocated with quite such insistency or on this scale in terms of paper and ink. In brief, Mr. Hazlitt wishes to see our present "Presidential" or "Congressional" system (it is today the former rather than the latter) replaced by the British "Cabinet" system with some slight modifications. More in detail, our present Congress of two substantially equal chambers would be superseded by one in which the role of the Senate would be reduced to that of discussion and criticism; the President—except for certain ceremonial purposes, would give way to a "Premier" who would be elected by the House of Representatives and would have power, subject to the House's approval, to choose a Cabinet either from its membership or—in part at least—from the outside; the legislative initiative—today divided among the President, the numerous committees of Congress, and the members of the two houses—would be concentrated in the Premier, acting in consultation with his Cabinet; and finally, elections by the calendar, while not done away with, would become of secondary interest. The House would be chosen for four years, but would be subject to dissolution at any time by the Premier, who in turn would be subject to be thrown out of office at any time by an adverse vote of the House unless he was able, by appealing to the electorate, to secure a House which would support him.

What is Mr. Hazlitt's argument for his revolutionary proposal? In a few words it is that the tension which exists under our system of checks and balances between the President and Congress exposes us in normal times either to irresponsiveness to the public need for legislative reforms, when the President prefers the role of King Log, or to government by whim when he casts himself as King Stork, Congress being in either case unable to provide an effective leadership capable of commanding the backing of the country as a whole. And in times of crisis, such as the present, the situation becomes indefinitely worse, for then the country is constantly forced to choose between deadlock and dictatorship, and of course plumps for the latter, inevitably.

That there is an undesirable amount of truth to this arraignment of our constitutional system no candid and informed person would undertake to deny; and Mr. Hazlitt is able to point his argument by a telling reference in his Preface to the President's Labor Day address to Congress, in which he informed that body that unless it repealed a certain statutory provision pronto, he would do the job himself—and Congress complied without a word of protest. At the same time, I remain unconvinced that the President's threat thus to suspend the Constitution for the duration ("When the war is won the powers under which I act automatically revert to the people—to whom they belong") was a necessary outcome of the Constitution's shortcomings. Rather, it seems to me to have been the result of some extremely bad advice.

Evaluating Mr. Hazlitt's brief for his proposal in the light of events of the past decade, I feel that it indulges in rather too much exaggeration to be as effective as it might have been. Thus his stock example of deadlock is the Senate's rejection of the Treaty of Versailles, although that was confirmed overwhelmingly by "a great and solemn referendum" of exactly the kind that would naturally have occurred had the system Mr. Hazlitt proposes been in operation. Likewise, he brings forward as a particularly black example of Presidential whim Mr. Roosevelt's court proposal of February 5, 1937—which was defeated! And the important changes which the "two-party system"—if there still is such a system—has undergone in both Great Britain and the United States in recent years, especially on account of the political consolidation of group and class interests, go practically ignored. Indeed, it seems to be assumed that this system functions in the United States today in precisely the same way as it did in the Britain of Disraeli and Gladstone.

But the book also advocates a number of less sweeping reforms, either as marking steps toward the greater consummation or as rendering life more livable under existing arrangements. One of these is that present methods of amending the Constitution ought to be replaced by a less cumbersome and more democratic method. Such a proposal would have had much greater significance two generations ago, when sectional differences were much more pronounced. Today an amendment which has back of it a majority of the electorate of the country as a whole is fairly likely to have a majority in a sufficient number of states to secure its adoption. The fact is that Mr. Hazlitt attaches undue importance to this method of adapting the Constitution to changed conditions, arguing that it is more "candid" than interpretation, the method which our constitutional practice has always preferred. Such a view is naive to say the least. Either constitutional provisions must be couched in terms which unavoidably leave considerable discretion to their official interpreters, or the Constitution must in time take on, as Marshall put it, "the prolixity of a code." Naive, too, is Mr. Hazlitt's further contention that the size of the Supreme Court ought to be frozen by constitutional amendment. On an early page of his volume Mr. Hazlitt stigmatizes that "strange form of national self-distrust" which tries "to protect ourselves against our own future knowledge." The proposal just mentioned is an apt, if unintentioned, illustration of this national shortcoming.

Mr. Hazlitt would also like to see treaties ratified by a majority vote of both House and Senate instead of by a two-thirds vote of the latter. The Joint Resolution of June, 1934, by which the President was authorized by a majority vote of the two houses to accept membership for the United States in the International Labor Organization, not to mention certain recent decisions of the court (see, for example, United States v. Belmont, 301 U. S. 324; 1937), seems to show that we are already well on the way to just that change in constitutional practice, and without the aid of constitutional amendment.

Yet another reform which Mr. Hazlitt advocates is the creation of a legislative council comprising members of both houses of Congress and of both the principal parties, and the submission to this body in the first instance of all important legislative proposals. An approximation to this commendably constructive suggestion is at this very moment being urged by certain members of Congress, and might easily carry with some encouragement from the White House. It is interesting to note, in further demonstration of what is possible under the Constitution as it exists today, that there is nothing to prevent a President from choosing his Cabinet from the membership of such a legislative council instead of, as today, from the heads of the great administrative departments.

The revolutionary program which Mr. Hazlitt wrote his book primarily to urge will hardly come about until constitutional practice under the present system shall have better paved the way for it, and in thus paving the way constitutional practice may render the more drastic change unnecessary. Meanwhile, Mr. Hazlitt has done a service in inviting his countrymen, or the section of them whose consideration of such things matters, to try to take some thought of our constitutional morrow. Once the war is won the need of doing this will be even more apparent than it is today.

I must add a word about the index. Its helpfulness is illustrated by the fact that under P "Pearl Harbor" is cited to five different passages in the book, while the word "President" is not even listed! EDWARD S. CORWIN

Asides and Diversions

NOTE BOOKS OF NIGHT. By Edmund Wilson. San Francisco: The Colt Press. $2.50.

IT IS to be expected that any book by Edmund Wilson will prove interesting, and "Note Books of Night," a handsomely printed volume from the Colt Press of San Francisco, does not disappoint such an expectation. The book, as its title suggests, is a miscellany, the literary asides and diversions, as it were, of a man whose central preoccupation is criticism, literary and social. We find here serious verse, satirical pieces in both verse and prose, parodies, two items which seem to be excerpts from a journal of travel, two others which are memories of the author's childhood, and one rather short prose piece, The Moon in a Dream, which is difficult to classify. The book, by its very nature, has no central line; we have here glimpses and snapshots, informal or intimate, of the critic whose public appearances have usually been of an entirely different and more reserved temper. This means that a number of the snapshots are of interest to us because we have a prior, and more substantial, interest in the public appearances. In other words, part of our interest here is derivative and secondary, and the reader's concern, upon reflection, may be to distinguish the secondary from the primary interests in "Note Books of Night."

The serious verse is of uneven quality. In pieces like Provincetown, 1936, we find a sober, meticulous descriptive poetry which in The Crows of March achieves a considerable degree of vividness. In the pieces which are more subjective, such as The Voice or Home to Town, there are patches of very conventional and sentimental writing. For example:

I heard it, dulled with love upon your breast,
I heard it in our peace of summer suns;
I heard it when the long waves of the West
Retard the dark with loud suspended guns.

Or:

And all the city love, intense and faint like you—
The little drooping breasts, the cigarettes,
The little cunning shadow between narrow thighs.
They will get rid of cities—
They will make themselves better bodies—
But they will never have a girl so pale and blue-veined and quick and passionate as you.

In the first example, the image of the last two lines seems to be mere rhetorical decoration, only vaguely related to the business in hand, and the first two lines, in both phrase and rhythm, are merely conventional. The second example, I think, is equally conventional; only the convention has been changed from an old one to a new one. With two exceptions, The Crows of March and Night in May, the serious poems strike me as of secondary interest.

Some of the pieces of satirical verse, such as Chorus of Stalin's Yes-Men, are tied to vanished occasions, and their pungency has largely evaporated with the passage of even a little time. Disloyal Lines to an Alumnus who "complained in the Alumni Weekly that books by alumni authors were not being sufficiently praised by the reviews of that periodical" is high-grade farce; and "The Omelet of A. MacLeish," which is already well known, is a brilliant combination of parody and criticism and butchery. Both of these pieces will be fun for everybody except Struthers Burt and Archibald MacLeish, the two luckless gentlemen involved. In the prose section, The Three Limperary Cripples provides the fun, a Joycean satire on the New York literary scene.

All of the pieces in the prose section are expert, though now and then the expertness is a little too self-conscious, verging toward preciousness. For example, there is the last paragraph of Return from Louisiana, or this sentence from Variations on a Landscape: ". . . though the day was still luminous and full, it held already the tragic suggestion of the encroachments of the winter darkness which was clipping it closer every night." But I think that one can have little but praise for Variations and At Laurelwood, the pieces which seem to be parts of an autobiography. It is only to be hoped that these are not mere fragments but are parts of a work in progress. If there is such a work and if these are fair samples, then it will be a book of great distinction.

Epstein as Temperament and Artist

THE ART OF JACOB EPSTEIN. By Robert Black. The World Publishing Company. $3.50.

THOUGH his "Adam" provoked a customary uproar as recently as 1939 and became a kind of touring circus attraction in England and America, the scandalous interest of Epstein's work has now receded sufficiently to permit a reasonable view of his talent. Such attention has in the past been as much obstructed by the sculptor's deliberate shock tactics and instability among his media as by alternating public excesses of prurient indignation and partisan apology. When a more astute criticism has approached his total achievement, it has tended to wariness or censorious contempt. The summary verdict of an American book on sculpture thirteen years ago—"In the last analysis Epstein is a good showman of negligible artistic interest"—is typical. This is scarcely reasonable. The exhibitionism implicit in Epstein's bolder conceptions does have an artistic interest, not only in relation to his own serious claims but with respect to the various efforts of modern sculptors to recover, at whatever expense of taste or erratic experimentation, the monumental quality and motivation which recent architecture has never really succeeded in encouraging in their art as a means of raising it from its fallen dignity as studio, museum, or minor social craftsmanship.

Epstein's long line of large-scale works, beginning with the Strand Statues in 1907, though the Wilde monument at Père Lachaise, the "Christ," "Consummatum Est," "Behold the Man," "Genesis," the Underground Building figures, "Primeval Man," the Hudson Memorial "Rima," and the "Adam," represent this effort at its most strenuous. Admittedly, it would take a greater plastic and structural power than Epstein has ever shown to harmonize this violence with anything recognizable as a subtle and precise sensibility. The sensibility—conceptual or poetic as well as structural—which men as different as Rodin, Maillol, Despiau, Lachaise, and Gaudier maintained or even enhanced in their larger works has always suffered when Epstein essayed the heroic or grandiose. The hiatus that exists between his early abstractions and his later portrait heads, and that reappears between these heads and his public monuments, is partially bridged by a certain consistency of temperament and vision but not by a fundamental unity of style or formal insight. This discontinuity in his talent may be partly explained, as Mr. Black hints, by the sculptor's divergence between his favorite pursuit of elemental forms and the practical requirements of portrait modeling. But it also ensues from the fact that he has been divided between a racial tendency toward religious, cultural, or ethnic abstraction and a personal, temperamental taste for character-reading and intimate emotion: between abstractions and images; between heroic or mythic symbolism and social naturalism. This contrast appears at once if one places the "Rima" or the "Adam" against the portraits of Einstein, Conrad, Shaw, Priestley, Hulme, and the Duke of Marlborough.

The "Rima," deriving from the Ludovisi Throne Aphrodite in design and rhythmic organization, and the "Adam," with its totem-like animism suggestive of Semitic and Egyptian ikon forms, represent an almost galvanic disturbance—less spontaneous than arbitrary—of the formal stasis which Epstein offered in an early abstraction like "Two Doves" or "Mother and Child" or in the recalcitrant "Sun God." Between these extremes is the simpler yet more compelling formal sincerity of the early Strand Statues, but that sincerity he seems to have sacrificed quite willingly for the monumental and symbolic eloquence which he hardly mastered in any genuine sense. In the first "Christ" figure, a beautifully intense realism and dramatic power quicken a basically inert columnar design. This seldom reappears in the later massive works. These show little of the nervous force that Gaudier—or Rodin or Maillol, for that matter—released from his larger blocks. They depend too greatly, for values both of structure and of symbolism, on the degree to which they derive from traditionally sacred subjects and primitive racial phantoms to take on the free life of created forms—this separating them also from the work of more single-minded abstractionists like Henry Moore.

His portrait work took Epstein into a truer personal element. Here he mastered a genuine emotion of character and society, something not only far beyond the hack fidelity of a Jo Davidson but stronger in its essential plasticity than the purer impressionism of Lehmbruch or Kolbe. Yet even here Epstein required an amenable type, a head adaptable to the hieratic stylization which alone sustains the heavily volcanic and instrumented surfaces which he cultivated to the point of mannerism. Such types as Shaw, Boas, Dewey, Einstein, MacDonald, and—ridiculously—Priestley amount either to caricatures or to sentimentalizations in his hands. But subjects like Van Dieren, Conrad, Hulme, Robeson, Cunninghame Graham, Jacob Kramer, Lady Gregory, Old Pinager, and—superbly—Marlborough invited the abstracting of mask-forms or racial types, and led to that balancing of individual traits with social or ethnic references that makes a sculptural portrait succeed. When Epstein pursued this balance to the point of making a head impersonal—as in the renderings of Nan, Dolores, Meum, Mrs. Epstein, and the baroque putti—he gave his excessive stylism a classic stamp and serenity, controlled, delicate, beautifully memorable. Here his fault of sacrificing the integrity of his forms to a species of explosive dynamism—a flaying of the clay which Rodin never risked, even when he was reacting most strongly against the runny suavities and art nouveau element that haunted his salon style—is subdued; the contours of his design take on their finest lightness and luminosity; a poetic archaism to compare with Despiau's or Maillol's, and well beyond the pedantry of Manship, Bourdelle, and Gill, arrives to give Epstein's work its subtlest point and beauty.

The problem of Epstein's work is the problem of personality. He presents one of the best cases among modern artists for the discipline of a superabundant energy and temperament by plastic and historical principles. Only when he arrives at the true balance of these elements does he produce work that is likely to endure. Incidentally, this problem was intelligently submitted and objectified by Epstein himself in his recent autobiography, "Let There Be Sculpture." It is not so submitted, discussed, or in any way intelligently dealt with in the present volume. The text is as inept an exposition as has appeared in any recent book of this sort, where the curator style's dullest ceremonies are the rule. The photographs are of all kinds, mostly museum prints, showing no control or appropriateness of lighting. Dimensions of the works are lacking; the works are not arranged in any apparent sequence; important sculptures like the "Genesis," "Consummatum Est," and most of the Strand Statues, though mentioned, are not among the plates; "Behold the Man" is shown only in what appears to be a newspaper print; errors in spelling are frequent; the catalogue of Epstein's works has several garbled passages. The format and price of the book are attractive, but it is a model neither of the historical survey nor of the critical treatment to which Epstein and his public are entitled.

The Middle Ground

THE TECHNIQUES OF DEMOCRACY. By Alfred M. Bingham. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.

ALFRED BINGHAM'S various studies of political and economic problems have won him an increasing respect among students who are not too bound to dogma to appreciate his unorthodox approach to the problems of modern democracy. His new book is a fresh elaboration of his general thesis that modern society is not confronted with simple "either-or" choices between collectivism and freedom. He is looking for a middle ground between a collectivism which would solve all problems by bringing economic life completely under political control and a laissez faire theory which equates democracy with unregulated economic enterprise.

The new Archbishop of Canterbury was appointed by Prime Minister Winston Churchill against the wishes of Tory reactionaries in Britain. A huge audience in the Albert Hall, London, heard the Archbishop declare for transference of taxes from production equipment to ground values. (See Christian Century, October 7, 1942.) Churchill himself, in a volume recently issued in New York, says: "Who could have thought that it would be easier to produce by toll and skill all the most necessary or desirable commodities than it is to find consumers for them? It is certain that the economic problem with which we are now confronted is not adequately solved, indeed is not solved at all, by the teachings of the textbooks, however grand may be their logic, however illustrious may be their authors." Churchill is also for the taxation of ground rental values.

Bingham is convinced that the "negative" state which acts only as an umpire in the economic sphere is a thing of the past, and that the totalitarian powers gained an advantage over us by their ability to act quickly and efficiently, not only in issues immediately related to the war, but in the organization of economic life. However, they could not do this without destroying all of the essential freedoms of democracy. He therefore rightly regards the problem of leadership as the paramount problem of democracy. The question is how the processes of democratic life can be given more adequate direction, how democratic action can be made more decisive, how political and economic processes can be synthesized and confusion and cross-purposes avoided, without unduly centralizing authority or making power irresponsible.

In answering that question he examines all the "techniques" of political and economic life—the relation of the executive to the legislative branch of government, the tendencies toward centralization and decentralization in both government and industry, and the necessities and limits of political control over economic life. He has great confidence in the possibilities of a scientific management in industry which learns how to gain "power with men" rather than "power over men." What he has to say upon this issue is usually wise and discriminating, though one wonders whether he fully recognizes the perennial character of the frictions and tensions that would exist in even the best possible democratic society.

Mr. Bingham's confidence in the efficacy of self-regulation in industry does not lead him to any uncritical espousal of "free enterprise." He wants a positive rather than "do-nothing" state. He believes in "strategic" planning in order to prevent confusion in the economic sphere. Yet he would maintain the automatic balances and disciplines of the "free market" within the framework of strategic planning, convinced that no bureaucratic prevision is wise enough to anticipate all the complexities of economic life which are encountered and resolved in the free market. But Mr. Bingham disagrees with most of his colleagues in this school of thought in his approach to unions. He believes in the union shop. He regards the security for the union which it establishes as a "constitutional framework" for its effective function in the democracy of industry and sees no essential distinction between compulsory dues and compulsory taxation in political society. Mr. Bingham is, in other words, a wise and prudent guide amid the perplexities of our day, looking for a "middle way" with great sincerity and freedom from prejudice.

When he goes beyond the problem of "techniques" and discusses the underlying presuppositions of democracy he is not equally convincing. He thinks that democracy was "born in the Age of Reason," forgetting that Anglo-Saxon democracy was born not in the eighteenth but in the seventeenth century, in the age not of reason but of warring faiths, and rested upon the beneficent discovery that no point of view was so true and no claim to authority in the community so plausible as to have the right to maintain itself without allowing competing points of view to challenge it.

It is true, as he avers, that Nazi totalitarianism is based upon unreason. But Communist totalitarianism is based upon faith in reason, that is, upon the faith that reason can be purged of all ideological taint, of all class corruptions, and become absolutely pure. If this should be possible, if it should really be true that the proletarian perspective is the only untainted approach to social issues, it becomes quite logical to seek the suppression of all dissident points of view as being ipso facto "corrupted" by capitalist corruption. Democracy does, indeed, require some faith in man's rational capacity and moral inclination to consider interests other than his own. But it also rests upon a shrewd understanding of the corruption of interest in all points of view and the consequent necessity of allowing to no one a position of immunity to the challenge of opposition. If human nature is as good as Mr. Bingham thinks it is, he ought not to be so concerned as he seems to be to make power responsible and to check it with other forms of power. In that case we would merely have to look for Plato's philosopher-king and trust the purity of his reason to control his power.

A rather interesting example of Mr. Bingham's own rational optimism may be found in his discussion of international affairs. He thinks that "so long as there is a machine-gun anywhere in the world—outside of a museum—it is a permanent denial of the democratic belief in the dignity of man. . . . If the world community is to have a future it must shift from the rule of force to the rule of law." It must certainly shift from the rule of force without law. But can Mr. Bingham offer any examples in history of a rule of law without force, or any plausible reason for believing that life could ever be sufficiently devitalized to make law self-enforcing?

DRAMA

As It Was in the Beginning

THE SKIN OF OUR TEETH,

Thornton Wilder's new play now current at the Plymouth, is said to have been enthusiastically rejected by many of the old-line producers. Most of them had probably been busy for a decade or more turning down other impressionistic, expressionistic, and non-representational plays, and none of them had had many occasions to regret his decisions—for old-line producers are not accustomed to lose much sleep when they discover that they have missed an opportunity to sponsor what the more adventurous critics find it possible to call "an interesting experiment." But "The Skin of Our Teeth" is an interesting experiment by any producer's definition. A few nights after it opened in New York the S. R. O. sign was out, and patrons were hanging over the rail at the rear of the auditorium. Something which looked to the best judges like a perfect example of what closes Saturday night, something which provoked audiences in the try-out towns to demand their money back, was, in Broadway's own language, a smash hit.

No doubt the personal following of Tallulah Bankhead and the delightful performance she is giving have something to do with the phenomenon. So, too, have the lesser but real followings of Fredric March and Florence Eldridge, the fine performances of all the large cast, which includes Florence Reed in a beautifully executed bit, and also Elia Kazan's skilful execution of a terribly difficult directorial job. But all these put together would certainly not serve if the public did not like the play, and yet that play is one by comparison with which most of the "interesting experiments" in stagecraft and dramatic method would look like mere pieces of timid sardouddledom. Meyerhold and Piscator, putting their heads together in the late twenties, could hardly have done such violence to conventional dramatic form. And yet the whole wild project comes off with astonishing success.

Mr. Wilder's story is concerned with nothing less than the History of Mankind as represented by the adventures of Mr. Antrobus and his family, whose story includes, among other things, the coming of the great Ice Age, Noah's flood, and all the great wars including the present one. Mr. Wilder's thesis is merely that from the beginning of time

Mr. Antrobus's existence has been a series of indescribable calamities from which he has managed, at the last minute and quite improbably, to escape by the skin of his teeth. Between calamities he grows unbelievably careless, improvident, and complacent. He pays no attention to the signs which are as plain as the nose on his face. But, then, when it is obviously too late it turns out to be really all but just that. Most of his companions perish in water or ice or gunpowder. His home is destroyed, his civilization all but forgotten. And then, at last, when the waters have receded or the fighters have all killed one another, Mr. Antrobus crawls back, raises the walls of his house once more, and drags up out of the cellar the tattered remains of the books, in which some thoughts to begin again with have remained legible. So it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end—unless of course Mr. Antrobus has been learning more than there seems any good reason for believing he has.

Now it is obvious that the history of mankind hardly fits very conveniently into the framework of the well-made play. But Mr. Wilder has made his problem easier by first making it harder. To tell the story chronologically as a series of eternally recurrent events would make it not only endless but also intolerably repetitious. Since it really is the same thing happening over and over again, why not tell the story not in time but in eternity, why not assume that all the ice ages, all the floods, and all the wars happened together? Accordingly when we first meet the Antrobuses they are living in a suburban house in New Jersey; but it is also at the time of the great Ice Age, and Mr. Antrobus, though he works in a New York office and sends his wife singing telegrams, has also just invented the wheel—thereby practically completing the art of mechanics—and is finishing up the alphabet. Accordingly, also, Noah's flood catches him some thousands of years later during one of those periods of silliness between calamities when he has just been elected president of the Fraternal Order of Mammals and is celebrating at Atlantic City. And similarly, the great war which is just concluding at the end of the last act is all wars at once. The troublesome son with a scar on his forehead can hardly be other than Cain; but he also talks remarkably like Hitler.

Doubtless all this sounds quite impossible as a play, but I can only assure you that it isn't and note, for example, one little incident: the disregarded storm warning on the beach which flashes "storm," "hurricane," and finally "end of the world" while no one notices it is as effective as anything I have seen on the stage in a long, long time. One naturally wonders why Mr. Wilder has been so triumphantly successful with a method which has so seldom got beyond the "interesting experiment" stage—at least since Aristophanes, who did, after all, precede Meyerhold and the Federal Theater, last used it. Possibly one answer has something to do with the fact that Mr. Wilder has given it a more imaginative, less merely neurotic, tone than most of the Russian or German experimenters. In any event he has somehow managed to be always serious but never solemn and has kept the whole, though grimly and ironically humorous, humorous nevertheless. And to one who has always held to the old-fashioned idea that art must please if it is to be art at all, it is a very gratifying fact that "The Skin of Our Teeth" pleases quite as much as it admonishes or instructs.

After such a play a merely well-made drama including nothing more exciting than the capture of a German spy and an air raid on the New England coast is no doubt bound to seem pretty tame. In any event "Yankee Point" (Longacre Theater), despite very competent if very conventional writing, and despite the pleasing presence of Edna Best and John Cromwell, does seem less than world-shaking. Perhaps the fact that not the spy or the air raid but the performance of Elizabeth Patterson as a cantankerously comic old lady got most favorable attention from the critics means something.

JAZZ: REISSUES

Louis Armstrong (with Earl Hines at the piano, 1927 and 1928): "West End Blues" and "Muggles"; C 36377.

Johnny Dadds: "Melancholy"; D 3864.

Jimmy Noone: "I Know That You Know" and Danny Polo: "Blue Murder"; D 3863.

JAZZ: NEW ISSUES

Sidney Bechet: "Texas Moaner"; V 27600. "Rose Room"; V 27707.

Allen-Higginbotham Orchestra: "Indiana"; O 6357.

Cootie Williams: "West End Blues"; O 6370.

Add to these one of the great sets of the year, just issued by Victor: Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4, played by Artur Schnabel with the Chicago Symphony under Stock (Set 930, $4.73). The work is one of Beethoven's greatest; Schnabel's performance of the solo part remains incomparable; the orchestral part is admirably integrated with it; and the performance is reproduced with marvelously life-like fidelity and spaciousness, though with a weakness in the lower range that is evident, for example, in the sound of the solo cello accompanying the piano's first entrance in the finals, and in the lack of body and power in the bass of the piano throughout. The surfaces of my review copy are not as quiet as they should be; and a couple of them swish and scrape noisily.

This is a set to acquire if you haven't Schnabel's older one; if you have the older one hold on to it. Schnabel's playing in the new one, as I have said, is incomparable—except with his playing in the old one, in which there are even more wonderful contours and inflections of phrase, and these are produced with beautiful clarity and perfection of execution, as against his occasional blurring on the new records, his bad fumbles in the bass in the second movement. Moreover, the old performance is reproduced with astonishing fidelity, clarity, and balance, even if it hasn't the additional liveness and sharpness which the extended range of the recording gives to the sound of the new performance, and doesn't sound spaced out as in the concert hall but sounds compressed into a phonograph.

Needed: a Second Party

Dear Sirs: Much talk was heard in the last campaign, as in previous ones, about our two-party system of government. But nothing in history is a greater hoax than the assumption that "our system" of government is based on the existence of two parties only. The fact is that our two major parties, left to their own devices, would be content to behave merely as "ins" and "outs," with the "ins" dividing the spoils. Every major reform movement that has swept this country in the past has had its origin in a third party, not in either of the two major parties.

Examination of the issues raised by the Democrats and Republicans in previous campaigns shows that the standard bearer of the "outs" resorts to high-sounding phrases without introducing any ideas which differ basically from those of the opposition. Not until the appearance of Franklin D. Roosevelt with his New Deal did the Democratic Party present a program radically different from that of the Republicans. And the New Deal policies of the President did not at first get the full support of the Democratic Party. Most of the party hacks looked askance at the White House with its new-fangled theories of social legislation, of reform, and of sound international policies. They did not interpret Roosevelt's Administration as a new concept of government replacing Hooverism. To them, Roosevelt merely substituted a Democratic Administration for a Republican Administration.

The party that is out of power always cultivates leadership; the more articulate the spokesman, the better the party bosses like him, provided, of course, they believe they can manipulate him. Should they suspect that he is getting out of hand and may actually believe what he is saying, the chances of his being nominated are materially reduced. In time of peace such a routine could be tolerated and the country could muddle along in a hit-or-miss way. In a time of national emergency such methods are too costly.

Few persons understand that we have not had a two-party system of government but a one-party system, with the party divided into two sections. There is room for a second party—a party that would give expression to the needs of the people. We need a party that will take the tenets of the New Deal and broaden them out and apply them. We need a party that will cut across superficial party lines, shake off the spoils system, and begin to think in terms of the present needs of our country, which has to wage a war and win a peace. Such a party must not be tied in any way to corrupt politicians without vision, courage, or program. The bosses know only one thing, and that is that their ward-healers have to be placated. They cannot produce national or international leadership; their kind of political immaturity cannot be tolerated in this critical period.

Independent, clear-thinking citizens in all walks of life, regardless of what political labels they inherited from their parents, should begin to think as mature citizens of a leading nation of this world who have to plan and mold a future civilization. Liberals should make common cause with organized labor and the underprivileged, and all of these together should build a party that will carry out a constructive program for our nation.

Nedich Is Hitler's Man

Dear Sirs: With the United Nations in control of most of North Africa, the Balkan states may again become a major battlefield. Hitler has sent reinforcements to Thrace, Dalmatia, and the Aegean coast; on our side experts are looking for invasion areas that offer possibilities from both the military and the political point of view. The Balkans, thanks largely to the people of Yugoslavia, whose guerrilla army has been in the field for a year and a half, may prove to be the most suitable place for a Continental second front.

In the light of this it is curious that a campaign to furbish up the reputation of General Milan Nedich, the Serbian Quisling, has recently begun in the American press. It started when the French journalist André Géraud, who uses the nom de plume Pertinax, wrote a story for the North American Newspaper Alliance hailing Nedich's "patriotism and heroism." Later, in a series of articles in the New York Times, Hanson Baldwin, the military analyst, said, on what authority it is hard to guess, that "the Nedich government in puppet Serbia is classified by those who know it as a Pétain, not a Quisling, government." Ray Brock, New York Times correspondent in Ankara, and several other journalists and speakers have sought in one way or another to justify or condone Nedich and his regime.

Precisely why Mr. Baldwin or anyone else believes that it is better to be a Pétain than a Quisling, I cannot imagine. As a matter of fact, it might be argued that there is more moral integrity in an outright Quisling than in a Pétain. In any case, the fact is that the free and democratic government of Yugoslavia in London has put General Nedich on its list of pro-Axis criminals who should be tried after the war. Every report reaching Yugoslavian émigrés in this country indicates that General Nedich has been the Führer's faithful servant ever since he was made puppet governor of Serbia last year. And there is nothing to indicate that his role has since changed.

What Is the Opposition Doing?

Dear Sirs: The stifled voice of one of the great standard bearers for freedom has knelled in my ears for the past several weeks. Ever since Juan Negrín's message on Free Spain appeared in The Nation of October 17 I have been expecting an editorial, or better still an explanatory article from an authoritative source, which would explain his position in terms of the aims of liberty which we—and he—serve. Why must he write, "Let us devote ourselves to that [winning the war] and advise all our friends to do the same, serving where we can even if our collaboration is not asked for or is even avoided"; and then again, "The government [the last-elected Republican government] cannot, without abusing the hospitality that it is obliged to enjoy, act through its own proper apparatus in a way that is adequate to the political needs of Spain"?

Is the stature of a Negrín so small, were his contributions so scanty, that he can be overlooked? Who avoids Juan Negrín and calls himself a fighter for freedom? Worse still, for this avoidance comes from high places, what peace can be expected from these world planners who have not the wit to want the collaboration of this great statesman? Is, then, Spain lost? Truly lost? Have "current attempts to restore the monarchy through diplomatic action" (I quote J. Alvarez del Vayo) been so successful that men high in the administrative offices of the United Nations find "the liberation of Spain and the reestablishment of the legal institutions which the nation created" (Negrín) the purpose of an enemy alien?

Not even burning indignation against treatment so callous would have led me to ask those questions if it were not for the encouraging "Reunion on the Left" described by Ralph Bates in your issue of October 31. Perhaps he or a Tom Wintringham can tell us what the Labor-Liberal opposition opposes—for Negrín cables from London. What, concretely, is the opposition doing to purify the high places? Does it supervise at all the relationships of the official government with the governments-in-exile? Does it attempt to influence the Foreign Office in its selection, recommendation, approval, or disapproval of members of these governments? Does it realize that after the war is over these governments will be in a position to secure great gifts of power within their national areas of jurisdiction? Is the democratic opposition in Great Britain cognizant of the fact that without generous labor and liberal representation within each government-in-exile, such gifts of power can easily become the arrogated privileges of new reactionary regimes on the Continent? Surely the Labor Party must realize that "when the post-war crisis inevitably arrives, the old parties and the trade unions must once again become instruments of protest. If they do not, the movement for reform will collapse, and we shall sink into despair" (Ralph Bates in the article cited).

The current of victory runs strong. An Allied thrust over the Mediterranean, with bridgeheads in Greece and the promise of an Italian invasion, may quickly overrun the Balkans and beat upon the gates of Central Europe. Greece, which bled for democracy, Albania, which was sacrificed, Yugoslavia, which still fights, Bulgaria, Italy itself where the anti-freedom curse first fell, will need governments and administrators. Shall there be kings again, and potentates?

Could there be arranged an article, perhaps in the Political War section of your journal, dealing with the factual endeavors and concrete proposals of Labor and Liberal voices and with their influence on the foreign offices and programs of the major governments-in-exile? Many people would like to know what measures are being taken by the only free labor movements left in Europe to defeat the kind of diplomacy that is laying the groundwork for World War III.

Memorial for Dr. Carver

Dear Sirs: Acquisition of the birthplace of the famous Negro scientist Dr. George Washington Carver of Tuskegee as the first federal memorial for any member of his race is called for by a bill now before the Public Lands Committees in both houses of Congress. Liberals all over the United States are being asked to help get the bills reported for a vote as a Christmas offering of good-will to our colored citizens.

Surely Dr. Carver's spectacular rise from slavery over every imaginable obstacle to become the creator of the new science of chemurgy, the founder of the now vital peanut-oil industry, and the "inventor of Ersatz" long before Hitler misused that science of substitutes should entitle him and his people to such a memorial.

This measure has been indorsed by both the N. A. A. C. P. and its Southern critics. Enthusiasm for it has been found even in the South, where the peanut crop this year is valued at half a billion dollars. We hope that Americans everywhere will rally behind a bill so expressive of war-time unity and racial good-will. RICHARD PILANT

The Shape of Things

ADMIRAL DARLAN HAS PROMOTED HIMSELF from Temporary Expedient to Chief of State. Apparently nothing can be done about this coup d'état because, according to Secretary of State Hull, "there is no time for consideration of politics." Moreover, says Mr. Hull, it is not up to us to choose leaders for the conquered states; when they are freed they can "select their own leaders and forms of government." Is the Secretary implying that "temporary" now means "for the duration"? It would seem so, since France is not likely to be freed short of a German defeat. In that case, if we have not expressly chosen Darlan as leader of the French, we have at any rate elected to give him an overwhelming head start. But for our deliberate choice, Darlan might for the remainder of the war be nothing more than a prisoner of the United Nations. Instead, the day of the armistice will probably find him in command of a large and well-equipped army, which, says the London Sunday Express, "will have as its basis men who until now have been training in Pétainist youth camps and are well inculcated with fascist theories." He will have under him a de facto government of Vichy generals which has already been recognized by the American High Command and which, like his army, will grow in strength and prestige with every passing day of cooperation on the part of the United Nations. That is a combination which a prostrate France will either swallow or expunge by civil war. In short, we have already plunged deep into French politics whether or not Mr. Hull thinks we have time for it. You can't escape politics in a political war.

DARLAN IS FAR FROM RETICENT ABOUT HIS ambitions. According to a dispatch from Frederick Kuh in PM, his self-elevation was accompanied by a note to General Eisenhower suggesting that President Roosevelt reconsider his remarks about the tentativeness of the present arrangement. The United States, he complained, was "treating him like a lemon—squeezing him dry with the intention of casting him away." Having picked a lemon, that would seem to be the logical thing for us to do. General Eisenhower has in fact squeezed to the extent of issuing a second order for the abolition of the Vichy regime's anti-Semitic laws in Algeria and Morocco.

The first order evidently didn't take. French and Arab fascists in the area protested the order to Darlan, whose spokesman promptly reassured them over the Algiers radio that the Allies would not intervene in the internal affairs of the North African countries. If the Allies don't intervene, they will be deliberately choosing Vichy law in preference to the laws of the Third Republic, of which the North African states are an integral part. The same issue arises in connection with the release of anti-Axis prisoners now held in concentration camps or condemned to forced labor on the trans-Sahara railway. It is by these tests that the conquered peoples of Europe will know whether the Americans are an army of liberation or whether their countries are doomed to some kind of fascism, Hitler or no Hitler.

THE DIFFICULTIES NOW BEING MET BY the United Nations forces in Tunisia may be cited as absolute proof of the necessity of the Darlan deal, but they also emphasize its risks from the military point of view. On the one hand, the speed with which the Axis forces have consolidated their positions in the Bizerte-Tunis triangle and the problems of supply which General Eisenhower has to overcome underline the value of the early cessation of fighting between our forces and the French. On the other hand, as General Catroux, Fighting French commander in Syria, has pointed out, the safety of communications between our bases in Morocco and Algeria and the front line depends on Darlan's trustworthiness—a tenuous thread indeed. If Hitler decides to attack through Spain, the Anglo-American expeditionary force will be assailed from east and west while Darlan remains in the middle. General Catroux, who has spent years in North Africa and held several important commands there, referred to the vulnerability of road and rail communications along the North African coast if subjected to guerrilla attacks; and in this connection he pointed to the large number of organized French fascists in North Africa belonging to Laval's Service d'Ordre Legionnaire and Doriot's Popular Party. We have heard of no effort by Darlan to suppress these groups. Meanwhile, heavy fighting continues in the neighborhood of Tebourba, from which the advance guard of General Anderson's First Army has been forced to withdraw. The problem of establishing air bases close enough to the front line for fighters to operate has evidently left the Axis with temporary air superiority. Until that handicap is overcome, our troops may have to remain on the defensive.

FRANCO, DEMOCRACY'S PROSPECTIVE ALLY, looks more of an ally in the fine cartoon by Luis Quintanilla printed last week than he does in reality. In the cartoon he flaunted the flags of the United States and Britain. In reality he sends Hitler telegrams of surprising warmth for a man who is supposed to be mobilizing for war against Germany. His message was reported in about an inch of type on page 37 of the New York Herald Tribune and similarly or not at all by the other newspapers. It ended with these expressive words, "May your arms triumph in the glorious undertaking of freeing Europe from the Bolshevik terror"—a strange sentiment on the part of a ruler who has been presented as a convert to our side. Again, in a speech on December 8 to the National Council of the Falange, Franco cited Mussolini as "a leader who has given justice to the Italian people"—evidently a counter-thrust to Churchill's recent attack on the badly deflated Duce. Further, parroting Goebbels, he declared that "when the war ends, the old Europe will be dead, with its capitalism, imperialism, and plutocracy." Opinions such as these will be hard for American admirers of Franco to take or explain away. But they do much to complete the series of facts presented in the Political War section of this issue, as well as the report that reaches us at the moment of going to press, according to which all the troops mobilized by Franco since the total occupation of France by Germany have been sent, not to the French-Spanish frontier, where the Nazis have installed themselves, but to Spanish Morocco, close to the areas where our own armies are now operating.

THE "HATE WILLKIE" REPUBLICANS, IT seems, are going to have to swallow their prejudice and rally to the greatest vote-getter they have had since Calvin Coolidge, just as their Democratic counterparts have for ten years endured Roosevelt though the mere thought gagged them. Wendell Willkie brought the G. O. P. some 22,000,000 votes in 1940, a million more than Hoover won with in 1928. These exciting figures must have danced before the eyes of the national committeemen who met in St. Louis last Monday to elect a new chairman. The anti-Willkie forces had united behind the candidacy of Werner W. Schroeder, an extreme isolationist and a favorite of the Chicago Tribune. Schroeder was the one candidate openly opposed by Willkie, but intoxicated by victories in the hapless proceedings of last November 3, the isolationists insisted on forcing the test. Schroeder failed to receive even a plurality on the first ballot, much less a majority, and his backers quickly surrendered. The new chairman is Harrison E. Spangler of Iowa, a compromise candidate of no great promise. Willkie's victory lies not in the election of Spangler but in the defeat of Schroeder, and even more perhaps in the adoption of a war resolution which reaffirmed the declaration forced through the National Republican Committee last April by Willkie over the strenuous objections of Senator Robert A. Taft. Ironically, it was Taft who was selected to offer the resolution at the St. Louis meeting.

THE NAVY'S REPORT OF PEARL HARBOR makes it abundantly clear why the full story of that incredible disaster could not be told at the time. It even justifies, to some extent, the deliberate distortion of the truth in the reports issued. For if the Japanese had known, as they apparently did not, that all the battle-ships in the Pacific fleet and practically all the army and navy planes stationed on the islands had been put out of action, they doubtless would have followed up the initial assault with a successful invasion of our great Hawaiian base. If they had known how incompetent our army and navy leaders actually were, they would probably have been encouraged to try a comparable assault on Dutch Harbor and possibly on the Panama Canal. But if they misjudged the situation, the Japanese did succeed in forcing us into a long cautious period of defensive warfare—which they exploited to the fullest. While we were anxiously reinforcing our position at Pearl Harbor, the Japanese took Wake Island and launched their attack on the Philippines and Singapore without opposition from what remained of our Pacific fleet. Our timidity during this period is clearly understandable in view of our losses, but as events turned out, Wake Island at least could have been held. It is a congenital optimist indeed who sees in Pearl Harbor only a missed opportunity for Japan.

WE HOPE THE TELEGRAPH-MERGER BILL NOW before Congress will be blocked long enough at least to eliminate the House amendment permitting mergers in the foreign field. The navy successfully opposed this provision in the Senate on the ground that a merger between American and foreign communications systems involved the danger of foreign control. The American Communications Association, which has been fighting the bill, has released information to the press which indicates how genuine is the fear of Axis influence if mergers are permitted. The International Telegraph and Telephone, as the strongest company in the field, is likely to be dominant in any international combine. It has subsidiaries and affiliates in all the Axis and most of the Axis-dominated countries. It regained its Spanish properties when Franco won. It had enough "pull" with both the Nazi government and our own to negotiate a deal for the sale of its Rumanian properties at a time when Rumania was under Hitler's control and Rumanian funds in this country were frozen. Sosthenes Behn, head of the I. T. and T., was the first American big business man to be received at Berchtesgaden in 1933 after Hitler took power. In the British Empire, where a merger of cables and radio was permitted, development of radio was stifled because, as Rear Admiral Hooper said, "radio was going too fast to suit the cable stockowners in London." It would be both unfortunate and ironic if it were held back to suit the wishes of Berlin.

A WELCOME PREVIEW OF THE POST-WAR relations between Canada and the United States is provided in the recent exchange of notes between Secretary Hull and Leighton McCarthy, Canadian Minister in Washington. Both governments agree that tariffs and other trade barriers should be reduced, that all forms of discrimination should be removed from international commerce, and that trade between the two countries should be facilitated in accordance with the principles set forth in the Atlantic Charter. Details for achieving this goal remain to be worked out in negotiations between the two governments, but there seems no doubt that the preliminary agreement marks the end of discrimination against American exports such as had existed under the empire-preference arrangements signed in Ottawa in 1932. The agreement is also significant in that it is expected to serve as a model for a series of inter-American pacts now being worked out as part of our program for promoting hemispheric solidarity. It is specifically stated in the agreement that it is to be "open to participation by all other nations of like mind." It is hard to see, however, how its principles are to be reconciled with the practical procedures outlined in the recent trade treaty between the United States and Brazil, which sets up a rather complicated system of controls. Until this problem is settled, the vague and lofty phrases of the Atlantic Charter will continue to be difficult of interpretation.

THE MILITANT, A WEEKLY NEWSPAPER published by the disciples of the late Leon Trotsky, has been barred from the mails since November 7. So far the postal authorities have refused to explain their action, but it was undoubtedly the paper's opposition to the war as "an imperialist blood bath" that got it into trouble. It might be argued that those who approved the suppression of Social Justice should not object to the ban on the Trotskyite journal, but there are important differences. Social Justice hindered the war effort not by forthright opposition to it but by the dissemination of pro-Axis propaganda, including anti-Semitism and deliberate lies. However wrong the Militant may be, it stands on its own argument and is not pro-German. Its position is more directly comparable to that of the legitimate pacifist groups which the government has wisely ignored.

THE PRINCIPLE OF EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL work for men and women has been upheld by the War Labor Board in a ruling allowing employers to make wage or salary adjustments bringing women's pay up to the level now paid to men. From now on women who have been refused the same pay as that given men may appeal to a regional office of the board and obtain an adjustment if they can prove their case. Just how effective the ruling will be in equalizing the economic opportunities of men and women remains to be seen. It will be recalled that a similar ruling was made by the War Labor Board in World War I, and while progress has undoubtedly been made in the intervening years there are still comparatively few occupations in which women have attained full equality with men. In Great Britain a comparable issue has arisen in connection with the fixing of rates of compensation for war injuries. Protesting against the payment of a lower rate of compensation for women than men, a minority in the House of Commons, led by its women members, rolled up the largest vote against the government since the formation of the Churchill Cabinet. The government finally promised to set up a committee of inquiry to study the problem and report, if possible, before the Christmas recess. The battle for real equality between the sexes is far from won in either country, but it is encouraging to note that the women have seized and are holding the initiative.

MANY OF OUR READERS HAVE EXPRESSED a lively curiosity about the identity of Argus, whose excellent weekly commentary appears in the Political War section. Unhappily we are not at liberty to divulge his real name. We can only say that Argus is the pseudonym of one of Europe's ablest journalists, a man thoroughly familiar with Nazi methods of propaganda and political warfare. We believe his column provides one of the best analyses of the German radio and press published in this country.

The Beveridge Report

SIR WILLIAM BEVERIDGE'S proposals for a system of social security which will provide every Briton with protection from "the cradle to the grave" are not in any sense revolutionary. Based on well-established principles, they form an architectural blueprint for the completion of a structure the foundations of which were laid over thirty years ago. Every British government since, whatever its political complexion, has contributed bricks and mortar to that building, but there are still gaps to be filled in the walls and some new wings to be added.

Nevertheless, if the Beveridge Plan is not revolutionary in itself, it may be considered, perhaps, to mark the completion of a revolution in the social approach to the problems of poverty. It denotes the final overthrow of the Poor Law system; it repudiates the whole conception of pauperism and denies the hoary belief that poverty is both a divine dispensation and a punishable crime; it accepts the principle that society must make itself responsible for the abolition of want and insists that this end is within the means of a modern industrial economy.

There is no need here to repeat the detailed summaries of the Beveridge Plan which have appeared in the daily press. In a radio speech its author described it as three-sided, comprising, first, a scheme of all-in insurance for cash benefits covering the hazards of sickness, accident, and unemployment and providing for old age; second, a general scheme of children's allowances irrespective of whether the responsible parent is earning a living; third, a scheme of medical treatment of every kind for everybody. The contribution of every individual toward the cost of his insurance will take the form of a single weekly premium.

Included in the benefits are special payments to women at marriage and at childbirth and provision for funeral benefits for everyone. The amounts proposed are not large, but they will be sufficient to assure that these vital occasions will not force people into debt. Unemployment and disability benefits and eventually pensions are to be on the same level. The rate, according to Sir William, "is designed to be high enough by itself to provide subsistence and to prevent want in all normal cases, and it will last as long as unemployment or disability lasts without diminishing."

This is a particularly important innovation. At present in Britain an unemployed man with wife and two children receives 38 shillings a week for 26 weeks, after which he must apply to a public-assistance board for a dole, the extent of which depends on a "means test." Under the Beveridge Plan he would receive, taking into account family allowances, 56 shillings a week as long as unemployment lasted, subject only to his reporting regularly at a labor exchange and after a certain period at a retraining center. This provision does much to meet the problem of technological unemployment, and should help to reduce trade-union resistance to labor-saving devices. Men who lose their jobs because their skills have become outmoded or because their factory has been rendered obsolete will know that their families will be provided for while they are assisted to learn a new trade. This emphasis on retraining is an obvious reflection of British war-time experience.

The introduction of allowances for children after the first, whether their parent or parents are employed or unemployed, rich or poor, is perhaps the biggest step forward proposed by Sir William Beveridge. It has to be considered in the light of the rapidly falling birth rate in Britain and the near approach of an absolute decline in population there. There is no doubt that this phenomenon is the direct result of a growing sense of responsibility in parents which induces them to limit their families to the one or two children they will be able to bring up on a satisfactory standard.

The Beveridge Plan, to which, it must be remembered, the government is not committed, is likely to command very widespread popular support of a non-partisan nature. It can be taken for granted that the Labor Party will give the proposals its active backing, and they appear to commend themselves to many Conservatives. Undoubtedly, however, when the report is considered by Parliament the plan will encounter powerful opposition. It is certain to be attacked by the insurance companies, which have reaped huge profits from industrial policies—a business which in Britain, as in this country, has always been economically wasteful and often no better than a legal racket. Conservative financiers will condemn the plan on the ground of its cost, both to employers and the taxpayers, who between them will shoulder about 75 per cent of the total. Actually the sums involved, though huge, are not so great as might have been expected in relation to the existing commitment of the national Exchequer on account of social security. In brief, the financing of the scheme requires the retransfer of about 11 per cent of the national income—not a prohibitive price if the objective of “a national minimum over which prosperity can grow” is achieved.

The Beveridge Plan may be said to aim at a partial socialization of distribution within an economic system in which private enterprise remains paramount. But its author fully realizes that its success depends on an improved organization of production as well as the peaceful development of world trade. The actuarial calculations on which its cost is based assume a rate of unemployment lower than the average in Britain between 1919 and 1939, and a new cyclical depression of the 1929 variety might well prove fatal to it.

Sir William Beveridge, however, presents his proposals not merely as a scientific method of abolishing want but as an act of faith in the ability of his countrymen to attack the problems of reconstruction as courageously as they have accepted the challenge of Nazism. “Want,” he writes, “could have been abolished in Britain before the war. It can be abolished after the present war unless the British people prove less productive than they and their fathers have always been.” This bold rejection of economic defeatism in a country facing post-war problems even more desperate than those that confront America rebukes the feeble spirits of our Cassandra and will inspire all those who look forward to the achievement of a more just and fruitful social system.

McNutt and Wickard

IN EXTENDING Paul V. McNutt's powers as manpower coordinator and appointing Claude B. Wickard as Food Administrator, the President has taken two important steps toward placing this country on a total-war footing. It has been plain to most observers for months that drastic action was necessary with respect to both manpower and food. The chief question now is whether this latest reorganization will suffice.

There can be no doubt of the wisdom of placing Selective Service under the control of the War Manpower Commission. The military and civilian aspects of the man-power problem are so closely interrelated that their separation could only lead to friction and confusion. Despite contrary directives from Selective Service headquarters, tens of thousands of key men in war industries have been drafted into the army. Other tens of thousands have enlisted voluntarily. The prohibition of enlistments, the exemption of men more than thirty-eight years old, and the placing of control over inductions in civilian rather than military hands should check the pirating of essential labor by the armed services. It must be noted, however, that the new arrangement does not strike at the heart of the problem, namely, the matter of balancing our man-power resources between military and civilian needs. The army and navy retain the right to decide how many men shall be inducted each month. It is true that they are required to consult with the head of the War Manpower Commission, but the final decision rests with the armed forces. With this important exception, the new set-up appears generally satisfactory as a solution of the military aspects of the man-power problem.

For solving the equally vital but far more controversial problem of allocating civilian man-power as effectively as possible for the war effort, the changes outlined in the President's order appear far less satisfactory. Two important steps were taken. Mr. McNutt is authorized (1) to require that all workers be hired through the United States Employment Service, and (2) to set up rules that would forbid any employer to retain any worker whose services are more urgently required elsewhere. Rigidly enforced, this order would give Mr. McNutt sweeping powers over civilian employment. While the War Manpower Commission is not given the power to compel a man or women to take a war job in the same way that it can compel a man to enter military service, it can, under the order, see to it that he or she does not work elsewhere.

In the hands of a resolute administrator, this might be all the power needed. Unfortunately, there is little in Mr. McNutt's record to suggest that he has the vision or the courage to make the utmost use of this power. Most observers agree that Mr. McNutt is a capable administrator. His record in the Federal Security Agency has been so satisfactory that many people have forgotten his anti-labor bias as governor of Indiana. No one will question his political astuteness. But his political ambitions are probably his biggest handicap in tackling the man-power job. His seven months' record as chairman of the Manpower Commission is anything but impressive. When the commission was set up, it was understood that the chairman was to have almost unlimited powers in coordinating man-power requirements. To be sure these powers were general rather than specific. They could not be exercised unless Mr. McNutt was willing to fight not only the armed services but a number of other agencies that were jealous of their prerogatives. Mr. McNutt did not fight; good politician that he is, he offended no one and accomplished almost nothing. He did not even formulate a program consistent with the needs of total war until nearly six months of vital time had elapsed. Much as we would prefer to have it otherwise, we find it difficult to believe that he will suddenly blossom forth as the vigorous administrator needed in the present crisis.

We have no such reservations about the appointment of Secretary Wickard as Food Administrator. A single administrator was necessary in order to have over-all planning in the production and allocation of agricultural products. While some persons may feel that Mr. Henderson should have retained control over the entire rationing program, a very convincing case may be made out for placing the rationing of farm products under Mr. Wickard and leaving the control of prices in the hands of Mr. Henderson. Under the new arrangement it is obvious that the two men will have to work very closely together, but there is every indication that they will be able to do so without friction. The choice of Mr. Wickard to manage the food program is a logical one not only because of his position as Secretary of Agriculture in control of the machinery of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration but also on the basis of his record as a non-political and efficient administrator. There is every reason to believe that this part of our war program will be well handled.

Still Muddling Through

DESPITE newspaper reports to the contrary, the row between military and civilian authorities over production scheduling is not yet over. The long-awaited statement from Donald M. Nelson, chairman of the WPB, was so ambiguous that part of the press interpreted it as a victory for the military, part as a victory for the civilians. The statement was ambiguous for two reasons. One is that the conflict was still undecided at the time the statement was issued, and the other is that Nelson was not too anxious to have the fact realized. Vice-Chairman C. E. Wilson has been given what he already had—general supervision over production scheduling. The extent of his supervision is yet to be determined. An administrative order must be issued by Nelson to fix Wilson's precise power and responsibility, but this had not yet been signed as we went to press. Nelson seemed to have difficulty in making up his mind not only on how much power he would try to give Wilson over the military but also how he would divide power at the WPB itself between Wilson and Vice-Chairman Ferdinand Eberstadt, who now has so much that there is little left for Wilson. Virtually all the operating machinery of the WPB is under Eberstadt, including that of "program determination," although the Nelson statement indicates that Wilson is to "determine" programs as well as production scheduling.

These terms are vague and shadowy, but so is the quarrel itself. The substance of power, whatever Nelson does, remains with the military as long as they retain the statutory authority to place the actual contracts. Nelson, if he were a strong character, might possibly use the executive order setting up the WPB to override the armed services and force better scheduling of production. But Nelson shows no more firmness of purpose and strength of will in dealing with the military than he did earlier in the year in dealing with industrialists fighting conversion. Better scheduling of production, like the curtailment of business as usual, is likely to be achieved through the grim necessities of raw-material shortages. This is a wasteful and dilatory method of organizing war production, but there is little prospect that we shall move on to a better under the present system of divided control. What makes divided control particularly bad is that it is divided between military and civilian agencies equally flabby in dealing with big business because both are dominated by it.

It is this which lies at the bottom of our failure to meet the "victory program." The Office of War Information, which is fighting hard to maintain as much truth as possible in government releases, admits that the programs for planes, tanks, and anti-aircraft guns have fallen short of the President's goals; only merchant shipping is ahead of schedule. The actual production figures for 1942 as given out are, of course, enormous: 49,000 planes, 32,000 tanks and self-propelled artillery, and 17,000 anti-aircraft guns. But these figures, notably in aircraft, leave many questions unanswered. How many of these are combat and not training planes? How many will actually be completed and ready to fly into battle by the end of the year, and how many will still be waiting for missing parts?

The President's victory program, huge as it was, might have been achieved if the WPB had not dawdled for more than six months after Pearl Harbor in organizing our production system for war. The victory program, which is steadily being cut down, could still be achieved. It requires tightening up raw-material production, spreading arms work to idle facilities in smaller business, forcing the adoption of new production methods like those Kaiser is using in shipbuilding, and better scheduling of production. The greater the production the smaller the loss of life and the shorter the war. But for this something better than the present muddling through will be required.

One Year After Pearl Harbor

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, December 6

LOOKING back across the year since Pearl Harbor, the President has much with which to be pleased. The task of mobilizing a fairly prosperous and contented capitalist democracy for war is like trying to drive a team of twenty mules, each stubbornly intent on having its own way. Only by continual compromise with the ornery critters is it possible to move forward at all. Examined closely, by the myopic eye of the perfectionist, Mr. Roosevelt's performance in every sphere has been faulty. Regarded in the perspective of his limited freedom of choice and the temper of the country, which has never really been warlike, the year's achievements have been extraordinary. The curtailment and conversion of civilian industry for war, the peaceful resolution of capital-labor difficulties, the preservation to a remarkable extent of both social gains and civil liberties, the great expansion of arms output, the successful launching of our first major offensive represent stupendous and back-breaking tasks. The President is only a man, with twenty-four hours a day at his disposal, and amid the clamor of criticism, much of it justified, it will not hurt to pause a moment in gratitude for his work in the service of our country.

Someone has said that politics is the art of the possible, and Mr. Roosevelt achieved what he did largely by taking the easiest route; the easiest was difficult enough. He let big business mobilize our economy for war pretty much on its own terms, and established what is in effect a government of coalition with the right. Just as King John had to sign on the dotted line for the barons before they would fight, so the President had to come to terms with the quasi-independent corporate sovereignties that control so much of our productive resources. In criticizing him for this, we must also in fairness criticize ourselves. Had labor and the middle-class progressives been better organized, politically more astute, less divided, more competently led, they would have exerted more pressure in the national tug-of-war. The last Congressional elections were an adequate if rough test of just how much influence the labor and liberal elements have in national and local politics. The things that count are not our speeches or our pieces in the paper but the votes we can muster in Congress in support of the measures we demand. It is easy to identify ourselves emotionally with "the people." At the moment the people are not identifying themselves with us.

The Attorney General is the first public official here to say this publicly, at least by implication. "Is the sentiment of the public," Mr. Biddle asked despondently at Charlottesville last Friday, "really moved by the vision of a better world or is it merely disturbed by anxiety about increased taxation and the threat of unemployment after the war? Do the people of our land fight only to win the war and have it over—or to use the war for great and democratic ends?" The answer of big business had been given at the convention of the National Association of Manufacturers two days before, "I am not making guns or tanks," the president of the N. A. M. said, "to win a 'people's revolution' . . . I am not fighting for a quart of milk for every Hottentot or for a TVA on the Danube." In this the N. A. M. spoke also for the War Production Board and for most of our military-diplomatic bureaucracy. Is the answer of the people very different? The Attorney General made it clear that he is afraid that the dominant feeling toward fighting the war is to "get it over." Congress already reflects this desire for "normalcy."

The trend toward the right has gone to ugly extremes "on the hill." In executive committee sessions on the new War Powers bill, the principal objection to the measure was the fear that the President might use it to let in a lot of "non-Aryan" refugees after the war was over. The old slur about the Jew Deal has made a covert reappearance. Sumners of Texas on the floor of the House Wednesday attacked New Deal administrators as "this bunch of people who . . . do not much more than get into this country before they are trying to tell us how to run this government." It would be a mistake to identify "Send 'Em to the Electric Chair" Sumners with the voice of the American people, but there are enough like him in the Democratic Party and in Congress to cheer the Axis and bedevil the Administration. The one part of the war machine generously left to New Dealers is that in which they are certain to become unpopular—the political-suicide assignment of price control and rationing. Sumners and his kind are making the most of it to set the farmer against the New Deal. Wait till they get started on how Lehman is taking food from Americans to feed foreigners!

Coffee of Nebraska thought the Sumners speech "wonderful." Cox of Georgia rose to suggest that perhaps the time had come to break away from party lines in order to get rid of these "carpetbaggers." Rankin of Mississippi and Hoffman of Michigan joined in, unrebuked, though next day Hook of Michigan gave Hoffman a drubbing in debate. Hoffman suggested that Congress set up a new committee to investigate the Marshall Field publications, the left and liberal weeklies, and the Washington Post for attacking Congressmen of this odorous variety in the last campaign. Hook threw Hoffman into confusion by asking whether this meant that the latter had lost faith in the Dies committee. Hoffman replied lamely that Hook and others had criticized the Dies committee so much that "they now have too big a job on their hands to handle all this."

As Congress moves right, the Administration may move with it, if only out of necessity. The precarious course of the Panama agreement through the Senate last week showed how dependent the President and his party leaders are on right-wing Democrats. The debate and the vote were a foretaste of what is coming when we begin to make the peace. The power of a Cordell Hull, who can swing Southern votes, is likely to increase, that of a Henry Wallace to wane, as the drift continues. In a sense we are already losing the peace more rapidly than we are winning the war, for the shape of our society is being determined by the undemocratic and monopolistic fashion in which it has been mobilized for war production. This trend will only be reversed if the Axis staying power proves much greater than, in the present optimistic mood, is now expected.

Is the outlook for the liberals hopeless? Not at all. The pendulum now swinging away from social reform will swing back. At present, in the full flush of boom employment, after twelve years of the New Deal, the country is ready for a change, and 1944 may see a right-wing Republican elected. The reaction is likely to go too far. Workers and farmers will not easily give up what they have won through Mr. Roosevelt since 1933. The idea of social security is too potent to be stifled. The Republicans must either submit to these currents or go under in trying to combat them. The immediate outlook for progressivism is dark, but it has been dark before, and it is some comfort to know that its future is nowhere near as bleak as Adolf Hitler's.

Notes on America

BY KINGSLEY MARTIN

ARRIVING by magic carpet from Europe in what seemed to me still the bright lights of Fifth Avenue, I said to myself, "Nobody in this country could really feel that they were in the war that I have just left, let alone imagine for a moment that they might lose it. They couldn't lose it, of course, in the way the British could lose it; neither Germans nor Japanese have a chance of marching on their flat feet into Washington or flying their flags from the top of the Rockefeller Building. But Americans could lose the war by internal differences and by failing quickly enough to be part of the struggle for liberation in Europe."

Since these reflections the successful opening of the Mediterranean front has brought America decisively into the European struggle. The United States now occupies a position that is similar to Great Britain's in the nineteenth century. Technically, the Atlantic has dwindled into the equivalent of the English Channel, while the English Channel has become nothing more than a remarkably efficient tank trap. The psychology of the two nations will adjust itself accordingly. A European coming to America may one day feel some of the irritation that a Pole or Italian, fighting for national liberty a hundred years ago, used to feel when he escaped to Palmerston's England. Just as England used to decide whether or not it was involved in European affairs, or even went to war on the highest moral principles and was apt, in all good faith, to find them coincident with the interests of Great Britain, so today the United States can preach very high-principled sermons from a bomb-proof pulpit between the Pacific and Atlantic oceans. The British, on the other hand, can no longer afford to muddle through. What did that famous phrase mean? Nothing but that they had more money and more ships and a safer position than other people; so that they could still win wars after making mistakes that would have been the ruin of a Continental nation. Today Britain is part of the Continent and its fate is bound up with that of the other Continental peoples. Instead of muddling through, we British shall have to abandon the boast that we live by instinct and not by intellect; we shall have to use our brains like any other threatened people. This means that one of the main reasons for British unpopularity in the world may disappear. We shall cease to be so irritatingly superior. The mantle of our superiority will fall on American shoulders.

The Englishman who arrives in America today does well to realize that America is a foreign country. He has been apt to take for granted a blood relationship which only in part represents the reality. Any Englishman who travels across the country, who talks and mixes with Americans outside hotels and official quarters, quickly discovers a more closely knit America than there has ever been in the past, composed of a combination of national-ties of which Britain is only one constituent. If he begins to understand this he will see in the malicious columns of the Chicago Tribune not so much a pathological hatred of Britain—though that is there—as a dangerous repudiation by a small section of Americans of the principles on which the United States was founded. He will see the struggle here as part of the same struggle in which Europe is engaged, the struggle of the common people to share in the rights and privileges of civilized society. They are threatened in the United States just as they are threatened in Europe. He will find his solidarity with the mass of American people and must cease to judge what he sees by whether the comments made are “pro-British” or not. Once the British have reached this state of mind, they and the Americans may hope to live down a past which has not been wholly happy.

This friction between the two nations comes from many causes and shows itself in many ways. Psychologists and historians could write innumerable books about it. The British have been incurably ignorant and superior about the United States; the Americans, resentful and misinformed about Britain. The British know no American history at all; the Americans know something of British history, but in a distorted form. Some American history textbooks gravely misrepresent the eighteenth-century story of British blundering; the British, on the other hand, have quite forgotten that they ever made fools of themselves on the western side of the Atlantic. British writers and critics have made this situation worse ever since the days of Mrs. Trollope and Dickens. Again, there is always confusion about language. America is not a child of Britain but a parallel society which has sprung from European stock. Similarly the British language is not a highfaluting form of the American language, nor is the American a debased form of the English language. They are two parallel branches of speech that have developed from a common seventeenth-century stem. Today irritations that spring from a common but divergent inheritance have a new importance. Small in themselves, they perpetuate an unnecessary friction and give a handle to people who for interested reasons wish to keep the United Nations disunited. Obviously the real difficulties today spring from the underlying question of power. During the war we try to hide from ourselves and each other that capitalist rivalry tends not to disappear but to increase. Beneath the surface British business fears the inevitable expansion of American power, while Americans resent the tenacity of British imperialism.

Here we come to the word which is the present symbol of what Americans dislike about Britain. Everywhere I have been in the United States people have asked me about India and the British Empire, whether Britain was changing from a class society and so forth. An analysis of these questions shows no very clear logic, for nothing would alarm Americans more than to have the British power collapse in the middle of the war. On this point American liberals are in a terrible muddle. If there is anything that they attack more than our failure to “quit India,” it is the speed with which we succeeded in quitting Burma.

I can hear a chorus of voices saying, quite truly, that I have myself led the way in criticizing the imperialist behavior of the British, the manner of our Blimpish defense which underestimated the importance of Chinese help and fails to find a solution for India. Certainly. But my point is that much American criticism of British imperialism proves on analysis to spring not from a dislike of imperialism or from an interest in equality for the colored people. Often today it seems to be just the form which American antagonism to traditional Britain takes at the present moment.

Let me explain. Almost all Americans, nurtured in this socially egalitarian atmosphere, dislike something which they particularly identify with Britain. They say the British look down their noses; they say we are class-ridden; they simply will not believe it when you mention the fact that the most advanced sentiments are often expressed by the handful of peers who are the effective members of the House of Lords. Many of them do not yet know the difference between the commonwealth and the empire. I have met Americans who are sure you are lying when you tell them that Canada, Australia, and South Africa are not subject states. They blandly ask you why Canada pays taxes to Britain, and the retort that, on the contrary, Britain pays Canada for all it buys and that British purchases from India are wiping out India's public debt just leaves them skeptical. But it is not this misinformation, which is after all no more aggravating to an Englishman than British ignorance of any American figures except George Washington and Abraham Lincoln is to Americans, that I am now worrying about. My point is that much of this criticism of Britain has nothing to do with facts: it is dislike of a picture of the English ruling-class man, who is supposed to be out-of-date, effete, useless, and yet somehow all-powerful and always successful in outwitting the simple-minded American in spite of the fact that America is now the most powerful, intelligent, moral, and magnificently efficient country in the world.

Whenever I ask about English speakers and visitors to the United States I am told the same thing. Americans like direct, extrovert Englishmen and do not often meet them. Herbert Hodge, the taxi driver who wrote “It's Draughty in Front,” is the sort of person who many Americans feared did not exist in England. They are quite excited when they hear him speak. “Why,” they say, “after all, the English people really must be quite like Americans.”

In the same way a well-known trade unionist in the United States asked me why we did not more often send to this country trade unionists like the members of his own union. "We get the impression," he said—this conversation took place before the visit of Jack Tanner and others to the United States—"that the British trade unionists are like Sir Walter Citrine." This was not a personal criticism of Citrine, but a reference to his title. A title of any sort is a serious barrier to successful contact with American labor, indeed, with the whole American public. I have also had people say to me that it was refreshing to meet Englishmen who did not turn out to agree with Winston Churchill about India. Only a critic of British imperialism can successfully discuss that subject in America. No one pays attention to official spokesmen, whether Indians or British, who go around making an uncritical defense of Britain. There is much ignorance in America about the British war effort and the British cause and British society—though not more than the ignorance in Britain about American history and American society. But if this ignorance is to be remedied, the correction must come from those who are dissatisfied with Britain and its record and whose aspirations for change make them acceptable to the American public.

But is England changing? Americans constantly ask.

Official Britain answers unconvincingly and sometimes disingenuously. Official Britain is far too much impressed by the seeming importance of the wealthy and prominent people who are terrified of socialism. Official Britain, indeed, gets all hot and bothered by this question. Apparently Americans want Britain to change, but if we say that under the strain of war and the influence of bombing we are making important social strides, we are at once accused of the terrible crime of socialism. We mustn't be feudal; we must move very rapidly, apparently to the left; and yet under no circumstances must we become in the least "red." This is a difficult pattern to which to conform, and the truth is the British would do much better in America if they worried less about what Important People thought and bluntly refused to appease those who are in any case dubious friends of Britain and not by any means certainly the future rulers of the United States. The Englishman who is disliked by most Americans represents a scarcely higher proportion of British people than the similar class represents in the United States. A Welshman who knows America intimately remarked to me the other day that the official spokesmen of England, the men who manage to appear to govern it, really come from a very small group and live in a very restricted area. "There is," he remarked, "a section around Oxford and Cambridge and in London and the home counties which arrogates to itself the title of British and which I and all my friends from Scotland, Wales, and the provinces of Britain dislike just as much as the average American dislikes it."

STOP THOSE IMPOSTORS

In a word, the friction between America and Britain is aggravated by trivialities that spring from history and tradition, but the real conflict is exactly that which now divides the world. It is not a simple conflict; it is at one and the same time a struggle between established ruling classes and a struggle against them by common people in each country. Henry Wallace had a word for it.

Pity the Federal Employee

BY JERRY KLUTTZ

Washington, December 1

THE federal employee used to be envied as one who had a secure job and a sinecure. Today he is to be pitied. He and his work are misrepresented by men in high places. He is harassed on all sides. He is told that he is a slacker and a draft-dodger, that he is a thumb-twiddler. His loyalty is impugned by investigations. He is the target of a double-barreled Congressional inquiry. He is discriminated against in the matter of overtime pay. He has watched the government raise the wages of his colleagues in industry while it refuses any increase to persons in its own service.

Many federal workers have quit their jobs to go into private industry. The turnover rate has become enormous. In the District of Columbia it is running around 83 per cent; outside the District it is somewhat less, about 65 per cent. Washington is alarmed. It believes that unless steps are taken immediately to improve the relations between the government and its employees, the government will suffer.

Low-salaried employees can barely eke out an existence in Washington. The basic rates of pay have not been changed in years despite the increase in living costs, especially since the war. And on January 1 the 5 per cent victory tax will be deducted from the federal employee's pay check along with 10 per cent for war bonds and 5 per cent for retirement, a total of 20 per cent. Washington is about the most expensive of all cities to live in, and the men and women in the low salary brackets will leave the city in droves unless Congress puts up more money.

After all, they can go back to their home towns and find good jobs in war industries with pay and a half for overtime. Only 60 per cent of federal workers are paid overtime, though the President has repeatedly urged Congress to pass a uniform law on the subject.

After an attack on government employees as draft-dodgers, led by Senator Tydings of Maryland, the President canceled all draft deferments for them. The workers reacted by volunteering for military service by the thousand. Production in government shipyards and arsenals was threatened. Key administrators of draft age were ready to resign. Apparently the President realized his error, for he modified the order somewhat by instructing the army and navy not to give commissions to "essential" federal workers or accept them as volunteers. Selective Service, however, can still order the induction of any federal employee. The vast majority of those who have been deferred are in industrial plants; they are the skilled workers, technicians, architects, scientists, and engineers who would be deferred if they were working for Henry Ford or United States Steel. There may have been abuses of the deferment privilege in government, but probably no more than in industry.

The case against federal workers is based in part on their enormous number. In World War I the high-water mark was 917,000; today the War Department alone has more than 1,200,000 civilian employees and the Navy Department more than 500,000. In all, more than 2,600,000 civilians, according to the Civil Service Commission, work for Uncle Sam, and the number is increasing hourly. Moreover, the employees themselves complain of lack of work, duplication, and general mismanagement.

A tested friend of the federal worker, Representative Robert Ramspeck of Georgia, chairman of the House Civil Service Committee, heads a House committee that will investigate the government's personnel policies. The inquiry is expected to be constructive; Ramspeck promises he won't conduct a witch-hunt. A New Dealer and the majority whip of the House, he has the confidence of both Congress and the President. He has pushed through the House every important reform bill passed to improve the status of civil-service employees in the last ten years. It is fortunate for the Administration that the investigation will be in his friendly hands. For, after all, the Civil Service Commission and the War Manpower Commission have publicly acknowledged that the federal government has wasted the abilities of thousands of its employees and that federal agencies "pirate" workers from one another.

Ramspeck attributes much of the confusion and misunderstanding in Washington to that natural ailment, growing pains. The government has taken on about a million civilian workers in the first full year of war, many of them untrained. Confusion and inefficiency have been aggravated, he believes, by the low level of supervisors. He will try to help the agencies to straighten out a bad situation rather than carry on his investigation in the newspapers. He has been necessarily slow in starting his inquiry because of the heavy Republican gains in the House, which will change the membership of his Civil Service Committee.

Meanwhile, Senator Byrd of Virginia has sensationally recommended that a third of the government's civilian employees should be fired. And it does in fact appear as if a large block could be dismissed without hampering the war effort. The most ardent New Dealers agree with the reactionaries about the existence of mass idleness and wasted effort. But the question remains, Which employees should be fired? If Senator Byrd's quota of dismissals is to be reached, either drastic cuts must be made in the War and Navy departments or practically all other federal agencies must be wiped out.

Senator Byrd and his followers probably do not realize to what an extent the war has forced the government to move in and take over. The civil-service figure of 2,600,000 has very little real meaning today. There are tens of thousands of persons now working solely for the government, under government supervision and direction, for salaries paid from the United States Treasury, who are not federal workers in the strict sense of the term. The War Department, for example, requires war plants to maintain a staff of civilian guards against sabotage. The number is a military secret, but it runs into thousands. Though the department reimburses the plants for the wages of these men, it does not employ them. The government has also taken over ships, docks, and warehouses but considers many of the crews that man them to be private employees. The same thing is true of the workers in the scores of hotels the government has taken over. If all these people were classified as federal employees, the total figure might soar to 5,000,000.

On the other hand, the government could change its policy and whittle down the number of civilian employees. Civilians today are building airfields and shore stations inside and outside the country; civilians are working in the cantonments and training centers at everything from laundering to the provision of utilities. These jobs and many thousands more could be filled by soldiers and sailors, and the civilians could be fired. But in that case we should need a larger army and navy.

Thus the figure of 2,600,000 that Senator Byrd says would so shock the people is a paper figure that could be changed overnight by a paper transaction. Federal workers could perhaps be cut a third, but the cost to the taxpayers might be even greater than it is now.

The private war worker is praised on all sides. The federal worker is urged to continue his job in the name of patriotism and to help win the war. But he gets no glory.

Life with Kaiser

BY BERNARD TAPER

Richmond, Cal., November 16

I'VE just finished working on a 10,500-ton cargo ship called the Robert E. Peary which was launched four days after the laying of the keel and outfitted ready for delivery two days after that. And on the seventh day, I presume, Henry J. Kaiser rested.

A lot of people reading about this record ship are now getting the idea that if there is a convoy for the Solomons gathering off San Francisco Bay that is lacking a ship or two, all it will have to do is wait around a week and let the Richmond Shipyards perform a couple of miracles. It doesn't quite work like that. A great deal of time went into prefabrication before this ship's keel could be laid. (I'll call it "Hull 440" rather than the Peary; during the weeks we lived with it that was the only name we knew it by, though we frequently added colorful adjectives of our own.)

before the keel was laid and when decks were built one at a time in simple progression, the period from the laying of the keel to the delivery of the ship could be regarded as the actual construction time; but nowadays there is a certain measure of hokum, verbal conjuring, or what you will involved in using the old yardsticks to measure construction speed records. For the laying of the keel is no longer a beginning, or even the end of a beginning, to use Churchill's phrase. For us workmen, who spend about a month putting together deckhouses, double bottoms, forepeaks, and the numerous other gigantic sections—some weighing over a hundred tons—which are ultimately hoisted on to the ship, the laying of the keel represents, in fact, the beginning of the end.

The rapidity with which Hull 440 was put together was nevertheless incredible to all of us. Within two hours after the laying of the keel at 12:01 Sunday morning the entire bottom shell—50 feet by 500 feet—was welded into place. Six hours later we had put in all the amidships inner-bottom sections, the entire engine assembly, three great transverse bulkheads, two big shell sections, and a centerline bulkhead. By the end of the day the hull was shaped and half of its 2,900 tons of steel had been lifted into place. On that one day we did something like 18,000 feet of welding.

The second day we put in the rest of the bulkheads, the sheer strakes, the fan tail, the fresh-water tanks, and the midship deckhouse. By the end of the day the upper deck was completed.

On the third day all of the superstructure—the deckhouses, the masts, and the windlass—went on. The huge rudder went on then, too, a day ahead of schedule. And also the anti-aircraft guns.

And on the fourth and last day we finished up—the welding, riveting, electrical wiring, and the painting. The last workers on the ship were a crew of laborers with brooms and dustpans, tidying it all up.

Despite rumors to the contrary Hull 440 was no empty hull. When it went down the skids, it was complete with lifebelts, electric clocks, coat hangers, desks, inkwells, and signs in all the toilets saying "Water Unfit for Drinking." As the deckhouse was hoisted through the air we half expected to see a captain—prefabricated, too, perhaps—already pacing the bridge, nervously keeping a sharp eye out for submarines.

For several days before the laying of the keel the shipway looked as though a giant jigsaw puzzle had been tipped out of its box—the front of the ship here, a pile of pipe there, shell plates over there, and double bottoms one on top of the other. Once the keel was laid, the appearance of the ship kept changing rapidly; if you left the scene for an hour during those first two days you found quite a different contour when you returned. Men swarmed all over the hull twenty-four hours of the day, like "maggots on a dead fish," as one of the welders put it. Piled all over the decks and bottoms and festooned over the staging were miles of welders' and burners' cables, intricately twisted. One felt even on the last day that it would take a full crew of men a week merely to untangle these cables. But imperceptibly the din of work diminished; crews of men completed their tasks and drifted over to the staging of the next shipway in order to watch the launching, trying to grasp the fact that the ship was all finished. It was as though someone had come when our backs were turned for a moment, had taken away Hull 440 that we were working on, and had sailed this Robert E. Peary—with its fine coat of gray paint, bunting flying from the masts, and hooded guns tilted skyward over the cement gun tubs—right up the way to the keel blocks. The christening went off without any of the untoward accidents that superstitious sailors fear, and the ship went down the skids. From where I was standing beside the launching platform it seemed to grow larger as it slid away, a strange reversal of the laws of perspective due probably to the fact that its sweeping outlines had become perceptible for the first time.

As the twenty-five thousand spectators, still unbelieving, waited for Hull 440 to fill with water and slowly sink, a small section of the keel for the next ship was swung out and laid in place. Meanwhile the men from the outfitting dock were swarming upon Hull 440 to perform the numerous tests necessary before the ship is delivered to the Maritime Commission.

Our yards here in Richmond are laid out over a tremendous area compared to Eastern and European yards, which is one of the reasons why such an extensive pre-assembly system is possible. I don't know the exact amount of space these yards occupy—they form the largest shipbuilding unit in the world—but when you stand on the flying bridge of a ship in construction you look out over an enormous acreage of shipways along which are moving the "whirly" cranes, stretching their long necks with a kind of stiff solicitousness as they gingerly set down their loads. Between two of the yards is the huge prefabrication plant, resembling a dirigible hangar, where the deckhouses and boilers are constructed, to be carried on great trailers to the ships.

Improved methods of yard transportation, standardization of design, and mass production of parts are other vital factors in the speed with which we are building these ships. Another, paradoxically, is our lack of experience in shipbuilding. Most of the top men in the Richmond yards never worked on a ship before last year; they are old Coulee and Bonneville Dam men. The few men around the yards who did work on ships during the last war, like persons of Victorian morals who suddenly find themselves moving about with a racy set, seem always to have a slightly bewildered air at the unorthodox methods of procedure. A great many of the men in these yards are Middle Westerners who never saw the ocean until a few months ago. They have done strange—though not always illogical—things to traditional nautical terminology. "The hold," for instance, has become "the hole" even in writing; a ship is "corked" to make it watertight; and the place where all the pots and stoves are is called the "gallery."

Among the seventy thousand workers in the Richmond yards there are former cooks, clerks, mechanics, anthropologists, ballet dancers, and men of any other calling you can imagine. There are even some ship workers. Anybody who wants to work can have a job. The day I was hired I sat next to a man who some years ago had suffered a stroke which had paralyzed his left side; the personnel office was going to figure out some way to put his right side to work. There is a chipper working with me who is so old that he looks like John D. Rockefeller in his last weeks—and chipping is strenuous work.

The full piquant flavor of the general casting is something you slowly discover and relish long afterward. I asked one of the steamfitters how it happened that so many of his crewmates were anthropologists, half expecting some enlightening explanation about the comparative cranial measurements of steamfitters and anthropologists. But he said it was "purely a historical accident." One anthropologist had been hired as a steamfitter, and he later got some of his friends on. Then there is the crew of riggers made up, in the main, of ex-ballet dancers. Riggers are the men who deftly and fleetly clamber over staging, hooking and unhooking the crane loads. I've seen them leaping from two-by-fours to mast poles. And I've seen some who casually walk the two-inch top of the hold, which is some fifty feet deep. I would say that while not all ballet dancers possess the fearlessness necessary for rigging, nearly all riggers possess the grace and agility of dancers. All riggers are a delight to watch, this crew being merely more conscious of rigging as an art form. A girl who had done alteration work at Bonwit Tellers got a job through what might be called casting by verbal accident. She told the hiring office that her main experience had been as a fitter; so they hired her as a shipfitter—and she's doing very well, trimming bulkheads twenty feet high. But perhaps the most astute bit of personnel work was the hiring of a former wrestler as a flanger. The flangers are the men who beat, heat, shrink, pull, and twist unsatisfactory bulkheads into place; and there is not a better job for a wrestler in the whole shipbuilding industry.

The attitude of the workmen toward the record ship is an odd mixture of cynicism and pride, much as though they were saying, "Yeah, it's a kind of a phony record, but by God we're the ones that made it!" Resentment over working conditions which are more annoying and more hazardous than is normally the case alternate with curiosity and even enthusiasm. I know of one tank tester who voluntarily worked for nothing on his day off, though he went right on grumbling about "the god-awful madhouse." Men like to grumble as they work; ships are cursed, not nursed, to completion. This grumbling is without self-pity and couldn't possibly be mistaken for whining; usually it takes the form of irony. I found a typical expression of it in words chalked beside the narrow entrance to the double bottoms, a space used for storing oil and ballast water. The air here was foul and the heat almost unbearable, and many suffered welders' "flashes," a painful though rarely serious eye-burn. Someone had written at the entrance, "This way to Health Farm." Actually there were few serious accidents—not as many, I believe, as occur on the average ship, though it is difficult to see why.

Unlike large industries run along the lines of the automobile factory, shipyards seem to release the personality of the individual rather than stifle it. The shipyard worker runs the machines instead of being run by them. Even the helpers seem to have a good knowledge of the way ships are put together and to understand numerous details outside of their own little job. You'll hear a man who has been employed only a month saying, seriously, "If I were running this place, I could have them turning out twice as many ships." And it is surprising how frequently his ideas turn out to be valuable. Hundreds of workmen's suggestions were used in the building of Hull 440, ranging from gigantic jigs that save weeks in the construction of inner bottoms to little clamps that hold girders firm while they are being welded. Without these workmen's inventions and suggestions Hull 440 would never have been a record job. The men are quite possessive about the yards and just about as paternalistic toward Kaiser as he is toward them, regarding him with a fond and fatherly incredulity.

Most of the men are proud of their particular craft. Painters are sure that paint is what holds the ship together. For a while I had the job of putting up temporary wooden strongbacks to support the bulkheads until they were welded. I didn't like that job because the temporary nature of the strongbacks prevented me from acquiring that pleasant sense of self-importance. Now I'm on the crew that lays out and puts up steel doors, and everything is fine. To us it is the doors that make a ship seaworthy. Beside a small and insignificant weld on the bridge deck, which must be at least fifty feet above the water line, one of the welders actually scribbled the words: "She is O. K. Put her on the pond now. She will float."

Hull 440 marks, without doubt, a turning-point in shipbuilding history—not because it was launched a few days after the laying of the keel, but because it demonstrated conclusively that the only way to build ships rapidly is to prefabricate them, and because it utilized hundreds of new inventions, devices, and techniques. It represents the real beginning of the mass production of ships. Hull 440 was 61 per cent prefabricated. Man hours—including the time spent in prefabrication—were cut 6 per cent. As a result of what was learned from Hull 440 the construction time of the ten next ships will be cut from an average of 40.6 days to 31.9 days. Next month our nineteen ways should launch nineteen ships. By the beginning of the year the full value of Hull 440 will be felt, as its lessons are modified and absorbed. Average time on the shipway will drop to 25 days per ship, and our two yards constructing Liberty ships will, it is estimated, launch 275 ships next year—about a hundred more than would have been launched at our old rate of construction. That record will mean considerably more to us than the fact that we were able to deliver one ship in less than a week.

Spain's Zero Hour?

OUTWARDLY, there is no sign of anything brewing in Spain. Press and radio give the impression that there is nothing to fear from that quarter. The mobilization order issued by the Cabinet three weeks ago has been interpreted as proof of Spain's determination to maintain the status quo. Since it was obvious that the British-American command had no intention of moving in the direction of the Spanish Peninsula or through the Moroccan protectorate, there was no question in the Allied capitals that the order was meant as a warning to Germany. Then came Franco's declaration that he would turn to either side for help if the other violated Spain's neutrality, and that apparently satisfied those still inclined to question.

In the past week, among people close to the sources of news, this confidence has begun to break down. For one thing, Hitler's good friend Serano Suñer has been reappointed to the Council of the Falange. Then there is the recall of General Antonio Aranda Mata from his important post in the army, and his replacement by General Alfredo Kindelán. Aranda, the defender of Oviedo, has been regarded as the one truly pro-Ally general in Franco's army, while Kindelán is known to be as pro-Nazi as Suñer himself. Another disquieting fact is the distinctly anti-British and anti-American tone of the Valladolid Radio.

These are recent events. Other evidences of Franco's double-dealing must have been picked up by the Allied intelligence services long ago. For instance, it is no deep secret that German submarines have been going in and out of the port of Palos quite as if it were a German port. A submarine arrives as a pleasure craft, the captain disembarks to visit a friend, and while he enjoys a couple of glasses of manzanilla the crew fills her up with oil—and no doubt with ammunition too. The same thing has probably been going on along the Atlantic coast.

One need only glance at the map to appreciate the value that the Nazis attach to Spanish Morocco. Even before the First World War it was famous as a nest of German intrigue. Now, with the frontier between France and Spain entirely in Nazi hands, and with France held completely incommunicado, nothing could be easier for the Nazis—without their even having to risk a formal march through Spain—than to smuggle into Morocco a stream of technicians, artillerymen, and aviators, to say nothing of Gestapo agents and agitators.

If this is the information that is reaching official ears in Washington, a showdown on Spain cannot be far off.

Britons on the Peace

[Nowhere is public opinion more alert to the political side of the present struggle than in England. A good many people there seem determined not to allow this "war for democracy" to degenerate into just another test of strength between two opposing groups of powers. They of course want to see Hitler defeated. That is their first aim; all other considerations are relegated to a secondary plane. But at the same time they are fighting with great courage for a democratic conduct of the war and for a genuine People's Peace. In so doing they are not plagued by the fear that they may be impeding the smooth functioning of the government. On the contrary, they feel that they serve both the war and the peace by standing firm against the increasing tide of reaction which, with the improvement in the military situation, threatens to sweep the country. This is a most interesting aspect of Political War, and one to which we shall refer from time to time in this section. We print below quotations from the English press.]

THE SAME SONG IN LONDON

I am sorry to say it, but in many high quarters the outmoded nationalist idea still prevails that every [Italian] anti-Fascist is "a traitor to his country" and not quite a gentleman, certainly not to be encouraged. It is this idea which has blocked every attempt by free Italians to create a fighting force to help the Allied cause.

The quarters to which I refer are the same ones that entertain delusions about Badoglio and the Crown Prince staging an overthrow of Mussolini. They now realize that Mussolini must go, having committed "an error of judgment" on June 10, 1940; but they still hope that Grandi or some other "gentleman" can be stepped into his place.—IVOR THOMAS, M. P., in Reynolds' News.

VATICAN PEACE

On the other hand, the Vatican would be concerned about the maintenance in Italy, no less than in Spain, of a political and social order that reflects the Catholic traditions of those countries.—The Catholic Herald.

HOPE FOR HITLER

Now Hitler's is not the only brain in Europe. Sir William Beveridge has all his knowledge without his absurd collection of phobias. Mr. Churchill is not impervious to common sense and decency and feeling. He was the first English politician who dared to say that Lenin was a great man. He stood up against continuing the Black and Tan terror in Ireland. There is hope for him yet. There is hope even for Hitler's phobias. They began with Hapsburgphobia, which developed into Slavphobia, then into Jewphobia, Marxphobia, Social-Democrathobia, Polephobia, Czechphobia, and Bolshevikphobia. He admired us as Nordics. But he has found us out, and found out all the other Nordics as well. He has ended with a Mankindphobia from which only Central Germans are excepted. Perhaps he will find them out, too, presently; and then we shall see what we shall see.—BERNARD SHAW in Central Europe.

WATCH THE "CONVERTS"!

The European underground movements have, in practice, already worked out some methods of a clear political selection. . . . It will be enough . . . to point to one illuminating instance. The French Socialists have laid down a whole set of rules for the readmission to their movement of those former Socialist deputies who did not vote against Pétain at the last session of the parliament.

Such members can be readmitted only in exceptional cases, when they have proved through hard and dangerous underground work against the enemy that their "conversion" has actually been sincere. Their readmission can be granted only at the request of the rank-and-file members of the underground organization.

The "convert" cannot occupy any leading post in the movement; and his readmission is on trial. Such a set of rules gives, no doubt, a good chance for a proper sifting of the political staff in question. It would, however, be encouraging to know that this kind of quarantine is being applied not only to former Socialist M. P.'s but also to some penitents from the fascist ranks.—The Observer.

WHO ARE THE ALLIES?

It is always better to take a line and not try to please everybody (that is, unless you prefer the Goebbels technique). Now it is quite true, as various official persons have pointed out to me from time to time, that there are people abroad, to whom our propaganda is directed, who are afraid that we in Britain are drifting too far to the left. But such people are not worth comforting. They will never, in my view, make good allies against fascism. They are mostly potential Quislings. The hard core of resistance to fascism is never found among such people. Therefore, their existence is a poor excuse for not basing our propaganda upon positive democratic aims, for not talking straight to the common folk everywhere, who know very well that fascism is not some old-fashioned nationalistic nonsense but a gigantic attempt, on the part of power-crazy groups, to suppress and then wickedly to exploit the ordinary people.—J. B. PRIESTLEY, in the Observer.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

ONE DAY toward the end of last March traffic in Paris was almost completely halted for a great parade of troops. The parade had been widely advertised, and the troops that marched in it bore a singular name: they were called Waffen-S.S., which may be roughly translated "S.S.-at-arms." It took them eight hours to pass a given point. Two weeks later a film of this parade was shown in all the cinemas of Europe. In the words of a Stockholm newspaper, it pictured "thousands of new tanks and armored cars. All the equipment was new, and the artillery was of the most modern type." The S.S. pure and simple was well known—the Black Shirt army which under the command of the sinister Himmler served, together with the Gestapo, as a political police force. But what was this new Waffen-S.S.?

People who had followed developments closely were aware that the new organization had been founded in the fall of 1940 as an addition to the S.S. There was even an official document on the subject. On August 6, 1940, the Führer had laid down the "fundamental principles concerning the necessity of a Waffen-S.S." On September 11 this statement of principles had been transmitted to the highest-ranking officers of the army, for their information. At that time the communication went only to the commanding generals and was marked "secret." But a few months later, on March 21, 1941, Headquarters again distributed the document, and this time to all officers down to battalion commanders and battalion adjutants. Thus when the British captured the staff of an artillery battalion in Libya, a copy of the order fell into their hands.

This edict of Hitler's provides us with an authentic account of the new organization. It begins: "It would be intolerable, in critical internal situations, to send German armed forces conscripted from the entire population into action against their fellow-citizens. Such a step would be the beginning of the end. A state that is compelled to resort to such measures . . . thereby abdicates." But if a conscript army may not be used against the people, another body of troops must be formed that will be "capable on any and every occasion of representing and asserting the authority of the Reich." This force must be made up of "men of the best German blood who unconditionally identify themselves with the Weltanschauung on which the Greater German Reich is based." Only such an organization will be capable of "resisting disruptive influences in critical times. Such a body will feel pride in its integrity and will therefore never fraternize with the proletariat or with that underworld which undermines our basic ideas."

There was another requirement: "In our German Reich of the future a police force will possess the necessary authority in its relations with other citizens only if it has a soldierly character. Through their experience of glorious military events and their education by the National Socialist Party our people have acquired such a soldierly mentality that a sock-knitting police (as in 1848) or a bureaucratic police (as in 1918) can no longer assert authority. For this reason it is necessary for the state police, in its own closed units, to prove itself at the front in the same way and to make blood sacrifices to the same degree as any other unit of the armed forces." In the meantime—that is, until this new body is needed against its fellow-citizens—it can be used in the occupied regions against "national groups which are not per se and a priori well disposed toward the Reich."

Perhaps one should admire the foresight with which the Führer, at the height of his military triumphs, created additional machinery for dealing with future critical internal situations. Were, then, the existing means of control not enough—the regular police, plus the octopus of the old S.S., plus the Gestapo? Clearly they were not enough in the special circumstances of the war, when so many million men have weapons in their hands. They were not enough for those who had the 1918 situation in mind, as Hitler and his group have it constantly in mind. The Nazi government needs a better instrument than was available then; it needs an instrument which stands apart from and outside the people; above all, an instrument that can be used against wavering sections of the army, one that is equal or superior to the army in training, war experience, and arms.

The present strength of the Waffen-S.S. probably exceeds 750,000 men. There is a sinister significance in the fact that its recruiting appeals are addressed particularly to the very young. It prefers to enrol boys of seventeen, the low age limit. And as a few months in the so-called Arbeitsdienst are a prerequisite, even boys of sixteen can apply; if they are accepted they serve the rest of their sixteenth year in the Arbeitsdienst and on their seventeenth birthday join the Waffen-S.S. They are the "human material" which Hitler and Himmler seem to think most promising for their special purpose. These boys have never in their life seen or heard anything but Nazism; they can be expected to have the brutality that goes with a complete lack of human experience; and they have not yet developed any genuine or constant human relationships.

Those are facts to keep in mind when one speculates on whether the Germans are likely to revolt. At the moment they are certainly very, very far from it. And even if the impulse to revolt were present, or if it should develop, it is easier to speak the word, easier to cherish the wish, than to do the deed. The machinery that is being prepared to cope with such an eventuality is more powerful than any that has ever existed before.

Article III

BY HENRI LAUGIER

ARTICLE III of the Atlantic Charter reads: "They [the signatories] respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them."

The wording of this statement has been sharply criticized, and justly so. For it appears to allow all peoples an unconditional right to whatever form of government they may choose—Fascist, Nazi, or any other, even one founded on the explicit denial of the rights of man or of the four freedoms proclaimed by President Roosevelt.

Men now know that fascism is the prime enemy of democracy and liberty; that the capital crime of the victorious nations in the period between the two wars was to tolerate the installation of a Fascist regime in Italy and of Nazi rule in Germany, to permit aggression against China and Ethiopia, and to stand aside while the forces of international totalitarianism reduced unhappy Spain to peonage.

Public opinion now demands that the chiefs of the United Nations assume the leadership of democracy throughout the world. Communists have always labored to make the whole world Communist; Nazis have worked with passion—and at what cost!—to Nazify us all. It remains for the democratic peoples to strive with all their might for universal democracy—social, political, and economic.

Fortunately, though the wording of the text of Article III is ambiguous, there is no real doubt about its spirit. In the minds of its authors it was not intended to sanction any betrayal of liberty; it was meant to convey that the governments of free nations must have the constant support of their peoples, freely given.

If such is the meaning of Article III, it is desirable to have a clarified text that will dissipate the ambiguities. It may appear bold to propose a new text for a section of the Atlantic Charter, but in reality it is in all humility that I submit one to the consideration of all democratic peoples. It is this: "They affirm the right of all peoples to choose, with the guaranty of complete liberty of decision, the form of government under which they will live; and they proclaim their faith in government of the people, by the people, and for the people. They intend to provide the restoration of sovereign rights and self-government to those who have been forcibly deprived of them. Limitations of national sovereignty should be imposed only in order to achieve an efficient international organization."

This new text appears to me to conform more closely to the general public will. I explain the various

Hitler's New Role

President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill may well warn people against assuming that Nazi defeat is now only a matter of months. With news of the first victories care took flight, and Washington correspondents began to report that bets were being laid on the date of the war's end—some putting their money on March, others on the middle of May, with the arrival of good weather. Let us be cheerful, let us smile, let us worry just a little about the last phase of the war and nothing at all about the peace. All our enemies will be beaten, and everything will come out all right. In harmony with this happy mood the most extraordinary stories have begun to circulate about the collapse of morale in the enemy ranks, about quarrels between the Führer and his generals, about the changed attitude of the Nazi leaders. The latest of these stories, reported by the Associated Press on November 30, says that Hitler has asked Hjalmar Schacht, his financial genius, to write a report "on what would occur if Germany were beaten." It shows Hitler in a new and chastened mood—not ready to set fire to besieged Europe before giving it up, not prepared to murder the last Jew and to kill resisting Christians by the million, but just thinking anxiously about the economic future of Germany. The next story will present him amiably sharing a glass of beer with Pastor Niemöller and discussing the foundations of eternal peace.

changes as follows: (1) The words "with the guaranty of complete liberty of decision" denote free expression of the popular will without any deceptive phrases which might sanction a new "march on Rome" or false plebiscite. (2) A proclamation of faith in government of the people, by the people, and for the people, in the very text of their charter, commits the United Nations to fight for universal democracy. (3) The substitution of the words "they intend to provide" for "they wish to see" replaces an attitude of friendly observation with one of militant responsibility. (4) The final sentence of the new text provides that limitations of sovereignty may only be imposed for the sake of efficient international organization. This important addition paves the way for the possible limitations upon, or transfers of, sovereignty which might have to be imposed in order to transform nations now allied into nations truly united, an essential factor in the organization of a free world.

I do not presume to think that this new text will actually be substituted for the one now in force. But I am convinced that any discussion it may provoke will serve a useful purpose.

The Turn Toward Victory

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

THE war in Russia has at last reached a stage favorable to the United Nations. Last year six months of winter defensive fighting weakened Germany's fighting strength, impaired its morale, and forced it to give ground, but the Wehrmacht remained sufficiently strong to regain the initiative in the spring and administer a crushing defeat to its foes, capturing in the process areas of enormous strategic and economic value. These gains, however, like those of Russia's winter offensive, were partly illusory, for the Germans were never able to annihilate the Red Army or to cut off its supplies.

Monotonous communiqués stressing attacks and counter-attacks, with streets or villages won at high cost, obscured for a time a gradual change in the front. After Hitler's speech announcing that the Germans would take Stalingrad but at other points content themselves with holding ground already gained and repelling enemy attacks, the scale and energy of German offensives were markedly cut. By early November this was plainly noticeable, with official German communiqués reporting action by hundreds rather than thousands of troops. Clearly the German generals, not wanting a repetition of the 1941-42 winter, were preparing winter quarters and hoping to hold off the Russians until the main body of their troops could retire to prepared and easily defended positions. Meanwhile, in deference to Hitler, they continued the increasingly futile attacks at Stalingrad.

For the second time Hitler had failed to reach even his minimum objective. The German army, though still the most formidable weapon on earth, had clearly passed its stage of greatest threat. Gains of territory had been materially less than in the preceding year. Russian defensive prowess had become so marked that only a most unlooked-for break-through offered any hope of ending the war. At the same time the German victories, though smaller than last year, were still victories. The Russians had not yet demonstrated any capacity to carry out sustained drives of their own. Hence, unless very powerful intervention in the west changed the situation, the year 1942 was Hitler's.

A retreat to prepared positions, nevertheless, presents distinct dangers, since a reduced force may be assaulted at any time by an enemy at full strength. Such a withdrawal seems the most likely explanation of the huge early Russian gains at Stalingrad. For some months the Russians had been pressing from the north and south against the bases of the Stalingrad salient. Whether at first these attacks were purposely not pushed home, so that the Germans would be lulled into a sense of security, or whether their sudden success was due to the weakening of the German flanks is a question which cannot yet be answered. Another mystery is how the signs of an imminent attack were concealed in a terrain utterly devoid of natural cover. The official Russian account of feints elsewhere is not entirely convincing. Why were the Germans so easily taken in? Was there a blackout in local leadership? The extremely large bag of prisoners, which was not duplicated in the offensives farther north, also demands explanation. If bad morale is the clue, as suggested in some quarters, we may be in a much better war position than anyone in authority has dared to assert.

At any rate, the present gains of the Soviets justify a definite though qualified optimism. The Germans have already lost heavily in man-power and material and are likely to lose more before they reach prepared positions. They have had to use reserves as support to prevent disaster and slow up the Russian advance. Thus against their will and with forces weakened by withdrawals, they are engaged in a war of movement, in which one observes with interest the absence of large German air forces and the comparative scarcity of tanks. Winter fighting, however, is materially different from fighting at other seasons of the year. Last year Russian announcements that various enemy units were being "surrounded" were not in most cases followed by announcements of their annihilation. At the moment of writing this is true at Stalingrad as well. In the first few days of the present offensive progress was extremely rapid, but the Russian war machine, judged by past performance in winter fighting, is more slow moving than that of the Germans and not always able to close the pincers quickly and forcibly enough to destroy enveloped forces.

Some observers have found the explanation for German weakness in Russia in the North African defeats. This is doubtful, since Hitler announced a defensive policy on this front before the rout of Rommel began. In other ways, however, the African campaign is likely to be of aid to Stalin. Russia's distrust of its allies visibly began to subside with the proof that they too were willing to fight to win the war. Diversion of German air power to Southern Europe has certainly made easier the delivery of supplies by the extraordinarily perilous Murmansk route. The now outnumbered Luftwaffe is spread very thin over an immense area. If the Anglo-American African offensive is pushed to a victorious conclusion in the near future, shipment of supplies to Russia by the less dangerous Mediterranean route may soon become practicable.

And supplies will be vitally important in the months ahead. For the miracles accomplished by the Russians in transplanting whole industries to the interior should not obscure the heavy losses of food, manganese, iron, and other materials due to German conquests. These must be replaced from other sources if the Soviets are to be kept in full military efficiency for the campaigns in the spring and summer of 1943.

In the winter fighting, then, the tactical outlook, unless there is a dangerous shortage of supplies, is mainly favorable to Russia. The Germans are unquestionably better prepared to withstand the climate than they were last winter, and the generals are acting with greater caution. On the other hand, the initiative is now definitely in Russian hands. Heavy going slows down air and tank units and gives a decided advantage to the belligerent having the greatest weight of fire power and numbers. The Germans are almost sure to relinquish territory until they reach more stable defense lines than some they now hold.

In last winter's fighting the Germans were able to hold nearly all their main bases for attack largely because it proved impossible to bring up artillery of sufficient size to demolish their defenses. The Russians infiltrated around these positions, in some instances almost cutting them off, but could not reduce them. If an effective method of dealing with these strong points can now be worked out, there is more than a chance that the German retreat may become continuous. Whether or not Russian efforts are successful, the increased threat of an expanding Allied army in Africa and Europe will probably prevent maximum forces from being sent against the Soviets for a third successive year.

After more than three years in which the Axis has suffered only negative defeats, the balance of power is slowly passing to the Allies and with it the ability to press home the new attacks which alone can bring final victory. Analogy is sometimes dangerous, but it is perhaps correct to view the twin successes in Russia and North Africa as the Vicksburg and Gettysburg of World War II. The Civil War analogy may be pursued a step further. After the successes of July, 1863, nearly two years of intensely hard fighting were required to bring victory to the Union. Germany today, surrounded as it is by conquered buffer states, is in an enormously strong position to resist direct attack. It can, if necessary, retreat through those areas for hundreds of miles before being compelled to defend its own soil. Internal revolt in a country so rightly fearful of retribution as the Third Reich may be hoped for but should not be expected. Though we have apparently rounded the turn toward victory, the most difficult part lies ahead.

Cash Savings and Taxes

THIS is not a "silk-shirt" era, and not merely because what little silk is left in the country is being made into parachutes and powder bags. Retail-sales figures, it is true, show that money is being spent freely, but a great deal is being saved too—much more than the rather disappointing war-bond totals would indicate. A few weeks ago the Securities and Exchange Commission released an analysis showing that in the third quarter of 1942 individuals' gross savings amounted to $11.4 billion compared with $9 billion in the second quarter. Purchases of government bonds accounted for $2.8 billion of this sum, while the acquisition of automobiles, homes, and other durable goods absorbed $2.3 billion. Reduction in personal debts, including those due on hire-purchase agreements, amounted to $.8 billion, insurance to $.6 billion, and saving in the form of government insurance, mostly through the social-security funds, to $.7 billion.

The major form which savings took during the quarter, however, was one which has potentially harmful attributes and has caused some alarm—the increase in cash holdings and bank deposits. These rose by almost $4 billion, making a total increase for the first nine months of the year of $6.5 billion, in spite of the fact that between January and March there was a small net loss. Many economists look askance at such large and rapid gains in liquid assets. They fear the owners of these resources may suddenly divert them into the purchase of goods, producing an inflationary pressure on prices which it would be difficult to combat.

My personal opinion, however, is that this alarm can be exaggerated. If the price-control system breaks down for any cause and there is a sharp upward move in the cost of living, then people with cash resources might start a flight into goods. But since in that unfortunate event there would probably be a rush to turn government securities also into cash, the conversion of liquid savings into war bonds would not provide an adequate safeguard. Meanwhile the important point for the national war economy is that every dollar saved, no matter in what form, is a dollar not spent and to that extent helps to relieve pressure on our diminishing supply of goods.

Among the many limitations of statistics is the fact that while they give useful information about mass behavior they are seldom a clear guide to the motives that added together account for that behavior. Thus the mere fact that a large number of persons decide to hoard part of their incomes in the form of cash does not tell us anything about their reasons for this step. Yet its ultimate economic results will vary greatly in accordance with the underlying motives of the hoarders. If, for the duration of the war, we all turned into misers and buried in our backyards every penny of our incomes beyond what we needed for barest subsistence, the problem of financing the war would be solved. The demand for civilian goods would then fall well below the supply, and the government could do all its financing through the banks. For there would be no harm in adding to the total volume of spending power so long as the propensity to spend was negligible.

It is unlikely, however, that much of the present currency hoarding is due to actual miserliness. Returns published by the Federal Reserve Board show that at the end of September currency in circulation totaled $13,703 million, an increase of 37 per cent since August, 1941. Over $10,000 million of this sum was accounted for by coins and bills of up to $20 in value, representing a 41 per cent increase in thirteen months. This very striking expansion is probably in the main a reflection of the sharp advance of pay rolls during the period in question. Men who had been on relief for years drawing a few dollars a week are now earning good wages and naturally keep a much greater average amount of money in their pockets. Moreover, men in this position do not usually have bank accounts and are likely to put their savings in a teapot until they have enough to make possible a purchase of war bonds or to turn their thoughts to savings banks.

The lesser but still striking increase in the circulation of large bills is more difficult to account for. One commentator has noted that the figures in this category tend to expand around the first of each month, when bond-interest disbursements are made. This suggests hoarding of bills by timid rentiers and, perhaps, to some extent a growth of tax dodging. A safe-deposit box full of bills would be one way in which a wealthy man could bequeath sums to his heirs with reasonably good prospects of evading death duties.

The even larger recent increase of savings in the form of bank deposits must also be considered in the light of motives. Why are people accumulating money in bank accounts beyond current needs when they might earn a safe return by investing it in war bonds? One very simple answer is that people are saving to pay taxes. If this is so, the scare currently being worked up about the danger of wholesale tax defaults next March is wholly unwarranted. The chief piece of evidence offered to support this scare is a recent Gallup poll which found that most people have not yet made any provision to meet their increased tax liabilities next year. Presumably on the basis of this finding, Dr. Beardsley Ruml declared recently in a speech advocating his much-publicized "pay-as-you-go plan": "Nothing can be gained by arguing that people ought to have saved the tax on last year's income out of last year's income. The fact is they did not do it and now they cannot do it."

It is hard to reconcile this flat statement with the SEC report indicating a rate of cash savings from April 1 to September 30 just about sufficient to meet taxes on income received during this period. Surely these savings cannot be credited to people not liable to tax? It is all very puzzling, but perhaps Dr. Ruml, whose brilliance as an economist is universally acknowledged in the press, can provide a satisfactory explanation.

In the Wind

THE REIGN OF TERROR instituted by the Christian Front in certain sections of New York has not abated since Investigations Commissioner Herlands exposed it a few weeks ago. Synagogues are being desecrated, and air-raid wardens are manhandled as they make their rounds. A vigorous campaign against the pro-Nazi rowdies is being carried on by the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, the one paper, aside from the liberal PM, that has had the courage to name names and call for official action.

ON NOVEMBER 28 the Boston Daily Record ran a picture of American troops in Africa marching beside a high wall on which was a sign reading Défense d'Afficher (Post no Bills). The meaning of the phrase, according to the caption below the picture, is "Defense of Africa."

RUSSIAN WAR RELIEF in Philadelphia is auctioning the hat worn by Greta Garbo in "Ninotchka," the picture that satirized the Soviet Union.

FROM AN ARTICLE on Palestine in the Pilot, an anti-Semitic paper published in Minneapolis: "They [the Jews] have cultivated the tomato so assiduously that they send theirs to market a month earlier than do the Arab farmers. . . . Just like the Jew! In 1933, in spite of the two great American grapefruit areas, they sold to our Canadian cousins 400,000 cases of seedless Judean grapefruit, thus beating us at our own game. Just like the Jew!" The article, incidentally, is by Colonel F. J. Miles, secretary of the Russian Missionary Society in London, who is now writing and lecturing in this country.

ON THE JANICULUM HILL in Rome stands a statue of Garibaldi astride a horse. According to a story in an English magazine, some Italian who remembered how the great patriot had helped drive the Austrians from Italy scrawled the words "Scendi, Peppine! ## The Microcosm of War

LOVE AGAINST HATE. By Karl Menninger. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

THE intellectual history of our times may some day be written in terms of the case for Freud versus the case for Marx. Or rather, to put it more accurately, Freud and Marx are more and more clearly emerging as typical representatives of the most significantly contrasting attempts to understand the human world in terms of two fundamental assumptions, each of which is more inclusive and more momentous than either Marxism or Freudianism considered as a specific doctrine. Perhaps it is not quite absolutely the case of the individual versus the group, or of consciousness versus the dialectic of external events beyond human control, for both admit that groups are composed of individuals, and all but the most absolute of Marxians talk and act as though there were some point in urging the workmen of the world to unite—which there would not be unless workmen could do something about uniting. But it is the fundamental question of cart and horse, of which end we should begin with in the attempt either to understand a phenomenon or, even more importantly, to control or modify it. The old cliché which affirms that all men are either Platonists or Aristotelians whether they know it or not is hardly more true than the statement that all are similarly either Marxians or Freudians—provided of course that these two philosophers are taken to represent, as the two ancient ones were, the most fundamental and inclusive of their respective premises.

It is, furthermore, worth remarking that Freudianism is, among other things, one of the last stands of free will, even though the concept of the subconscious may seem to be one more attack upon it. Freudianism certainly does tend to emphasize the difficulty man has in establishing his claim to be a reasoning animal. The Rational Will which some philosophers have imagined sitting in serene sovereignty inside the human skull is a sadly badgered monarch as Freud understands him. On too many—perhaps on most—of the occasions when he thinks he is giving orders, he is really following the insidiously whispered suggestions of the Subrational Will, which is itself so far from being free that all sorts of primitive drives and infantile conditionings dominate it. What, in other words, Aristotle calls the vegetative part of human nature is a far larger part than most who pin their faith on man's rationality like to admit. But even the Subrational Will is at least in some sense human; it has its seat in the human being and is not, like the dialectic of events, outside him. The subconscious, at least, is not a mere epi-phenomenon and hence merely an effect, not a cause, of anything. But this is not all, for even the Freudian therapeutic process comes finally to the point where it makes an appeal to the consciousness of the patient and bids him exercise his Rational Will to make a choice which will determine a line of conduct. Thus Freudianism in the end insists that man is, or at least sometimes may be, both a rational animal and an animal which, by willing, can make some change both in himself and in the world he lives in.

Something of all this—or at least the starting-point of these reflections—is suggested in the first chapter of Dr. Menninger's book, which begins with a reference to the parlous state of the world and to the common assumption that either mechanical civilization is wrecking itself or a sick social system has produced sick men. Dr. Menninger then asks, apparently with full awareness how unpopular the implication of an affirmative answer would be, "Is it possible that human phenomena can all be related to human beings"; that "the disease of the world is the disease of the human personality"; that "the World War of today is a reflection of multiple miniature wars in the hearts of individuals"? And it would be, of course, possible to put his questions in an even more inclusive form. So far as the popular mind is concerned, Marxism may be said, I think, to have won the most crucial of its battles. Most of even the least philosophical of citizens probably now take it for granted that men are what they are because of the kind of society in which they live. But it is still at least possible to reverse the proposition, still at least possible to ask if society is not what it is because of the kind of men who make it.

I cannot but wish that Dr. Menninger had developed his implied thesis more fully. Perhaps he is interested merely in suggesting it as a justification for the more technical and minute investigation of certain aspects of the individual psyche with which his book is concerned. In any event he immediately proceeds to a series of largely self-contained chapters devoted to an analysis of the problems presented by the conflict between love and hate in the individual man. Freud, he points out, originally assumed that there was only one human drive, which he called the libido and which, despite all the popular misunderstanding, included vastly more than the mere physiological urge of sex. But Freud himself later replaced this monism by a dualism. The aggressive impulse, he declared, is as fundamental as the libido; love and hate are two equally primary and equally important emotions. Each has its function, but the adjustment between them is seldom perfect. Each is easily diverted from its proper objects. We love what from even the standpoint of individual biological advantage we ought not to love, and, similarly, hate can be so misdirected as to choose even the self as its object.

Dr. Menninger's chapters are concerned with various types of destructive conflict between love and hate in the individual and with the methods by which they may sometimes be resolved. And though a review can hardly hope even to summarize a discourse necessarily detailed and discursive, at least two things need to be said. Dr. Menninger finds the source of the conflicts to be often sexual and usually to arise out of childhood experiences. But he neither reduces all maladjustment to sexual maladjustment nor offers the simple solutions which Freudians are commonly charged with offering. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Angela Thirkell of Stalky & Co.

MARLING HALL. By Angela Thirkell. Alfred A. Knopf, $2.50.

ANGELA THIRKELL, prolific chronicler of life in Barsetshire, continues her literary love affair with the English upper classes. Like the other volumes in her Barsetshire cycle, "Marling Hall" concentrates on a single household, but once again we meet the Grahams, Leslies, and Crawleys of Mrs. Thirkell's previous novels; her cast of characters is as familiar as her plots or her anatomy of good family. Here again are those sterling middle-aged women of such gentility and wisdom, so devoted to their families and the local choral society, and her men so strong on duty and the decencies; there is even the usual younger daughter with a morbid interest in pregnant cows. "Marling Hall" is Mrs. Thirkell's third novel since the war. The Marlings are making genuine sacrifices for their country: one son is in service, and a son-in-law has already been killed in action. But as might be expected, it is with the threats to security on the home front that Mrs. Thirkell is mainly concerned.

There are, for instance, the secretaries and typists in one of the local government offices of whom Oliver Marling marvels, "as so many others have marveled, at the gulf which was set between himself and his friends and what were at the present moment the actual pillars, if not the saviors, of society." Mrs. Thirkell complains that "the rationing of petrol, more stringent and rightly so, cut people off from most of their friends, while the 600 highly paid men and girls employed at the aeroplane reconditioning works . . . were driven in motor coaches to and from their work over distances varying from five hundred yards to a mile and a half every day, besides being driven over to Barchester to the cinema every week at their employers' expense." There are the Marling servants who insist upon roast beef for Sunday dinner while the family is reduced to pigeon. There are the evacuated, the war's sternest duty, of whose children Mrs. Thirkell writes:

"And that," said David, "is the Brave New World."

Mrs. John Leslie said it was so nice to have those poor bombed children at the class and it was a great thing for their own children to mix with all kinds while they were too young to know the difference.

"No, Mary," said David. "You may have married my elder brother, but as he is not here I am going to say that you are talking nonsense. If your children don't know the difference between those two girls and Clarissa, it's time you took them to a mental specialist."

Advertised as a pleasant bundle of froth, in reality Angela Thirkell is quite a grim little person. For all her gentle voice, she is one of the great haters of contemporary fiction. She hates sex, the movies, and the lower classes, except an occasional half-wit mechanic. The cousin of Rudyard Kipling, she hates "natives" and foreigners; she hates servants, except the governess who can frighten the grown son of a peer by asking him if his hands are clean. She hates writers, except the ubiquitous Mrs. Morland, created in her own image. Despite the fact that there runs through Mrs. Thirkell's books an amiable inanity—"daftness" is the word most recently used to describe it—which has become her trademark, she knows exactly where she stands and what she is about. Daftness is a characteristic only of the upper classes and a leit-motif for virtue, disguising but never hiding Mrs. Thirkell's opinions and prejudices; it is a disarming device for persuading us that a powerful class of grown men and women—England's upper middle class, gentry, and minor aristocracy—are lovable children. And of course, on the level of feeling, especially of sexual feeling, Mrs. Thirkell's characters are, heaven knows, childish enough. There is the older Marling girl, for example, whose husband has been killed before Dunkirk; assessing her bereavement, she remarks to her reflection in the mirror: "But there one is, alone, and it seems so silly to be a widow; the sort of thing other people are, not oneself. Oh, dear. Well, there it is"; to which Mrs. Thirkell adds, approving the good sense, "with which philosophy she went down to breakfast." On the level of conduct and opinion, however, so much retarded growth sounds a malign note.

In each of her novels Mrs. Thirkell hunts the current menace to the tranquillity of her heroes and heroines; plus an attenuated love story this usually constitutes her plot. The menace may be the Jew (the Warburys of "Cheerfulness Breaks In") or a pretty Irish girl (Miss Grey of "High Rising"); more often it is the intellectual, so easily identified by his bad manners and his fondness for Russia. In "Marling Hall" Mrs. Thirkell is stalking a young poet with long hair; at the end of the book the poet goes back where he came from—Bloomsbury—and civilization is once more safe in Barsetshire. Against the intellectual, whose books sell only in the hundreds, Mrs. Thirkell likes to set Mrs. Morland, whose books sell in the thousands.

And Angela Thirkell's own books sell in the thousands; no one will ever accuse her of being an intellectual. But perhaps it is just because she is so popular a writer, with a wide English audience and a growing audience in America, that she earns a certain social consideration beyond her literary merits.

DIANA TRILLING

Rule by the Reichswehr

WORLD IN TRANCE: FROM VERSAILLES TO PEARL HARBOR. By Leopold Schwarzschild. Translated by Norbert Guterman. L. B. Fischer. $3.50.

LIBERAL, cosmopolitan, and unimpressed by sacred cows, Das Tagebuch was one of the publications of the Weimar Republic which the Nazis had in mind when they spoke of Kulturbolschewismus. The term was hazy and therefore a favorite with the Nazis. What else could they have called Das Tagebuch? It was impossible to brand it as Socialist, Marxist, or something even worse because it obviously owed no allegiance to any party, organization, or dogma, and the talented pen of its editor, Leopold Schwarzschild, attacked with equal gusto the provincialism of the German left and the bad faith of the right. Das Tagebuch endeavored to make "good Europeans" out of the republic's intelligentsia and to teach them the political savoir faire of the Western world. It championed reconciliation with the Allies and political rapprochement with France; it believed in the capitalist system and hated militarism and reaction, particularly the German variety. Taking seriously the right of democratic control over the nation's armed forces, it was a thorn in the side of the Reichswehr and its political protectors.

When Hitler moved into the Wilhelmstrasse, Schwarzschild moved to Paris and edited Das Neue Tagebuch. That he undertook the publication of a German weekly in exile reflects his hope for German democracy. Week after week Das Neue Tagebuch analyzed the progress of Hitler's feverish war preparations, warning and imploring the statesmen of France and England to act before it was too late.

From the shores of America, Schwarzschild, the good European, now looks back at the two accursed decades from Versailles to Pearl Harbor, takes stock, and decides that he has had enough. He is tired of pleading with the Germans to become democratic, he is equally fed up with the idealists, dreamers, and utopians of the Western world and with their fetishes—equal rights for all, self-determination, general disarmament, and democracy.

The thesis of his book, monumental in its simplicity, is that a group of German army officers and their satellites, superbly equipped, trained, and determined, really have ruled Germany whatever her political trimmings; that there never was democracy in Germany; that the Weimar Republic was put over on the Allies as a conspiracy of the whole nation to escape punishment; that the few clear-sighted statesmen at Versailles were steam-rolled by the lofty dreamers of a new era, dupes of German propaganda, who wasted the fruits of victory and frustrated all attempts to secure peace by eliminating the one and only cause of war. Once saved and still intact, Germany's superior resources of raw material and man-power, developed with the assistance of American capital and vigorously exploited by its militaristic rulers, were bound to change the European balance of power in its favor. France's fall was sealed long before the German divisions broke through its military defenses.

In Schwarzschild's guided tour through the long gallery of democratic leaders the pictures of two men dominate—Clemenceau and Poincaré. They knew then, as the author now knows, that the problem of peace was the problem of French security and that its solution demanded guaranties other than pacts and promises. Amputation of German territory, unrelenting watch over its demilitarization, compulsion whenever necessary to enforce the will of the victors, and superior military power—this was the rock on which to build a lasting house of peace. Wilson, the doctrinaire pacifist, spoiled their plans at the Peace Conference, and the naive visionaries of the decent countries forced their nations down the road to appeasement, weakness, and disaster.

Schwarzschild, a well-informed man and a keen analyst of political events, must have labored untiringly, selecting, omitting, and forgetting, before he had the history of these years stripped to the bone. He seems somewhat uneasy himself about his monolithic approach and tries to defend it by a set of philosophical premises which are, if nothing else, surprising in his mouth. "Mankind and human communities change their essential nature in the course of thousands of years as little as the wolf and the pack of wolves or the sheep or the herd of sheep change theirs." In "Mein Kampf" Hitler uses the same argument to discourage the hope of the German people for peace and international cooperation. The Difference between Schwarzschild and Hitler is in the role they assign to the wolves and the sheep. The author also brushes aside all thought of a possible connection between economic, social, and political developments. In order to function well, the capitalist system needs political stability; and political stability makes for a smooth-running capitalist system. This is the only interdependence Schwarzschild would grant the social utopians. Peace and a strong hand to preserve it—and everything else can be solved.

Do not the experiences of the past bear him out? After years of fruitless negotiations Poincaré invaded the Ruhr and refused to budge in the face of British pressure and German passive resistance. Result: Stresemann had to capitulate and an era of prosperity opened for all, including Germany. "If the lesson had been understood and taken to heart, the relatively golden age that began immediately after the German capitulation in the Ruhr conflict and lasted for six years might have lasted for sixty." Again, when Brüning shook the political stability of Europe by negotiating the Anschluss, the resulting economic disasters were immediate and world-wide. "March, 1931: the customs union. May: the [bank] crash in Austria. July: the crash in Germany. September: the crash in England. The effect of the 'active revisionist policy' was the bankruptcy that circled the world, bringing confusion and disintegration." On an earlier page Schwarzschild also mentions casually that "one memorable day in October, 1929, the bottom dropped out of the New York Stock Exchange and the world was thrown into chaos."

It is easy but pointless to make a case, Schwarzschild vs. Schwarzschild, to oppose ideas expressed in Das Tagebuch to those in "World in Trance." The erstwhile spokesman for liberal Germans and their dupes in France, England, and America has found new hope in the company of Vansittart and his "Black Record."

Success Story

THE MAN WHO MADE NEWS: JAMES GORDON BENNETT. By Oliver Carlson. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.50.

MR. CARLSON'S life of the founder of the New York Herald illustrates very well how difficult it is for us to have outstanding men as we would like them to be. To E. L. Godkin, James Gordon Bennett was a "Scotch black-guard." At the same time, as Mr. Carlson relates, Henry J. Raymond of the New York Times "expressed the feelings of all his fellow editors when he remarked, 'It would be worth my while, sir, to give a million dollars, if the Devil would come and tell me every evening, as he does Bennett, what the people of New York would like to read about next morning.'"

The author lists no fewer than thirteen journalistic innovations, including the newspaper interview and the financial section, which Bennett independently invented or largely developed. Here, obviously, was no slight man. The fact that his growth took place in an environment of journalistic muck which he helped create is relevant but not decisive. Bennett was an editor in an era which produced such giants as Greeley of the Tribune, William Cullen Bryant of the

Free Churchill Pamphlet

The new Archbishop of Canterbury was appointed by Prime Minister Winston Churchill against the wishes of Tory reactionaries in Britain. A huge audience in the Albert Hall, London, heard the Archbishop declare for transference of taxes from production equipment to ground values. (See Christian Century, October 7, 1942.) Churchill himself, in a volume recently issued in New York, says: "Who could have thought that it would be easier to produce by toil and skill all the most necessary or desirable commodities than it is to find consumers for them? It is certain that the economic problem with which we are now confronted is not adequately solved, indeed is not solved at all, by the teachings of the textbooks, however grand may be their logic, however illustrious may be their authors." Churchill is also for the taxation of ground rental values.

Post, James Watson Webb of the Courier and Enquirer, and Raymond. Yet Mr. Carlson, who has studied the great newspapermen of the 1830's and 1840's is convinced that Bennett was "the greatest single generator of journalistic progress in this country, if not in the world." He makes out a strong case for this belief.

How did it happen that a Scotch boy who was something of a scholar, and idealist enough to come to America because he wanted "to see the place where Franklin was born," should have become the symbol of everything that was gross and sensational in American journalism? It makes a long story, as it is told here, and the answer depends partly upon the reader. Mr. Carlson has evidently tried to make his biography as definitive as possible. It is a tribute to his style that even the palpable research—that having to do with Bennett's obscure years, for example—is thoroughly readable.

Bennett was a typical American success. It took three journalistic failures for him to discover his formula: political independence (of no principled variety), newsworthiness, and entertainment. When one remembers that Bennett was pro-slavery actually up to the moment of the Civil War, and just as indiscriminate in what he printed as his worst enemies charged, one sees difficulties for his biographer. Mr. Carlson has not avoided them. But it is impossible not to be impressed by a man who could, in his own newspaper, print accounts of the public beatings he received from outraged citizens. Moreover, Bennett's course during the Civil War compensated for a good deal that was unsavory in his career.

The similarities between Bennett and Hearst are so striking that one cannot help wishing that Mr. Carlson had seen fit to consider them. Anyone who has read the biography of Hearst by Mr. Carlson and the late Ernest Sutherland Bates, and read also Mrs. Freemont Older's friendly version of the same career, would have appreciated such an analysis. For somewhere in the lives of men like these is the secret—or at least part of the secret—of our American character. After all, it was the people who made Bennett: they enabled him several times to defeat crusades to smash the Herald and himself; and they did this simply by buying his paper.

Some day, perhaps, we shall understand better than we now do why America has produced so many Bennetts. But we shall understand it because of such painstaking studies as the present one, in which the author sees his picture broadly and can take his protagonist for what he was rather than for what he would have liked him to be.

Patents for Monopoly

PATENTS FOR HITLER. By Guenter Reimann. The Vanguard Press. $2.50.

MONOPOLY capitalism struggles on all fronts to survive the economic changes and crises of our age. In Germany monopoly backed Hitler against democracy, the progressive middle class, and labor, and was then mastered by the Nazis and used as an instrument of state tyranny and aggression. In the United States monopoly has sought to protect itself against the competition of new industrial techniques—light metals, synthetics, and plastics—to preserve old capital investments and markets. To accomplish their defensive purposes American private-monopoly corporations worked with German state-monopoly corporations which were being used by Hitler to wage economic war against the world while preparing for military war.

The significant story is told absorbingly in this book. Its facts are gathered from hearings of the Senate Patents Committee, the Truman committee, and other Congressional investigations, and from the work of the Anti-Trust Division of the Department of Justice under Thurman Arnold. The facts are clarified, organized, and presented in a pattern which should be understood by all persons interested in democratic reconstruction. Patents and patent pools and agreements are the primary means used by American monopoly to protect its investments, profits, and power. They are used to circumvent the anti-trust laws. And they are used to control in favor of monopoly interests the introduction of new industrial techniques. Monopoly corporations buy up patents, they get patents on their own research discoveries, they pile patent upon patent—not to use the new techniques but to prevent their use by competitors.

In order to carry out this defensive policy our private monopolies entered into patent cartel agreements with the state monopolies of Germany. But German monopoly corporations were animated by the aggressive purposes of their master, the Nazi state; so while the agreements placed no restrictions on the development of light metals, synthetics, and plastics in Germany they curbed the advance of the new industrial techniques in the United States. Standard Oil of New Jersey made agreements with the I. G. Farbenindustrie to protect itself from synthetic-oil competition and to monopolize the production of synthetic rubber—against the interests of the American people. Alcoa and Dow Chemical pooled their magnesium patents and agreed to limit production of magnesium so that Alcoa could sell its aluminum, and then made agreements with German Nazi interests to insure limitation of magnesium sales in this country—against the interests of the American people. Similar restrictive agreements with German corporations were made to restrict production of tungsten-carbide steel, of Plexiglas and other plastics, of military optical glass—against the interests of the American people. It is a sordid story of greed and callous indifference to the economic welfare of the country by the administrative masters of monopoly—of economic states within the state—who are not interested in production but in corporate and personal power. The result was that while production of the new materials boomed in Germany, production was stationary or merely crawled upward in the United States, creating serious shortages of strategic materials that still hamper our war effort.

This book should be read for its facts alone. But Guenter Reimann has done more than simply clarify and organize the facts. He makes a number of suggestive analyses of the nature of monopoly capitalism and of the impact of the new Industrial Revolution on our future. The techniques that are being developed by this revolution are changing the nature of our economic order and of reconstruction, while most economists still ponder the old textbooks and most liberals still think of reconstruction as a projection of trends arising out of the technical-economic structure created by the old Industrial Revolution.

LEWIS COREY

solved by substituting accumulated brush strokes of comparatively pure color, distortion, and geometrical simplification for atmospheric tone and chiaroscuro—this problem so absorbed him in the means that he would too often lose sight of the end, his own emotion. The result, examined square inch by square inch or part by part, would display miracles of brushwork, but when contemplated as a whole there would be something wooden or lacking in modulation about it. But Cézanne's achievement was so far-reaching and subtle that it is necessary to emphasize reservations in order to define it. This, incidentally, is an extraordinarily rich show.

EILSHEMIUS: Paintings. At Durand-Ruel Galleries, until December 12.

Most of these pictures date from the last ten years of the painter's active career, a period in which almost everything depended upon the mustard yellow that was during this time Eilshemius's version of sunlight. There are four successful paintings here—"South Sea Island," "Farewell to the Sun," "The Last Sunlight," and "Autumn" (No. 15)—but in the reviewer's opinion they are not his best, and the others all seem rather weak. Eilshemius was one of the best painters we have had, but he painted many boring pictures. In his catalogue notes Professor Venturi rejects as nonsense the suggestion of an affinity between Eilshemius and Rousseau Douanier. The pertinacious professor is right as far as their art in and of itself is concerned. But it is worth considering that both artists were indeed a little bit mad; both wanted to paint academically; both showed real facility at times (Eilshemius in the beginning, Rousseau at various moments between 1885 and 1891); and neither, in spite of himself, did paint academically. For which we are thankful.

WILFREDO LAM: Gouaches. At Pierre Matisse's, until December 5.

With gouache this Cuban painter achieves the boldness of oil. He has an idiom all his own, when he manages to escape Picasso—an abstract treatment of floral and animal motifs against dun and light-gray backgrounds, derived apparently from Amerindian art. Lam draws with a great deal of flair. But all is ruined—in some pictures by a straining after bravura effects, by showy motions, in others by obsessive rhythms and the inability to be more than decorative. And in two instances the artist's reliance upon Picasso for ideas is so great as to be parody. Yet something may come of it. Lam has a gift but doesn't seem to know what to do with it. The painting in ink-red which he showed at the recent Surrealist exhibition is far better than any here.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

RECORDS

COLUMBIA has achieved one of its occasional successes in recording an orchestral performance in its December set (506, $5.78) of Strauss's "Don Quixote" played by Reiner with the Pittsburgh Symphony and with Piatigorsky as solo cellist: the sound that comes off the records is remarkable in its fidelity to timbre, its spaciousness, its clarity and cleanness of definition. The work is Strauss's masterpiece—in which, however, as I have pointed out before, the programmatic detail is so rich and at times so subtly achieved that some of the numerous points can be appreciated only by a person with musical sophistication and detailed knowledge of the score. Reiner lingers over points too much; the work therefore moves too slowly and ponderously, with sudden erratic bursts of speed that are characteristic of Reiner; and equally characteristic is Piatigorsky's distortion of the phrases which Feuermann plays with unerring sense for plastic coherence in the excellent Ormandy-Philadelphia Orchestra performance.

On the other hand the sound of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Bruno Walter as recorded in Columbia's set (525, $3.68) of Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 is noisily unclear in its voluminousness, and occasionally wooden. The third movement, taken at a slower pace than in Toscanini's recent recorded performance, is effective; and its horn solo is played more beautifully than by the N. B. C. Symphony man. But the other movements, as Walter plays them, are relaxed to the point of being slack and nerveless.

If I haven't discussed jazz records since February it is because so few of the kind I'm interested in have even been issued. I have enjoyed Charlie Shavers's trumpet-playing and the ensembles in the Sidney Bechet-New Orleans Feetwarmers "Georgia Cabin" and "I'm Coming, Virginia" (Victor 27904), and would like Bechet's own playing if he were not doing it on a soprano saxophone. The solo work in "The 'C' Jam Blues" (Victor 27856) makes this one of the good Ellington Orchestra performances for me, and one which I like better than the Barney Bigard small-band performance, titled "C' Blues" (Bluebird 11581). The Ellington Orchestra "Perdido" (Victor 27880) is fair.

Columbia's set "Teddy Wilson and His Piano" (C-93, $2.63) contains four records, on each of which Wilson plays alone on one side and with rhythm accompaniment on the other. The songs that he does alone—"Smoke Gets in Your Eyes" (36631), "These Foolish Things" (36632), "I Can't Get Started" (36633), "Body and Soul" (36634)—he takes at a slow pace which allows an over-indulgence, for my ears, in luxuriant and meaningless passagework in the right hand and lush ninth chords in the left. Playing with the others Wilson is at once restrained and stimulated—which is to say that he plays, in the faster tempo, more simply but with something like the life and the inventive imagination of seven or eight years back. Good are "I Know That You Know" (36632) and "China Boy" (36634); better still are "Rosetta" (36632) and "Them There Eyes" (36631).

Mel Powell's piano-playing on two Commodore records (543 and 544) is excitingly brilliant, intricate, and subtle; but the men who play with him are mediocre and dull. Of the four performances—"When Did You Leave Heaven?" and "Blue Skies" (543), "Mood at Twilight" and "The World Is Waiting for the Sunrise" (544)—the last is the best.

But the best performances of all that I have heard recently are in Decca's "Gems of Jazz—Volume 5" (Set A-324, $3.15). First "The Blues Jumped a Rabbit" (18439), recorded for English Parlophone in 1936 by Jimmy Noone and a Chicago group; then "Georgia Cake Walk" and "Liberty Inn Drag" (18437), recorded last March by a specially assembled group headed by Art Hodes; then "Original Dixieland One-Step" (18441), recorded for English Parlophone in 1936 by Jimmy McPartland and another Chicago group, the Art Hodes "Get Happy" (18438), and the Jimmy Noone "Way Down Yonder in New Orleans" (18440). In addition, it has been a pleasure to hear Jess Stacy's piano-playing again in the Bob Crosby Orchestra "Brass Boogie" (Decca 18359) and the Crosby Bobcats "Sweethearts on Parade" (Decca 18355).

NEWS FLASH!

LORD BYRON LENDS METRE TO

The Saturday Review of LITERATURE!

"The Assyrian came down like a wolf on the fold,
And his cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold,"

Those long-ago lines are as Lord Byron wrote them.
For Christmas in Wartime, allow me to quote them.

Our hearts have swelled high till they threatened to crack a rib,
We've vowed to destruction the hordes of Sennacherib;
But in time of confusion we'd best keep informed
Or the Foe may creep in through the ramparts they stormed.

There is more to a War than mere shooting and slaying.
That Words fight as Armies there's now no gainsaying!
One trustworthy guide, at this point, I may mention
That brings all good books to your serious attention.

Through its news and reviews it conveys every week
The knowledge you search for, the wisdom you seek,
The lift of the spirit that men so desire
When all Earth seems racked between famine and fire.

Indeed nothing new is this story I tell
To veteran readers of the old S.R.L.
I don't have to boast, for they know I speak true.

I'm wishing the same Merry Christmas to you!

And, if you'd insure it, who hark to my ditty,
Just print out quite plainly your NAME, STREET, and CITY,
Or send to a friend (where a real need is due)

A year's fifty gifts in The Saturday Review!

We're all in this fight, and we're going to win it,
And win the Peace, after—for that's why we're in it.

Judge men and events by the best being writ

And a highly intelligent judgment of it!

Thus all through the year you will keep on your toes
Confounding, with Freedom, the wiles of our foes.

Till—as Byron foretold—with their falsehoods abhorred

They have "melted like snow in the glance of the Lord!"

Letters to the Editors

Shadow on Central Europe

Dear Sirs: Now we cannot lose the war any more. The United States has taken on a recruiting officer whose name alone is irresistible. Now men will stream to the colors of Uncle Sam like wild bees to a honey tree—or will they not?

Is the flag of the United States, or the democracy it stands for, not good enough? Since when does this republic need the services of the descendant of St. Stephen and Charles V—Archduke Francis Joseph Otto, Prince of Hapsburg and Lorraine, pretender to the (non-existing) throne of Austria and Hungary?

We do not yet know whether the action of the War Department in accepting the services of Otto as recruiter of an "Austrian battalion" will finally be viewed as a shattering blow to democracy throughout Europe, as an invitation for a giant civil war in Europe, or only as a joke history will laugh tears about. We do know that the Poles, Czechoslovaks, Yugoslavs, and Free Italians have protested vigorously against it and that all Austrians, wherever they are, feel as if they had been hit on the head. While Darlan is supposed to be only a temporary expedient, Otto's shadow now falls on the future of Central Europe. We can hardly expect any Austrian, Pole, or Yugoslav to risk his life against Hitler when we promise him Otto in exchange.

If the two brothers, Otto and Felix, are merely refugees, as Secretary of State Hull declared, why are they not in the army? They are not married, and they support only their claims. Perhaps this is another "Riddle of the State Department."

"Daily News" Please Note

Dear Sirs: The People's Voice column of the Daily News of November 20 printed the following letter, in which the writer dug up some old and often refuted lies and added a few new ones about the Abraham Lincoln Brigade:

JAKE HAS A PLAN

Brooklyn: What has become of the Abraham Stalin-oops Lincoln Brigade which once went to Spain to help the Reds burn down churches and persecute nuns and priests while its long-haired sweethearts panhandled in the subways and streets to collect funds? Have these babies volunteered to serve the United States in this war? The answer is no. Why not induct them in a body and put them in the flame-throwing squads, where they would need no additional training?

(Signed) JAKE THE PLUMBER

Without descending to Jake's level and solely in the interest of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade and of all who fought and are still fighting fascism, I should like to present the facts:

1. The bombing of Guernica by the Hitler-Franco forces made clear to the world who was responsible for the destruction and desecration of the churches in Spain.

2. On December 8, one day after Pearl Harbor, in a communication to the President, we volunteered the services of our entire membership for combat duty.

3. More than 500 of our members are in the armed forces of the United States today—half as volunteers.

4. Since the day war broke out more than 300 of our members have been daily risking their lives on merchant ships delivering vital war goods to our troops and allies. Seven of these men we know have already lost their lives.

Five years ago we went to Spain to fight fascist world domination. We are still in the fight.

JACK BJOZE,

Executive Secretary, Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade

Corporations and the Public

Dear Sirs: In the suggestive article entitled New Deal for Stockholders in The Nation of November 21, the remedies offered do not seem to be at all commensurate with the ills of irresponsible corporation control that they seek to cure. Federal incorporation undoubtedly would help to eradicate some of the abuses inherent in state supervision, for the state governments and officials are more the handmaidens of big corporations than their supervisors. The chief point of Mr. Greenberger's article, however, is that greater democracy should be injected into corporation control by the reform of the proxy system and the establishment of regional corporate districts. This might introduce a certain measure of greater democratic control among the stockholders, but what great reforms could we await from such a development? Are the small stockholders so very much more enlightened and public-spirited than the large stockholders?

The entire approach to the consideration of corporate control must be made from a different point of view, that of the public interest. At one time concern for the small stockholder was properly more warranted. He was indispensable as the source of funds to launch and operate our great industries. Since the RFC and the New Deal, and especially since the war, the chief source of capital has been the federal government. More than ever, then, the operation of our corporations should be subject to the scrutiny of the proper public officers.

With the public interest the purpose of all corporate control and reform, the prime objectives to be sought are fair prices and continuous and full employment and production. Shifting a few proxy votes here and there in voting for directors is only scratching the surface of the problem.

Mihailovich and the Communists

Dear Sirs: Ralph Bates is right in saying in his recent article in The Nation (issue of November 28) that a struggle for power is raging in the mountains of Yugoslavia. He is wrong about everything else, and, I must add, most unfair to General Mihailovich. General Mihailovich is not only the commander-in-chief of the Yugoslav army and the Chetniks (or the "so-called Chetniks," as the Daily Worker prefers to call them); he is also the Secretary of War in the Yugoslav government. Does Mr. Bates suggest that General Mihailovich should defy both his government and his army by appeasing a group of active dissidents?

Who were the leaders who signed the famous anti-Mihailovich manifesto? They were, and Mr. Bates will not deny it, the same leaders who were violently isolationist during the brief period of Yugoslavia's struggle against the Axis. They condemned the war as an imperialist one. They maintained that the Yugoslav people had no interest in the war, one way or another. They became Yugoslav patriots after Hitler's invasion of Russia, but the Yugoslav people, remembering their isolationism, did not trust them.

Only after June, 1941, did the Communists (I don't like to call them "left-wingers" because no true left-winger was ever an isolationist) join the great Chetnik army. They fought under Mihailovich's command for some time, and then the trouble began. Mihailovich discharged some of his Communist officers. New guerrilla bands were then organized under the command of these officers, acting independently of the Yugoslav High Command. Slandorous articles about Draja Mihailovich began to appear in the Communist press outside Russia. Moscow, as Mr. Bates rightly declares, could not call a member of an Allied government "a man in the pay of Mussolini," but the Daily Worker could, and did.

Does Mr. Bates think that General Mihailovich is the one who must compromise? Does he think that General Mihailovich will perform a service to the cause of the United Nations by relinquishing his command? Does he think that the Yugoslav government ought to dismiss Mihailovich? If a group, let us say, of American Communists decided that our North African command was not doing the right thing and organized their own guerrilla forces to fight the Germans in their own way, would Mr. Bates suggest that General Eisenhower should apologize and step down?

For the Freedom of Everyone?

Dear Sirs: Wendell Willkie in his radio speech effectively dramatized the symbolic importance of India to the myriad millions of Asiatics seeking conclusive proof of the good intentions of the United Nations. But the Indian problem has ramifications in our own country which are still unknown to many.

Japanese propaganda has made much of our "peculiar problem"—the Negro—and our methods of dealing with it, methods which have been patently blundering and reactionary. Oceans of good intentions have not drowned out such flagrant examples of racial discrimination and persecution as the poll tax, lynching, Negro soldiers used as labor troops, etc. Any previous ignorance of these facts on the part of the Indians and Chinese is being rapidly dispelled by the Japanese propaganda machine.

To those who say that the Japanese are exaggerating the extent of our race problem, I ask only: How much does one have to exaggerate race discrimination in this country in order to create a skeptical attitude toward our intentions in the mind of colored Asia?

In all the discussions of the abandonment of imperialism as a war aim, it should be realized that the talk is about the future relations between white and colored peoples. This is not oversimplification. The colored peoples of the world did not originate the Occidental color line, which is but the social sham covering economic exploitation.

I think the American people should be reminded that the sympathies of the American Negro at the time of the Russo-Japanese War were definitely with the Japanese, as a colored nation. I am not attacking the present patriotism of the Negro—which appears magnificent to those of us who realize how much less the Negro actually derives from our country than does the lowest white. I am stating that this war, at least in its vast Pacific and African theaters, is liable eventually to develop into a definite color conflict. Asia is on the move. This fact may be interpreted as either the first sign of the decline of the Occident or as the first step toward the inclusion of the millions of industrious, intelligent Asiatics in a planned world system in which the colonial and imperialistic designs of all nations, white or colored, will be scrapped and the interests of the common man will prevail.

Just as India is no longer Britain's problem alone, so the status of the Negro is not solely our problem. Not in a war of the scope of this one. We must decide whether or not we are fighting a war for the freedom of everyone.

It Takes All Kinds

Dear Sirs: I note in your issue of October 31 that Will Chasan lists John B. Rankin of Mississippi among "our worst Congressmen."

When will you people of the North learn that the Negro problem is a Southern problem which you can neither understand nor assist in the solution of? I have not always agreed with Mr. Rankin on economic, labor, or social legislation, but as long as there is a necessity for resistance to the laws imposed upon us by force of arms in 1865, so long will Mississippi continue to send to Congress men who, however narrow their general outlook may be, are willing to stand against the Northern majority that would condemn the South to mongrelization.

You criticize us for our backwardness in education, labor and social legislation, industry, and agriculture. The truth is, with the pinks of the North yapping at our heels in a constant effort to force racial equality down our throats, we are engaged in such a constant fight for survival that we just can't afford liberalism. John Rankin burns me up worse than he does you when he raves and rants about "communistic" labor leaders, but I know that when Northern idiots try to turn Mississippi over to the Negro, he'll put up a fight.

The Shape of Things

WHEN AMERICAN TROOPS FIRST SET FOOT on African soil—before expediency had become the order of the day—it was assumed on all sides that a certain fruit of victory would be the immediate liberation of anti-Axis prisoners in North Africa. That was on November 14. Today, more than a month later, the enemies of the Axis are still imprisoned. We call this fact to the attention of all apologists for the Darlan deal, including some whose letters appear in this week's issue, who assert so confidently that the United States calls the tune to which our fascist collaborator marches. In the prison camps in the "liberated" territories there are today some 25,000 refugees from Central Europe, mostly Jews; some 30,000 Spanish Loyalists, many of them soldiers of the Republican army; an unknown number of De Gaullists and other anti-fascist Frenchmen. Most of these men seem destined to stay where they are for the duration of "expediency." The State Department has apparently decided that if the Jews were released, the local Arabs might be annoyed; if the Spaniards were released, Franco would be upset; if the Fighting French were released, Darlan would be angry. But the problem of the imprisoned Fighting French is at least considered a serious one, and the release of "some" De Gaullists seems to have been arranged. *

MEANWHILE DARLAN IS EXERCISING FIRM control over the African radio. When the American troops landed, they brought with them technicians and other experts to take over the radio stations. So far nothing of the sort has happened. Not only are the stations still in Darlan's hands, but American broadcasts have been kept off the air. As a first result, news of the North African campaign that should have been transmitted by radio to this country has been choked off at the source. As a second, our command has been deprived of a powerful weapon of political warfare—the one weapon we could have used effectively to counter Axis propaganda in Europe and spread some of our own. Is the power of the United States not sufficient to induce Darlan to free French patriots or permit Americans the use of radio facilities in the territories they have occupied? It seems not. And one wonders whether we shall be in a better position to enforce our will after we have helped Darlan equip an army of three or four hundred thousand men.

CRITICISM OF THE DARLAN DEAL IS FAR more widespread in Britain than in this country and appears to be shared by members of the government, although its attitude has been extremely correct. In order to allay the alarm expressed by members of Parliament of all parties Mr. Churchill addressed a secret session of the House of Commons. One persistent critic, Emanuel Shinwell, has since announced that he accepted the Prime Minister's explanation and was convinced that Darlan really was going to prove a temporary expedient. We should feel more reassured if the defenders of the Darlan deal in Washington were not trying so hard to build him up as a genuine but misunderstood French patriot. This suggests that there are elements in the Administration who are perfectly aware that it will not be easy to get rid of the Vichy Admiral and are entirely complacent about that fact. Publicly they may argue that Darlan's assumption of power in North Africa has no bearing on the future of France, which will be decided by the French people themselves without our intervention. But since the proponents of this view pride themselves on their realism, they must be aware that we are already intervening in French politics by aiding in the reconstruction of a French army in North Africa controlled and officered by fascists. Can anyone doubt that, when France is freed of Germans, Darlan will try to use this army to reestablish the Vichy regime? Or that such an attempt would be the signal for civil war—a war in which one side would have all the weapons? Are we then to stand aside in the name of non-intervention? Actions such as the deal with Darlan may have their short-term justifications; they also have long-term consequences not to be charmed away by references to liberal peevishness.

THE BATTLE OF EL AGHEILA HAS BEEN WON without a fight. Faced by a formidable British force which had been sending out powerful patrols preparatory to a full-scale attack, Marshal Rommel ordered a new retreat. The scanty news available fails to throw any clear light on the reasons for his decision. According to one report a British flanking movement had made the Axis position untenable, but there is no explanation of how such a move was possible against the El Agheila line, which is protected on the north by the sea and on the south by extensive marshes. One factor influencing Rommel must have been his weakness in the air. British and American fliers had knocked out his advance air base at Marble Arch and left him with very little fighter protection. But probably the chief reason for retreat was the urgent necessity of concentrating the Axis forces in North Africa, since they are manifestly too weak to defend the whole thousand-mile strip of coast between Bizerte and El Agheila. It remains to be seen whether Rommel will attempt more than delaying actions before arriving in the vicinity of Tripoli. We cannot, however, anticipate a very rapid advance by General Montgomery's men in view of the supply difficulties to be overcome. The same problem has temporarily checked our offensive in Tunisia, but there are indications that it is being solved. The forces under General Anderson have been compelled to yield some ground, but air support is growing stronger. An attempt is now being made to knock out the airfields at Bizerte and Tunis from which Axis fighters and dive-bombers have been operating effectively. If these can be forced to retreat to bases in Sicily, allied air superiority will have been established.

HITLER HAS TAKEN OUT A NEW INSURANCE policy against internal disaffection by reshuffling his High Command and giving key positions to politically reliable officers. In place of General Halder, who seems to have taken the rap for the failure of the Führer's personally conducted Russian campaigns, a General Kurt Zeitzler has been appointed chief of the army general staff. Colonel General Hans Jeschonnek has become chief of the air staff, Major General Adolf Galland inspector-general of the fighter-plane forces, and Admiral Kurt Fricke chief of the navy general staff. Not a great deal is known about any of these men, of whom all but Fricke are under fifty. Zeitzler, however, is understood to be an intimate friend of Himmler's and to have been the Gestapo head's personal representative at Hitler's headquarters before promotion to his new exalted position. Jeschonnek fought in the German air force during the last war and became an active participant in the secret Nazi plans for the revival of air power shortly before Hitler became Chancellor. Galland, only thirty, is a leading Nazi "ace" and fought as a "volunteer" in the Spanish civil war. Fricke, a naval career man, is not known to have been active outside the service but can be assumed to be politically "safe." These appointments must be taken as a counterpart of the development analyzed by "Argus" in last week's Nation—the organization of the Waffen S.S. This growing, heavily armed force, responsible only to Hitler and the party, is designed to be used in emergencies against either the Reichswehr or the people or both. But the danger it is designed to meet can also be countered by the infiltration of party fanatics into the army. Hitler has pursued this policy from the beginning, but at first he had to be content with creating Nazi cadres among the junior officers. Now he can place his men at the top.

IF THE SEVENTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS WERE trying to prove the charges of incompetence and political cynicism leveled against it in the recent campaign, it could hardly have done so more effectively than by its behavior in the last two months of its term. After passing the law to draft eighteen- and nineteen-year-olds early in November, both houses of Congress lapsed into utter futility. The Senate allowed a handful of its members from the poll-tax states to hold up all legislative activity for a fortnight, then weakly agreed to kill the poll-tax bill rather than beat the opposition at its own game. Under the circumstances it was not unfitting that in the final days of the session Senator McCarran of Nevada was permitted to stage a one-man filibuster against the silver bill in an almost empty chamber. With only a handful of its members in Washington, the House was unable even to complete committee action on such an urgent matter as the President's appeal for emergency powers to lift tariff and immigration restrictions where these restrictions were clearly hampering the war effort. It succeeded in passing just one important measure in its last weeks—a bill for recomputing farm parity prices which, if enacted, would menace our entire price-control structure.

✱

IN FACT, MANY CONGRESSMEN SEEM READY to tear up all of the price-control legislation they have enacted. Ostensibly they are merely concerned with "getting" Mr. Henderson. Actually they are contributing a large part of their time to activities that are calculated to destroy important parts of the price-control mechanism and to undermine public confidence in its administration. One important Congressional clique is determined to raise farm prices even though such action would certainly increase the cost of living and lead to a general demand for a boost in industrial wages. Another clique, composed at least in part of the same Congressmen, is out to obtain a repeal of the limitation of $25,000 a year on salaries. Such action, the executive board of the United Automobile Workers warns, would bring about a cancelation of the no-strike agreement between labor and management. The U. A. W. warning may appear to some to be just another example of irresponsible group action. But it serves to illustrate what many Congressmen seem to have forgotten, namely, that our whole economic-stabilization program rests upon the assumption that there will be an approximate equality of sacrifice for the war effort.

ALREADY THE PRICE STRUCTURE IS SHOWING signs of serious weakness. Early this week the OPA issued an order authorizing price increases in sixteen items of everyday consumption. OPA investigators have found "hundreds" of violations of price ceilings in two of Washington's largest department stores. Enforcement of the price ceilings in other parts of the country is admittedly weak, and violators have all too easily taken refuge in the plea that the regulations are too complicated or are political in character. Evasion of the law is undoubtedly encouraged by Congressional attacks on Henderson, leading to the belief that the restrictions will ultimately be modified. In all the controversy over the details of price control few persons have taken the trouble to point out that the weaknesses in the anti-inflation program have not arisen because of faulty administration but because Congress failed to impose sufficiently high taxes to mop up the vast reservoir of excess spending power that exists in the country. This surplus is particularly apparent during the holiday season.

BECAUSE OF THE SLOWNESS IN RATIONING many essential commodities, the spending spree has seriously depleted stocks in stores throughout the country. The situation has become particularly acute in food-stuffs, such as meat, dairy products, and canned goods, but it is probable that shortages in other kinds of supplies will appear by the end of the holiday season. Mr. Henderson frankly admits that rationing should have been started before the public began to feel the pinch of shortages, but he points out that Congress refused to appropriate enough money for the establishment of a general rationing system. If anyone takes the trouble to read the record, he will doubtless find that the OPA chief is fully correct, but when shortages arise, the average citizen will blame Mr. Henderson rather than Congress for the failure to anticipate them. Secretary of Agriculture Wickard, who as Food Administrator now shares responsibility with Mr. Henderson, has denied rumors of plans for an early extension of food rationing. He too accused Congress of refusing funds for this purpose. He hopes, however, to remedy the maldistribution of supplies by educating merchants and shoppers. That job needs doing, but it is no substitute for rationing.

GERMAN REACTIONS TO THE BEVERIDGE plan attest the propaganda value of this attempt to provide a comprehensive scheme of social security as one of the pillars of post-war reconstruction. Immediately after publication of the report the Berlin radio opened a campaign to discredit it in German eyes. The German system of social insurance was hailed as far older and better than any British proposals—an unwitting tribute to the Nazis' "decadent" predecessors, to whose social-welfare measures the Third Reich has added little. Dr. Robert Ley, the drunken and corrupt leader of the Labor Front, dismissed the Beveridge plan as "an opiate for the masses," and other commentators saw it as "merely a means of agitation" and a method of steeling the British workers for a hard winter. So much attention to this subject suggests a Nazi fear that the publication of positive plans for economic betterment by the democratic powers may prove a disturbing element in Germany, that it may undermine the myth that only National Socialism can provide a cure for unemployment and other mass disorders. It follows that, apart from its intrinsic merits, the Beveridge plan deserves recognition as a worthy weapon of political warfare and one that is two-edged, for clearly, if its effects in Germany are disruptive, in Britain it is administering a tonic to morale. Will those in this country who demand a moratorium on social reform during the war, and even on post-war planning to this end, please ponder the meaning of Goebbels's outburst?

Franco in Hollywood

THE latest developments in the case of "For Whom the Bell Tolls" are nothing less than startling. A foreign power and, as most democrats would think, an unfriendly power, has been allowed to intervene in Hollywood and has been encouraged to believe that it has the right to censor American film production.

The whole story of the "Bell" is instructive. Those who knew their Hollywood were a little anxious from the moment they learned that the book had been bought by Paramount, a firm not distinguished for liberalism, or for courage in the face of the sort of opposition that might be expected. The first adaptation of the book, made by Louis Bromfield, doubtless did something to comfort Paramount since it omitted all such offensive words as fascism and fascist as applied to the Franco forces. Indeed, in this first version, which fortunately proved unusable, most of the political significance of the book was left out. At a later stage Dudley Nichols, one of Hollywood's most earnest liberals, was brought in to prepare a new treatment and a shooting script. Mr. Nichols's work on "The Informer," "The Long Voyage Home," "The Plough and the Stars," and other memorable films, has proved him to be an artist. Such box-office successes as "Stagecoach" have shown him to be thoroughly competent in purely commercial work. But Mr. Nichols could not solve Paramount's problem, which was to placate those Catholic pressure groups which had kept the Lawson-Wanger picture "Blockade" from so many screens. Then Paramount itself slowly joined the opposition to its own film. At least that is how it appears to our Hollywood informants. After the final preparation of the shooting version of the script there were constant attempts on the part of Paramount big shots to tone down the story. Their intention was frankly expressed. It was to insure that the "Bell" should be a wholly abstract film dealing with a saboteur's exploits in some mythical Ruritania. The words Spanish republic, fascist, democracy, and so forth were not to be heard. Outside opposition increased and took advantage of non-political difficulties, such as Hemingway's frank handling of the love story, which the producers had to face. Not all the efforts of Mr. Hemingway, Mr. Nichols, and others were able to preserve the real character of the "Bell."

Mr. Hemingway, it is said, became so disgusted with Paramount that when he was asked to provide an alternative ending he submitted two. In the first, to be shown in the sophisticated cities, the heroine dies of childbirth in a hospital. The second, designed for "the sticks," presents her as giving birth to the American flag, which slowly covers the screen. Anyway, matters became so bad that it was commonly reported in Hollywood that Mr. Nichols was being compelled to go on location during the shooting of the film to prevent further bowdlerization of his script.

Recently, Hollywood stories have it, the State Department stepped in and advised Paramount to submit the film to a representative of the Franco dictatorship for his approval. The result was that certain scenes were reshot; so that at the present moment two versions of them exist, one more or less representing Mr. Hemingway's intentions and the other representing Franco's views of what an American author should have written. A battle of influences will decide which of these two versions will reach the screen. The Spanish fascist government, the Catholic church, part of the State Department, and some of Paramount's chiefs are on one side; the author, the script writer, and the average conscience of the honest half of Hollywood are on the other. We are surprised that Admiral Darlan has not been brought in as umpire.

Murder of a People

THE fate that has befallen the Jews of Europe is so appalling a nightmare that men will shudder at its horrors for centuries to come; so Gargantuan in scope that it cannot be comprehended in its own day but must await the perspective of history. It will not shrink in that perspective but will grow until it dwarfs into insignificance the Roman persecution of the early Christians, the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Night, the terror of the Jacobins' guillotine, and all the pogroms that have stained the world from the days of the Pharaohs to the advent of Adolf Hitler. Make every allowance for hysteria, for exaggeration, for atrocity propaganda, and there remain the staggering facts that between one and two million men, women, and children have been slaughtered in Poland alone; that "scientific" methods have been introduced for the mass execution of a people, sparing neither the old nor those too young to walk; that a schedule has been fixed by the German government: so many thousands to be killed by the end of the year, so many by March 1, so many by June, until finally all but a handful of Jews, strong enough to be useful as slaves, will have been put to death. Gas, electricity, machine-guns, suffocation, starvation, and the introduction of air bubbles in the veins—these are the principal weapons of scientific barbarism.

What can be done—now—to rescue the few million Jews left in Europe from the first human abattoirs in history? The problem reveals the power of blackmail at its most monumental. Peace with Hitler for the sake of saving hostages is out of the question. Such a surrender would mean disaster for the world, for the Jews above all. Yet the harder we fight, the nearer the doom of the Nazis approaches the fiercer will grow their homicidal mania. Let it be admitted in all solemnity that there is no escape from this ghastly dilemma. We can only choose to bring the struggle to the quickest possible conclusion, and the death of these innocents is the price we must pay for carrying on the fight.

Suggestions have been made for mitigating the terror, and all of them should be attempted, whether or not they offer much hope of success. All, that is, but one—namely, the proposal that our air force systematically raze German villages in reprisal. Aside from the fact that German villagers have nothing to do with the massacres in Poland, their extermination would scarcely raise a shudder in Berlin. On the other hand, the survivors of such vengeance raids, and their neighbors in surrounding towns, would forever cherish the grim memory of what was done to their friends and families in the name of the Jews. An anti-Semitism would be implanted that would outlive Hitler by generations.

We are glad to echo other proposals, though more in desperation than in confidence. There are indications that a joint declaration by all the United Nations is in the making. We hope it will be extremely specific, serving notice on individual Germans, by name, that the terms of the armistice will include a provision for their immediate delivery to an international tribunal on an indictment of murder, and that similar indictments will be drawn up against every civil or military authority who engages in the killing of civilians from now to the end of the war. We support, too, the suggestion that President Roosevelt address a message to the German people, by every available short-wave channel, acquainting them with the crimes of their leaders and calling upon them to demonstrate their revulsion. This might take the form of anonymous letters to the government or perhaps of subtle demonstrations of opposition such as the oppressed people of other lands have resorted to from time to time. The degree to which the German people dare to express their sense of outrage is the degree to which they should be absolved of complicity.

The Vatican should be asked to make representations to Berlin, and likewise the neutral governments of Switzerland, Sweden, and Turkey. Even General Franco might be put to the test on this issue. We are told he is both Christian and neutral.

It is unlikely that any of these measures would make the slightest difference to the Germans. Nevertheless, they are a vital part of the political warfare in which we are engaged, and they should be tried. In the end only the crushing defeat of the Axis and the utter extermination of the Nazi leadership will save the Jews from extinction and the rest of Europe from slavery. On the day of liberation it will be the duty and the privilege of the United Nations to recognize the boundless sacrifice which Hitler's major victims have made and to grant the survivors among them the peace and security which they have gone through hell to merit.

America's Beveridge Plan

REPORTS from Washington confirm the existence of a program for extending our social-security system which is in many respects fully as sweeping as the Beveridge plan for Britain discussed in the last issue of The Nation. The details of the American program, which has been submitted to the President by the National Resources Planning Board, have not yet been made public, but its general nature has been foreshadowed.

One of the chief advantages of the Beveridge plan over Britain's existing piecemeal system of social insurance is found in its effort to provide approximate uniformity in benefits regardless of whether a man's need arises from unemployment, accident, sickness, or old age. American social-security experts are known to have been working on the same problem, and it is believed that the report will recommend, in line with the President's message to Congress of a year ago, the introduction of accident and sickness benefits on the same basis as the benefits paid for unemployment and old age. The wide discrepancy which now exists between the relatively liberal benefits paid under old-age insurance and the meager, brief unemployment benefits paid in some states will presumably be met by increasing and standardizing unemployment payments and by extending the period of protection, possibly through federalization of the state unemployment-compensation systems. If such changes are accepted by Congress, the level of protection in these categories will be much higher than that of the Beveridge plan.

There seems little chance, however, that a comprehensive program for medical, dental, and convalescent care such as has been outlined for Britain will be adopted in this country. Sickness insurance has been under consideration by the present Administration since 1936, but the opposition of the American Medical Association to all proposals for pooling medical expenses has prevented any action. About the most that can be hoped for at this time is a plan for the payment of hospital costs such as was recommended by the President a year ago. This lack of adequate health protection is the most serious loophole in the American social-security system. Every other industrial country in the world, not excluding Hitler's Germany, provides its workers with protection against the unpredictable financial hazards of illness. In two other respects also, the United States will apparently continue to lag behind Great Britain. There has been little discussion here of benefits to be paid women at marriage or at the birth of their children, and it appears that any assistance given to the parents of large families will be put strictly on a relief basis. The problem of removing the stigma of pauperism from the children of such families has never been faced squarely here.

On the other hand, previous reports of the National Resources Planning Board make it clear that the board conceives of its social-security plan as but a small part of a sweeping program for maintaining full employment in the post-war period. This larger program—calling for a gigantic permanent public-works scheme, city and regional planning, and river-basin development—is much more audacious than anything yet proposed in Britain. With all honor to Beveridge, we must not overlook the fact that Americans too have the vision to plan for a juster form of social organization after the war. We can only hope that the American program will receive as favorable response in Congress as Beveridge's plan is apparently receiving among members of Parliament.

Roosevelt and Willkie

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

OF COURSE Willkie has a terrific advantage. He is not an official; he is not even—for the moment—a candidate. He is not burdened with the necessity of waging a war; of making acts square with words; of being saddled with decisions made by cautious, pussy-footing bureaucrats; of holding reactionary party machines in line; of not offending religious-political factions; of placating labor and business and all the groups that have votes or money. Willkie today doesn't even have to listen to campaign managers—the fellows who took advantage of his inexperience in 1940 and turned him into a stumbling, unsure caricature of himself. Willkie may still aspire to the shackles of high office, but if so he has apparently decided to kick aside the compromises and timidities that usually pave the political highroad. Today he is a free man.

The President, on the other hand, is hedged about with all the limitations that responsibility entails and some others invented by himself. His words are carefully adjusted to political and military considerations. His most important acts have to be carried out in secrecy. He cannot take an open stand on matters of policy that remain undecided. If he disapproves of an official British position he must not say so. He must accept blame for many an American policy he has had little hand in making and may privately detest. The President is not a free man.

He is not, in my opinion, as free as he could be. Too often he equivocates, dodges, parries when he could easily give the public what it so deeply craves—a forthright explanation. His actions, too often, make hash of his words, and people are left a prey to a sense of insecurity and doubt. Why does the President tolerate the sinister octopus-control of Jesse Jones over so many economic agencies? Why has he allowed business reactionaries—equally bitter enemies of his whole New Deal program—to occupy key positions in the war economy? Why does he intrust to a typical diplomatic stuffed shirt like Phillips the delicate job of representing our position in India? Apparently he still believes the deal with Darlan a profitable one. But why, if this is so, does he permit worldwide suspicion and resentment to be multiplied by our failure even to bring about the release of anti-Nazi political prisoners in North Africa?

These are only a few specific items that illustrate the degree to which the President has allowed himself to be unnecessarily enslaved by his office. The result is becoming increasingly evident every day.

Popular leadership is slipping out of Mr. Roosevelt's hands. His words are losing their magic. While the reactionaries gather in enough votes to shift the balance of power in Congress, uneasy liberals begin to crystallize around Mr. Willkie. His freedom and boldness, his unequivocal support of the Four Freedoms and his readiness to apply them all over the globe, his open repudiation of the reactionary tendencies in our foreign policy—all these have met a popular response that carries with it a lesson the President should be the first to profit by.

For it is hard to believe that Mr. Roosevelt will lightly surrender to Wendell Willkie his hold on the imagination of the common man of this country and the world. He cannot afford to act the part of a stiff, cautious official and give Willkie the role of Hero of the People. If he does he will not only sacrifice his own and his party's future ambitions, but, paradoxically, he will weaken his own present position. For the President of the United States in time of war is also the leader of the people—or he is not a fit President.

Mr. Roosevelt faces the necessity of regaining the ground he has lost. He must take the risks of a counter-offensive against the reactionaries who have forced him into retreat. On a policy of evasion, caution, Darlanism, Ottoism, he will continue to lose to Willkie on the one hand and to his right-wing enemies on the other. To sacrifice liberal principles and the essence of the New Deal will serve the President no better than the sacrifice of Czecho-Slovakia did Chamberlain. Only a clear democratic policy and a hard fight will preserve the President's leadership in the months to come—and in 1944.

The Anti-Wallace Plot

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, December 13

THANKS to the vigorous position taken by Vice-President Wallace and Milo Perkins before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, the Danaher amendment to restore the power of Jesse Jones over the purchase of critical materials abroad has been blocked. After the hearing, which was held in executive session, Senator Wagner, the committee's chairman, asked Senator Danaher, "What do you think of your amendment now?" "Don't call it my amendment," was the aggrieved reply. The Senator from Connecticut, who is not a Republican of the diehard variety, has been apologizing to friends that this was a party measure handed him by the minority leader, Senator McNary.

Last spring, with elections coming on, the Republicans were virtuously critical of Jesse Jones's handling of rubber and his unfairness to small business. Now, with the elections past, the minority party and the Administration's most powerful officials have been plotting to overrule the White House executive order of last April 13, which shifted final authority over stockpile purchases from Jones to Wallace and the Board of Economic Warfare. The order was issued when Jones's stinginess and procrastination became too obvious to be overlooked by the President, an experienced overlooker where Jones is concerned. According to one report, Jones had spent only $3,000,000 of a $500,000,000 fund given him by Congress a year and a half earlier for the purchase of badly needed war materials. I cannot vouch for the figures; much of what Jones and the RFC do is a military secret. The impression conveyed by the figures, however, is certainly correct; yet McNary indicated that if the Danaher amendment were adopted he would also seek to restore Jones's power to veto proposed expenditures by WPB, the Maritime Commission, the Petroleum Coordinator, and the Rubber Director. This would be worth several divisions to our enemies. "But Jesse," Donald Nelson was once heard to exclaim despairingly on the telephone, "there's a war on." Jones would rather lose a battle than a haggie.

Fortunately the Texan is so accustomed to the hat-in-hand humility of applicants for loans as to be thrown off balance in encounters with mortals who do not need to borrow money from him. He gets as flustered in a fight as the town banker jostled by the town drunk. Last winter he was so upset by a critical editorial in the Washington Post that he punched its publisher in the eye. Lately he has become a constant contributor of protesting letters to the Washington Merry-Go-Round, an unprofitable occupation. In his private appearance before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee two weeks ago Jones made the lordly error of neglecting to brush up on his facts before inciting its members to riot against the BEW. His characteristic mixture of insolence and ignorance might have succeeded if Senator Wagner had not insisted that the committee hear the BEW's side of the story. Jones's picture of how the BEW and its director, Milo Perkins, operate turned out to be so childish and patently untrue that Jones's Senate supporters felt that he had left them out on a limb.

Jones charged that BEW expenditures were not audited. Perkins showed that all actual spending, though under BEW directives, was by the RFC and that the RFC knew where every nickel went. Jones pictured Perkins as a one-man director. Perkins showed that the Board of Economic Warfare, containing top representatives of State, Treasury, War, Justice, Navy, Agriculture, Commerce, WPB, Lend-Lease, and Inter-American Affairs, meets at least every two weeks for a full discussion of its activities. The board differs considerably from the hand-picked boards of yes-men who run the RFC and its subsidiaries. Jones complained that the executive order giving the BEW and Perkins power to direct RFC expenditures for critical materials was unprecedented. Perkins showed that it was, comma for comma, the same as that which freed Nelson from financial dependence on Jones. Perkins pointed out that he had only used this power three times. Wallace interrupted to say that Perkins should have used it more frequently. "In the future," the Vice-President said, "let's have more fights and fewer shortages."

It would be a mistake to believe that the attempt to hamstring the BEW is over. It would also be a mistake to believe that this is merely a conflict between Jones and the BEW. Behind Jones is the State Department, and behind the State Department are those forces, clerical and capitalist, which have no intention of letting this era become, in Wallace's phrase, the Century of the Common Man. Only a few weeks ago mining interests which operate in South America held a private powwow to discuss means of combating the labor and health clauses which the BEW has begun to put into all contracts for the purchase of supplies in Latin America. There is a good practical argument for these clauses, and the Senate Banking and Currency Committee found it impressive. But the mere fact that they will enable us to obtain more war materials is not enough to down the horrid suspicion that these clauses may also help to create a more decent world.

Not that the BEW is a particularly radical organization. Its export office is headed by a former General Motors executive, its import office by the former operating head of a big New York importing house. But the BEW is Wallace's original idea; as its chairman he has power to overrule the other Cabinet members who sit on it. The BEW reflects Wallace's progressive and humane outlook, which happens also to provide a very practical approach to the problem of increasing Latin America's output of badly needed materials. Whether in the rubber-bearing jungle, in the mine, or on the plantation, Latin American production is hampered by bad and unhealthy working conditions. Months ago Department of Agriculture agents in Brazil were warning that Adam Smith economics would not work in the jungle, that a mere increase in the price of rubber would not necessarily increase the output of latex, that the key lay not so much in higher prices for the owners of vast jungle lands as in assuring native labor of decent food, fair pay, and quinine. Rubber, though the most dramatic example, is not an exceptional case. The widespread silicosis which interferes with maximum production of tin and copper in Latin America is another example of the need for social reforms to combat a shortage of materials. This New Deal approach is, of course, foreign to the State Department. I am told that in Bolivia, where the Congress recently passed a law to combat silicosis, the American ambassador brought pressure on the President to veto it.

Contrary to the popular impression, Latin America has some of the world's most advanced labor and social legislation. In the past this legislation has been kept innocently confined to the statute books. In most Latin American countries powerful American and British corporations, with the backing of State Department and Foreign Office, have been able to ignore these laws, though they occasionally pay fines, like the madams in a red-light district, to help the police keep up appearances. Now another agency of the American government, the BEW, is inserting in raw-material contracts clauses requiring contractors to obey all labor and social laws and also to embark on specific programs for the improvement of health and sanitation. The cost of these is borne directly or indirectly by the BEW, but the companies operating in Latin America are thinking ahead to the peace. Can the old conditions be restored after the peon has had a taste of better things? Will labor costs go up permanently? True, a higher standard of wages and living for the Latin American masses would also provide a better market for the North American exporter, but that horizon is too broad to fit into the bookkeeping of United Fruit or Anaconda Copper. The State Department has accepted these labor clauses, but Jones could put a stop to them if his old power over BEW expenditures were restored.

The BEW has also been annoying the State Department in North Africa. Recently, at a State Department meeting, with BEW representatives present, A. A. Berle accused the BEW of causing the death of American soldiers by holding up certain shipments to Africa. Dean Acheson on that occasion defended the BEW. Berle said he had a letter in his pocket from an American general to prove his statement, but failed to produce the letter when challenged. Inquiry brought a denial from military authorities, who praised the BEW's work in North Africa.

The BEW seems to have objected not to dealings with Vichy but to letting Berlin profit from such transactions. The existence of the BEW meant that an independent and progressive agency of the government was in a position to know what was going on. The facts it made available to inner Administration circles did not reflect credit on either the astuteness or the efficiency of our diplomats.

Vichy promised us not to ship molybdenum or cobalt from North Africa to Germany, then made a deal to send 3,000 tons of cobalt ore to the Reich, enough to cover Hitler's deficit in this essential material for the production of synthetic oil. On one occasion Vichy dispatched a destroyer to scare off a British submarine that tried to stop a shipment of cobalt in a French ship. Shipments of American oil to North Africa under the Weygand-Murphy agreement of February, 1941, were used to produce minerals for the Reich and to replace oil sent to Libya. The French embassy in Washington at one time admitted deliveries of 3,600 tons of lubricating oil, motor oil, and aviation gas from North Africa to the Axis forces in Libya. In some cases American supplies went directly to Rommel. By March, 1942, the situation was so bad that Leahy informed Pétain that the United States was discontinuing shipments because Vichy had broken its promises by sending food, fuel, and trucks to Libya. In June the State and War departments wanted shipments resumed, but only of food. As late as August Murphy reported that Vichy was ready to supply no more cobalt for export, except to Germany. There was criticism by the BEW of the way food, cotton, and sugar were distributed in North Africa. One United States consul reported that distribution and propaganda work were so poor that Arabs often thought the goods they were getting were of Portuguese or German origin.

The State Department wants no surveillance by progressives, especially when, as in North Africa today, we begin to mold the future shape of Europe. So long as the BEW controls exports and imports it may feed and supply populations unwilling to accept State Department decisions on their destiny. The BEW must be got out of the war before peace comes, lest the old order for which the State Department stands be endangered. The Metternichs are ganging up on the BEW because the BEW is Wallace, and Wallace is the champion of the common man.

Dynamite in South Africa

BY J. P. COPE

Johannesburg, S. A., November 12

ON THE day that Lincoln MacVeagh, new United States Minister to South Africa, presented his credentials to Governor General Sir Patrick Duncan, the Nationalist press of the Union carried a warning against the so-called peril of American "imperialistic designs" on Africa. The attack was directly in line with an anti-British, anti-Russian, anti-American, and anti-pan-African campaign that has been raging on Nationalist platforms for months past.

I asked an American acquaintance who has lived here some years how he felt about the latest outburst against his country. "Quite frankly, I don't understand it," was his reply. "Nationalists I know are always very decent to me. I thought Americans were popular among them as a sort of counterblast to the British."

This incident is an excellent illustration of how hard it is for the casual observer to understand, or even to discover, the many cross-currents that agitate the troubled politics of South Africa. For one thing, the average English-speaking South African or visitor doesn't bother to read the Afrikaans press. For another, there is a fairly sharp division of sentiment and outlook between town and country, and Nationalism has its greatest strength in the country—the platteland, as the backveld is generally referred to in a political discussion. To most English-speaking townsmen the platteland is a mysterious, illogical, and perverse domain somewhere over the blue fringe of distant hills.

The present government in South Africa is a coalition made up of the United Party, led by General Smuts, the Labor Party, and the Dominion Party. The United Party is the strongest political group in the Union and has eleven out of the thirteen members of the Cabinet. The Labor and Dominion parties have one minister each. Labor has never recovered from the decline which began in 1924 when the party entered a pact with the Nationalists under General Hertzog, and it is now a political force of little consequence or future. With the present wave of sympathy toward socialism induced by the war, it has made strenuous efforts to regain lost ground. To some extent it has succeeded. But the party has failed to adopt a realistic policy toward the black natives and clings stubbornly to the color bar. After the war the native question will undoubtedly become the greatest political issue in South Africa, and Labor will miss the bus unless its present platform is changed in radical and wholly unlikely directions.

Even less promising are the prospects of the Victorian and conservative Dominion Party. Its members refuse to accept the constitutional evolution of South Africa from a segment of the "empire" to a sovereign independent member of the British Commonwealth of Nations. They have no positive program of social reform, have not made up their minds on native affairs, and sponsor an anti-Asiatic agitation in the province of Natal. But for the outbreak of war and a wholly fortuitous offer of a seat in the coalition Cabinet, the party would in all probability have died a natural death before now.

The coalition government can count on a clear majority of 19 in the Parliamentary Assembly of 153. The anti-war, bitterly hostile opposition to the government consists of the Nationalist Party under Dr. D. F. Malan, a "New Order" group headed by the openly Germanophile Oswald Pirow, and the Afrikaner Party, whose patron-in-chief is the ex-Premier, General Hertzog.* But significant political changes have occurred since the last general election was held in May, 1938, and Parliament no longer accurately reflects sentiment in the Union. One political faction that has played a stormy role since the outbreak of war—the Ossewa Brandwag—is not officially represented at all.

The Ossewa Brandwag is a secret society organized on the Nazi cell system. It sprang from the centenary celebration of the Great Trek of Boers in 1838 from the Cape into the then almost unknown hinterland of southern Africa. This centenary celebration was marked by great fervor among Afrikaans-speaking South Africans, who constitute 55 per cent of the Union's population of European stock. The Ossewa Brandwag was at first intended to be a cultural movement to further Boer tradition and the Afrikaans language, but it quickly took on a political complexion. After the outbreak of the war it became a South African counterpart of the Irish Republican Army and soon gained a large following among younger and more radical Afrikaners, particularly in the northern provinces.

Dr. Malan's Nationalist Party, to begin with, regarded the Ossewa Brandwag with kindly eyes and gave it all assistance. Later, however, a cleavage developed between the Brandwag and the party. Dr. Hans van Rensburg, an ardent admirer of Herr Hitler, resigned his post of Administrator of the Orange Free State to become Führer of the Ossewa Brandwag, and reorganized the movement on militant Nazi lines. Shock troops, or stormjaers, were formed, and drilling took place by night at secret rendezvous in the country. Plots were laid to seize post-offices, radio stations, telephone exchanges, and other state buildings in Johannesburg and the important port of Durban. The government acted in time, and many arrests occurred—a fair percentage of them in the police force. There followed a succession of dynamite explosions, attempts to wreck trains, cutting of telephone wires, the blasting of a water main, and other sabotage. An event which caused much excitement throughout South Africa was the planting of fire-bombs at a big Johannesburg exhibition in aid of war funds, with the resultant destruction of the Danish pavilion.

Less radical elements among the Nationalists became alarmed at the violent turn that events were taking. They pressed and carried a demand inside the party that some sort of control be imposed over the Ossewa Brandwag. Attempts were then made to reach an agreement with the Ossewa Brandwag which would leave the party supreme in the political field, with the Brandwag serving the republican cause as a militant private army. High policy would be decided by a joint council in which the party would have the deciding voice. The negotiations, however, proved abortive. Personal rivalries were too strong. The Ossewa Brandwag and the Nationalists then fell upon each other with the peculiar bitterness that so often characterizes a family quarrel, and the feud is now at its height. Oswald Pirow's "New Order" group has lined up alongside the Brandwag, and General Hertzog has given Pirow and Van Rensburg his blessing, though most of the members of his Afrikaner Party are drifting over to the Nationalists.

But this struggle between Dr. Malan's Nationalist Party on the one hand and the Ossewa Brandwag—"New Order"—Hertzog triangle on the other is apt to be deceptive. There are powerful affinities between these anti-government factions. They share the common aim of a republic independent of the British Commonwealth. They are prepared to admit to the privilege of citizenship only members of the Afrikanervolk. All other white South Africans would be tolerated merely as aliens, while immigration from abroad would be virtually banned, particularly in the case of Jews. They are united in their attitude toward the 8,000,000 non-Europeans (natives), who are to be kept in their place—politically powerless, socially segregated, economically restricted to unskilled work and low wages.

It requires only the action of a strong catalytic agent to combine the republican groups against the pro-Commonwealth, pro-Ally forces which at present govern South Africa. The political emergency of next year's general election might prove such an inducement. Or, perhaps, another "secret" and potent force not previously mentioned in this article—the Broederbond—might succeed with the unity drive it is vigorously conducting behind the scenes.

The Broeders are a sort of Afrikaner freemasonry whose members are drawn chiefly from the Afrikaner intelligentsia. They are bound by solemn oath to promote Afrikaner dominance within an independent republic. They hail from all parties and groups, from the civil service, the professions, and wherever Broeder influence can be brought to bear. Their members are selected by the Grand Council and are personally canvassed to join the movement. The Broeders influence the promotion of "the right people," meddle in the churches, intrigue within political and other organizations, and generally promote Afrikanerdom by every means at their disposal. The Broederbond has set itself to unite the currently warring forces which stand for an Afrikaner republic.

What of the United Party, at present holding the bastion for parliamentary democracy and the British Commonwealth connection? The outlook for the party is far from reassuring. It rallied behind General Smuts when the war crisis blew up in 1939, and, frankly, no other leader in South Africa could have achieved this. General Smuts handled the precarious situation in which he found himself with patience and outstanding skill, and his personal prestige has never been higher than it is at present. But the same thing cannot be said of the United Party as a whole. It is divided, broadly, into two schools of thought: the liberals, led by Jan Hofmeyr, and the conservatives. The liberals are pressing the campaign for emancipation of the 8,000,000 non-Europeans. They favor progressive socialist measures and frown on abuses of monopolistic control of various economic activities. They are pressing for dual medium education (English and Afrikaans) in the European schools. The conservatives have a far less progressive native policy and tend to serve vested interests, both mining and agricultural. They view with alarm the world march of socialism and were generally pro-Chamberlain on the Munich issue. The question is whether these two wings of the United Party may not split apart after General Smuts has retired from the political scene.

As to the coalition government, there have already been signs of restiveness on the part of Labor, and it is doubtful whether the partnership will survive the war. Further, the United Party must inevitably suffer with the general political reaction that will occur when the soldiers return and South Africa has to make the difficult readjustment back to a peace-time economy.

What the next few years hold is extremely difficult to foresee. All that can be said with any certainty at the moment is that we are heading for a period of political confusion in which present groups and personalities are likely to disappear and new political forces to come upon the scene. During the next decade Nationalism will make its supreme bid for an Afrikaner republic. Among non-Europeans the struggle for influence will be between the Communists, who are quietly organizing in many directions but have so far not greatly impressed the majority of natives, and the liberals of the United Party, led by Jan Hofmeyr. The main hope for South Africa is that out of the coming confusion may arise an overwhelming desire for greater cooperation between Afrikaans- and English-speaking people, with recognition of the right of the non-European to a place in the African sun.

Jim Crow and Casey Jones

BY SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE

ON DECEMBER 3 the chairman of the War Manpower Commission, Paul V. McNutt, told 400 railway executives that the railways must stop discriminating against Negroes and women in hiring workers. If the employment practices of many roads were extended to industry generally, he said, "millions of American Negroes, instead of turning out the ships, shells, planes, and guns America needs for victory, would be immobilized for the duration of the war."

This warning, interestingly enough, comes at a time when the Negro train firemen are preparing to appeal to the President's Fair Employment Practices Committee against practices intentionally designed to immobilize them not only for the duration of the war but for ever, so far as their own trade is concerned. On January 25-27, in the second year of a war which urgently requires a total mobilization of resources and skills, they will submit to the committee evidence to show that, through various agreements either public or secret between the Southern carriers and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Negro firemen are being systematically excluded from railway employment.

Exclusion is, of course, no war-time measure. It is a long-established policy of the Railway Brotherhoods to drive Negroes out of all jobs considered desirable by white men. The history of this policy is not pleasant; it is marked by strikes, violence, and intimidation of Negro workers.

In the early days of railroading the majority of switchmen, brakemen, and firemen on Southern roads were Negroes, employed, as the companies frankly admitted, because Negro labor was cheap. The white railway unions, being prevented by their race prejudice from organizing the Negro workers, were unable to cope with the depressing effect of Negro competition on their own wage scales. The alternative to organization was the exclusion of Negroes from jobs wanted by whites; and the unions have worked toward this end with all the means at their command.

During the First World War the job was almost done for them. The mushroom defense industries, with their high wages, attracted large numbers of the underpaid Negro railwaymen; it looked as if they were going to eliminate themselves from railroading. But the carriers, their load greatly increased by the demands of war transportation, could not spare so many skilled workers; and the National Railway Administration halted the Negro exodus by equalizing the pay of whites and Negroes. "An act of simple justice," Secretary McAdoo called it, and of course it was. But it was to promote injustice on a grand scale. For it removed the incentive of the railway managements to defend the employment of Negro workers, and thus paved the way for their elimination from railway jobs by the peaceful and apparently legal method of negotiation between carriers and unions.

One might think that the colored railwaymen would have something to say about the agreements which are depriving them of their seniority rights and even their means of livelihood. The fact is that they are never consulted about those agreements and do not even, in many cases, know what they are. They only know the results. Under the Railway Labor Act, as amended in 1934 and 1936, the Railway Brotherhoods assume the right to act as sole bargaining agent for Negro workers whom they exclude from membership. Imagine the wolf setting himself up as guardian of the vital interests of Little Red Riding Hood, and you will have an exact analogy with the current employment practices of the Southern roads as dictated by the Brotherhoods.

Typical of this guardianship is the "non-promotable" contract entered into in 1941 between the Southeastern Carriers' Conference, representing twenty-five Southern railways, and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen. Under the terms of this agreement "the proportion of non-promotable firemen and helpers on other than steam power shall not exceed 50 per cent." Promotable men are those in line for the position of engineer. Negro firemen have always been denied the right to become engineers, on the theory that it would be shameful for a Negro to hold a job which might put him in authority over white men. A few white firemen for one reason or another are non-promotable; but the measure is aimed at the Negro firemen. Superficially it would appear rather more than fair, since Negroes no longer constitute 50 per cent of Southern firemen. But it contains several jokers. There is no minimum set for the percentage of non-promotable men to be employed on engines with other than steam power; only a maximum. Moreover, non-promotable men are explicitly banned from new areas. And finally the union reserves the right to negotiate agreements with the individual carriers restricting to promotable men employment as helpers on other than steam power—in other words, it reserves the right to exclude Negroes entirely.

The Negro firemen, being without union membership or any other means of checking on the Brotherhood's negotiations with the individual carriers, do not know what secret agreements have been made to restrict employment to promotable men. They do know that Negroes are being denied the right to learn to operate the Diesel engines which are steadily replacing steam; that in some cases they are actually called upon to train the white men who are to take away their jobs; that they are being taken off runs where Diesel or stoker-fired engines are introduced, without regard for their seniority rights. In short, they know the Brotherhood and the railway managements are using technological improvements to bring about the final elimination of Negro firemen.

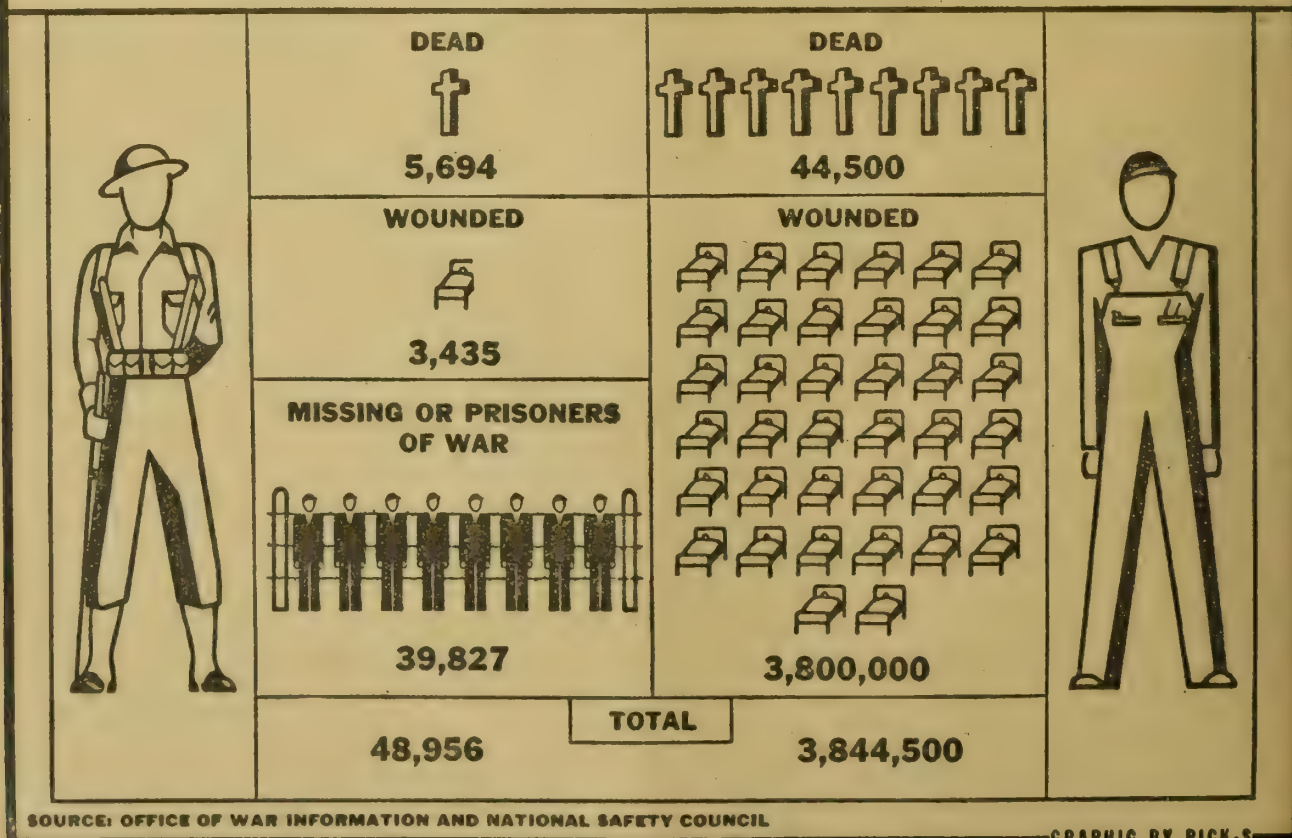

The effect of the long union war on colored firemen is graphically illustrated by the shrinkage in their number. Even after the great exodus of Negroes from the railways during the last war, the number of firemen in 1924 was 6,478. Twelve years later it was only 1,243, and it can hardly have increased since. When one considers that the policy which is eliminating colored firemen extends to all categories of railway jobs considered desirable by white men, the loss to Negroes in jobs and income appears staggering. In the American Federationist of August, 1939, A. Philip Randolph, president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, estimated the loss of railway jobs to black workers in the preceding quarter-century at 100,000, and the loss of income in twenty years, allowing an average wage of only $500 a year, at one billion dollars.

The Negro deprived of his seniority rights or his job has little hope of redress. An appeal to the management is likely to be returned with the recommendation that he present it to the local grievance committee of the union—which is like advising persecuted Jews to appeal to Hitler. If he can get his case before the National Railway Adjustment Board he is likely to meet with a refusal to hear it on the ground of no jurisdiction, as actually happened in the case of Ed Teague, displaced by a white fireman in disregard of his seniority rights when a stoker-fired engine was introduced on his run. In any case, since half the board's members represent the carriers and are paid by them, and the other half represent and are paid by the Brotherhoods, the Negro who appeals to the board is appealing to the interests responsible for his predicament. There is ground for appealing to the federal courts to protect the Negro's constitutional property right in his job; but two courts have refused to accept jurisdiction in the Teague case.

All means of relief, then, seem closed to the colored railwaymen except appeal to the Fair Employment Practices Committee and to public opinion. The Provisional Committee to Organize Colored Locomotive Firemen, set up in 1941 by the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, is doing both those things. Besides appealing to the committee, it has enlisted an influential citizens' committee, whose chairman is Mayor LaGuardia of New York and whose honorary chairman is Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, to support its claim for justice to Negro firemen in the court of public opinion.

The issue involved goes far beyond justice to this or that group of colored workers. It is quite simply the question whether America is going to treat its Negro minority as Hitler would, by imposing permanent economic and cultural inferiority upon them, or whether it will try to live up to the democratic principle of equal rights and opportunities regardless of race or color. The national Administration has shown its preference for the democratic way, but it will have to overcome such powerfully organized opposition as that of the Railway Brotherhoods if the democratic way is to prevail. Meanwhile, colored peoples all over the world are watching to see how well we live up to our claim to be the champion of freedom for all peoples, everywhere.

One War, One Command

BY GILBERT CANT

THE military developments which began with the Anglo-American landings in North Africa on November 7 show that cooperation among the United Nations has reached a point which only a few weeks earlier had seemed unattainable. They do not, however, indicate that we may now pause in our unsteady march toward over-all Allied planning, but suggest rather the urgent necessity of further progress. What may be regarded as the official military view that no over-all direction for the United Nations is necessary has been supported by reference to the success of the African operations. Undertaken with the knowledge of the Russians, these are said to prove that the great powers can coordinate their activities perfectly with existing machinery. This is the most specious kind of reasoning. It is true that the Anglo-American campaign in the Mediterranean basin was made known to the Russians in advance and was synchronized with Soviet offensives, but coincidence in time is by no means the same thing as joint planning. Secretary Knox has ridiculed the suggestion that the navy's offensive in the Solomon Islands delayed the opening of a "second front" in Western Europe. It can be argued, however, on the basis of facts which cannot be revealed, that the Solomons offensive was jeopardized by the drain on United Nations shipping imposed by the North African expedition.

When the question of a United Nations general staff or of a United Nations supreme command—the two should be carefully distinguished—is broached to high military officers, they usually change the subject by asserting that there is greater need for a worldwide political understanding, though naturally they can make no suggestion about how to achieve that infinitely desirable objective. One cannot say that high political officials show the same unanimity in advocating military unification first, but both groups emphasize the need for doing something else before attempting to obtain a united political front or a common military strategy.

Comparisons with the First World War do not help us much. There are certain similarities, but the differences are more noteworthy. In 1917-18, with Colonel House representing President Wilson in Europe, it was easy for the Big Four of the Allied statesmen to meet at frequent intervals. They did so, and formed the Supreme War Council. Out of this organization, which was originally political in character, there developed the supreme military command of Marshal Foch. But in the present conflict the United Nations are separated by greater distances and by more formidable concentrations of enemy strength than were the Allies of 1917. It might not be physically impossible for the Big Four of 1942-43 to meet on occasion, but it is certain that they could not meet often. In the meantime we have far from complete political agreement among the United Nations on the objectives of the war, the lines along which they intend to fight, and the kind of peace they want.

The Atlantic Charter and the agreement signed by the United Nations are noble in purpose but unenforceable in practice. They provide no machinery for joint operations in any field save that of wishful thinking. Before the people of America—one might better say the Americas—of the British Commonwealth, of Russia, of China, and of the conquered countries can be rallied with total effectiveness behind the war effort, they must be shown the end of the hard road they are asked to travel. Detailed peace terms are not needed at this stage. To try to formulate them now would gravely hamper military efforts. But there is urgent need for a general clarification of the goals our leaders are seeking. If they are not quite sure themselves, they owe it to their peoples to find out. Since Roosevelt and Churchill and Stalin and Chiang Kai-shek cannot all four be expected to meet, the two who cannot should delegate authority to make political covenants. The four powers could then be represented at a single conference and with spokesmen of the other United Nations could sketch the outlines of the new World Charter.

Such a conference might even make decisions of a military nature, though these would be exceedingly general in character. Simultaneously, there should be created a Great General Staff for the United Nations, to plan the execution of the over-all strategy decided upon by the heads of government. Considering the immense distances between the several theaters of war and the very different characteristics of the forces engaged, it is unlikely that a United Nations commander-in-chief could be named or, if named, that he could function effectively.

Until recently it was a commonplace in high military circles that the United Nations supreme command consisted of Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill. This was not an unmixed blessing, with the temperamental peculiarities of the two leaders such as they are. The situation has improved since the President appointed Admiral Leahy his personal chief-of-staff. Mr. Churchill insists on holding on to his post as Minister of Defense while carrying the oppressive burdens of the Premiership, but his influence on strategy is now less direct, because most British strategy must be harmonized with that of the United States. This is done through the Combined Chiefs-of-Staff Committee, which meets in Washington.

The success of the Combined Chiefs-of-Staff Committee in mounting the North African offensive shows that with adequate machinery the democracies can plan as well as the dictatorships. However, this campaign necessitated so many trips between Washington and London by the highest officials that the procedure could scarcely be applied to every local offensive of the United Nations.

It looks as if the purely American operation in the Solomon Islands was not adequately coordinated with the Anglo-American operations in the Atlantic. The number of transports and supply ships needed for Africa was so great—although probably not quite as high as the five hundred mentioned by Captain Lyttelton—that the Anglo-American shipping administrations stripped every other service to find tonnage. One-twentieth of the tonnage assembled for North Africa would have made it possible to send adequate reinforcements to Guadalcanal. It is clear that one of two things should have been done: either the Solomons offensive should have been postponed until more bottoms were floated, or the North African demands on shipping should have been pared by a small percentage.

Such problems confront us today in many theaters and will appear in increasing numbers now that we have taken the first step in a worldwide offensive. It is a question, for example, whether Australia can best be defended by sending heavy bombers to General MacArthur so that he can cut off the tips of the Japanese tentacles at Timor and Rabaul or by sending them to China, whence they can attack the industrial heart of the enemy and slash at his aorta—the convoy route past Formosa. Similarly, it is a question whether a Japanese invasion of the Russian Maritime Provinces can best be prevented by a counter-offensive based on the Aleutians, by island-hopping in the southwestern Pacific, or by the recapture of Burma.

For the resolution of all such questions, the United Nations need a Great General Staff much more urgently now than they did before the offensive period of the war started. Early in 1942 we had only to achieve tactical victories, as in the Coral Sea and at Midway, because the strategy was not of our making. Now we are launching a dangerous and decisive global offensive. We have seen that the United States and Britain are capable of effective combined staff work. We have seen what can be accomplished by unified command in an individual theater of war when the commander is a MacArthur, an Eisenhower, or a Wavell. The suggested conference of the heads of government of the great Allied powers should lay down a broad war-and-peace policy for all the democracies and obtain pledges that each of the participating governments will abide by and fully implement the decisions of a combined general staff.

Then the Great General Staff can be set up. It must have full information about the man-power and material resources of the nations it represents. Its members must command such confidence from their own governments and peoples that their decisions will be sure of acceptance and fulfilment. Each military member must be matched by a representative of the production services of his country. The United States, Great Britain, Russia, and China should have one military member each. A fifth should be elected by the rest of the United Nations.

The Russian position with regard to a Great General Staff is even less clear than the views of the other United Nations. Soviet propaganda agencies have fostered the idea that the Kremlin would welcome a supreme direction of the war, but the Kremlin itself has remained silent. Undoubtedly the Allied offensive in Africa will make for closer relations; they are as yet far from close enough. America and Britain have shipped to Russia enough tanks to equip twenty armored divisions—half of Britain's entire output for the last eighteen months—and more than 2,500 aircraft, without ever being informed what were the Russians' own resources. Despite generous remarks to the contrary by distinguished goodwill envoys, it can be stated categorically that the Russians have never told their allies what they had in hand or could produce; they have been precise only about what they wanted, and they have received as much of this as could be slipped past the German blockade in the Barents Sea.

If the war is to be won at a minimum cost of life and treasure, the Great General Staff must know not only the exact man-power resources, present and potential, of all the United Nations, but also their material resources, their supplies of weapons and raw materials. It must know in what theaters there are trained soldiers with insufficient equipment and in what others equipment is pouring from the factories but men trained to use it are lacking. It must deal with the problem of how a limited quantity of shipping can best be used to transport the most concentrated cargoes over the shortest routes. Unless the Russians cooperate more openly in making this possible, there is danger that certain elements in Washington will succeed in their plan to make this "an all-American war," one which will not be won until the American army and navy have been built up to such a strength that they can strike the decisive blows unaided. In the meantime our allies, not excepting Russia, would be bled white.

The Chinese would welcome a Great General Staff on which they would at last have equal representation with the other major powers. They were disappointed by the Anglo-American decision to concentrate on beating Germany before launching an offensive against Japan, and had to apply extreme pressure on the Western powers to obtain moderate assistance. They cannot be expected to fight an all-out war so long as they feel they are being neglected. How difficult it would be for the conquered countries, our Latin American allies, and the British dominions to agree on the fifth member of such a staff cannot be determined until they try.

The primary obstacles to the creation of a Great General Staff are the lack of a well-informed, articulate demand for one in the United States and Great Britain and the ambiguous relations of those nations with Russia. The initiative will not come from the armed forces. Few general officers in any service could subordinate their personal pride and loyalty sufficiently to welcome the idea. Those who have the vision are not in a position to speak, although they concede that the United Nations today are as greatly in need of unification as were the Allies in 1917. This issue is not like that of timing a second front, in which some civilians sought to usurp the functions of the High Command. It is in all truth a question which the people must decide, for it is the question of how—without prescribing details—and by whom—without naming individuals—their war effort shall be directed. The people can have what they will if they will it hard enough.

"Their Sufferings Will Not Have Been in Vain"

by THE LEADER of FREE ITALIANS
CARLO SFORZA
(former Italian Foreign Minister)

What kind of post-war world are we fighting to create?

Pan American has presented answers to this question by such leaders of thought as Dr. John Dewey, Dr. Hu Shih and the Archbishop of Canterbury. Here Carlo Sforza, former Italian Foreign Minister and now leader of the FREE ITALIANS throughout the world, tells you what he sees—for the future.

THESE ARE TIMES when certain problems, once faced, are rapidly solved. During two thousand years, philosophers asserted that slavery was a "law of nature"; and yet more was done towards its abolition in the half-century around the American Civil War than in the whole preceding Christian era.

That is why I declared, in a recent speech at Montevideo, that the first duty of a free Italy will be "ardent support of an organized world with no more place for the anarchical independence of the nationalistic States." I was not surprised when this statement met with cheers from Italians who had assembled to meet me from all parts of Latin America.

What is true for Italy, which has bitterly learned the folly of aggressive wars, is equally true for America. No American should forget that in the coming world even the Ocean will be no more than a big river; and that, if only for that, the era of isolation is gone forever. Those who cannot see this are like certain dannati in Dante's Inferno—people walking eternally with their heads turned backwards.

The highest duty of the present generation of Americans is to fight in order to make impossible a repetition of the Nazi-Fascist plot against peace. This American duty was foreseen by the Declaration of Independence when it stated in 1776: "... that whenever any form of Government becomes destructive [of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness] it is the right of the People to alter or to abolish it." In Jefferson's mind, "right" meant "duty"!

War always means suffering. But our sufferings in this "toughest of all wars" will not have been in vain since we are beginning to learn:—

- (a) INDIVIDUALLY: that Liberty is a right which must be won anew by the common people in each generation;
- (b) NATIONALLY: that the previous complete independence of Nations must cease. They must submit to a superior international law which will make it impossible for peaceful nations to be again at the mercy of adventurers. Never again must it be possible for a Nation, having first destroyed Freedom at home, to prepare satanic aggression behind its closed frontiers.

We must resolve that frontiers will no longer mean what they meant up until 1939. I foresee a Peace Conference at which we might agree to draw in frontiers very lightly—with a pencil and not in indelible ink.

THE DAY THAT VICTORY is earned by the United Nations, Aviation must be ready to demonstrate that it is a great constructive, as well as a great destructive, force.

Air transport travel costs will, we believe, be brought within the reach of common men everywhere.

Two weeks' vacation in Italy? Certainly, since Rome will be only 16 hours from New York by air. Round-the-world air cruises in two weeks? Nothing will prevent them when Victory comes except the barriers of habit and disbelief.

When peace comes, Pan American looks forward to playing its part, through technological research as well as with trained personnel and flight equipment, in providing widespread distribution of the world's culture, science and goods.

Today, of course, everything that we can offer—one hundred and sixty-five million miles of over-ocean flight experience, trained personnel and service to over 60 foreign countries and colonies—is at work for the government and military services of the United States.

"Fortress Europe"

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

A MONTH ago the term "Fortress Europe" meant nothing to American readers. Since then it has begun to crop out in the press and radio. William Shirer devoted one of his broadcasts to it. Argus has referred to it in these columns in connection with articles appearing in the German press. Before long Fortress Europe (Festung Europa) will be as familiar a term as Blitzkrieg or the second front.

Actually it was the Italian press which first launched the idea of Fortress Europe. Sometime last spring Giovanni Ansaldo, Mussolini's chief spokesman, published a series of articles presenting the theory of "besieged Europe" as an alternate way of winning the war. The preferred strategy would of course have been to carry the offensive to total victory. But Hitler's failure to subdue Russia plus the entry of the United States into the war obliged the Nazi leaders to revise their plans. For the Axis to have to accept a strategy of defense instead of continuing its Blitzkrieg must have been a bitter pill for Hitler and the General Staff. And so, as has frequently happened before, it was the Italian press which was chosen to familiarize the peoples of the Axis with the idea that to conquer Russia, to invade England, and later to engage the United States was not the only method of winning the war, but that it could also be won by means of a titanic defense which would ultimately exhaust the fighting strength of the Allies.

Once embarked on the new line, the German military writers and the services of Dr. Goebbels discovered that Fortress Europe contained powerful elements of conviction and propaganda. If, by building around the occupied countries a ring of steel against which the Allies would smash their heads and break their spears, resistance could be prolonged for several years, was it not possible that skilful political and diplomatic maneuvers, aided by the ever-present defeatists and pacifists, might induce Allied public opinion to give it all up and accept a settlement with the Axis?

This new orientation determines the course of events in North Africa—the stiffening of resistance at Tunis and Bizerte. Having renounced the offensive, Hitler must make sure of his defense: the first Allied assault on the steel ring must fail.

But that is not all. While the battle rages in Tunisia, all possible breaches in the walls and doors of the Fortress must be sealed. Thousands of German technicians and engineers have been set to work on the great task of securing its impregnability all the way from the French Mediterranean frontier to the coast of Norway. And at the same time a program aimed at the accumulation of foodstuffs and supplies of all kinds has been set in motion in order that Hitler may continue the siege for as long as his strategy demands.

ECONOMIC MEASURES

A new wave of requisitions has hit the occupied countries. The reason for this was discussed in Behind the Enemy Line on November 21. The food situation in Germany had deteriorated badly by the end of last summer. Even the German press admitted that the hopes centered in the east had failed to materialize. On October 7 the Frankfurter Zeitung said, "The southeastern states, from which people expected particularly abundant grain deliveries during the war, have not lived up to expectations by a long way."

While Hitler had spread out his war over the Balkans in order to get hold of the wheat and cattle of those rich agricultural lands, he could not command the harvests, which—whether because of nature or sabotage—in 1940 and 1941 were the poorest of the entire decade and in 1942 almost as bad. Not only the Balkans but Hungary too, of which much was expected, proved a disappointment. According to the Hungarian Institute of Economic Research, the harvest in that country was also below average.

To improve conditions, rations have been reduced and stricter regulations for grain deliveries imposed on the peasants. Bread rations are very small indeed; in October there were breadless days. The Hungarian daily ration is 200 grams (3½ ounces); the Slovakian, 134 grams; the Croatian ration for townspeople 150 grams; Bucharest, 250 grams; in Bulgaria the peasants' ration, originally 250 grams, has been cut by more than 50 per cent.

A new method for forcing deliveries of foodstuffs from the rural districts has been introduced in Hungary and Bulgaria in the past few weeks. From now on the rate of deliveries will be fixed not in proportion to the size of the harvest but to the number of acres owned. The reform is evidently meant to counteract the passive resistance of the Balkan peasantry, which has tended to reduce agricultural production to a level that left no surplus for export. Now under threat of penalties the peasants will be forced to conform to a certain minimum output.

The curious fact is that Germany's satellites have been losing their economic value in the measure that they have been turned into military assets. Germany approaches them with conflicting demands. They are asked to perform a miracle which even the Third Reich cannot produce: to fight for their master and to feed him at the same time.

PLUNDER IN THE WEST

Göring's slogan "German bellies first" was coined to good purpose. If the siege of Fortress Europe is to be of long duration, every non-German must be subjected to a hunger diet.

Consequently the plundering of the West will be pushed to the limit even if it costs the lives of every human being who cannot be used as slave labor. The exploitation of the occupied countries is nothing new; it has been going on since 1940. What is new is the appearance in the German press of stories revealing the extent of the plunder. A recent discussion of Belgian foreign trade gave a glimpse of how the economy of an occupied country is adjusted to Nazi needs. In the year before the war Belgian exports to Germany formed 12 per cent of its total foreign trade; by 1941 the figure had reached 72 per cent, the bulk of it food and cattle. In the last three months Belgium has been drained down to its last pound of meat and its last quart of milk.

In Denmark not less than 75 per cent of all food is earmarked for Germany. A census has provided the Nazi authorities with figures on the exact holdings of every farmer. Crops and stock are requisitioned accordingly. If a farmer does not turn in his share he is haled before a local court presided over by a Nazi Gauleiter and heavily fined. Sometimes his stock is confiscated. But he is never imprisoned—he is too valuable as a slave worker.

Every man and woman in the occupied countries is now used to make good the losses of the past three years. These losses have been enormous, in men as well as in material. However, the importance of the loss in manpower should not be exaggerated. Though probably Benes was right when, in a recent broadcast to the Czech people, he said that "four million German soldiers had been killed or put out of action by the end of August of this year," the experience of the past weeks shows that Germany still has huge numbers at its disposal. It has been able both to throw in enough divisions to slow the Russian offensive and to put up a strong resistance in Tunisia. Major General Joseph T. McNarney, Deputy Chief of Staff, made this point very clear when he put the number of men in the German armed forces at eight million, and added that "Germany apparently is able to sustain this total from replacements."

FESTUNG EUROPA

Drawing by A. Hoffmeister

Replacements become easier as Fortress Europe succeeds in closing itself in. Take, for instance, the case of France. As long as half of France was unoccupied, there were many difficulties in the way of a full utilization of its man-power for the war industries of the Reich. In spite of the collusion between Vichy and the Gestapo, the Nazis could not recruit the desired number of workers. To let them go on working in France meant to risk not only sabotage but continued air raids on industrial plants—in which the Nazis saw the hand of the underground guiding the R. A. F. But with France entirely occupied and isolated, the chances for the movement of resistance have been greatly reduced. Though it may still be desirable from a military point of view to put Frenchmen to work in Germany, where they will be more out of reach of Allied bombers, the political difficulties will have been largely resolved.

The tightening of the ring around Fortress Europe makes possible a unification of the methods of repression and terror. And while the German army will have the job of defending the Fortress against attack from outside, the Gestapo and the Waffen S.S.—the new organization described in the last issue of this section—will repress mercilessly any attempt at an attack from within.

THE NEW BLACKMAIL

While Fortress Europe steels itself, the Goebbels machine prepares to tell the world what will happen if the ring is ever breached. Goebbels himself opened the campaign with his famous statement in Das Reich: "If the day should ever come when we must go, if some day we are compelled to leave the scene of history, we will slam the door so hard that the universe will shake and mankind will stand back in stupefaction."

Now this is by no means all bluff. On the contrary, I am convinced that when the Nazis are actually driven back toward their own frontiers they will carry out a scorched-earth policy beside which Russia's heroic self-destruction will pale. The German armies do not need Dr. Goebbels to tell them how. In the First World War, when they found it necessary to withdraw to the Siegfried Line, Hindenburg and Ludendorff drew around themselves a "zone of destruction" which left standing not a single house or a single tree. This time the armies will be instructed to kill as many people as they can. Already Dr. Goebbels's monstrous threat is being carried out against the Jews of Europe; it is estimated by the most careful and fully informed observers that a quarter of the Jewish population of Nazi-occupied countries has been wiped out by systematic and deliberate methods. Jews have not only been torn from their homes and occupations and allowed to starve to death by the hundreds of thousands in the new ghettos of Eastern Europe; they have also been slaughtered in a dozen hideous ways—by electric charges, by the injection of air bubbles into the blood, by exposure.

What has already been done will be multiplied to the point of extermination when Hitler, facing disaster, finally "slams the door." Perhaps the only hope of averting this wholesale horror, which will be visited on other helpless millions along with the Jews, is by an immediate counter-threat directed against the men responsible for these crimes. If the heads of the United Nations would join in a new statement addressing by name every military commander and Gestapo chief in every occupied region of Europe, telling each one that he will be held personally to account for the death of innocent civilians, the slaughter might be checked. And even if it were not, the peoples of Europe would at least know that their sufferings are understood and will be avenged.

But one need not minimize atrocities, present or future, to be conscious of the blackmail implicit in this new campaign. It is somehow reminiscent of the Nazi threat of "Czecho-Slovakia or war" in the fall of 1938. What Goebbels is preparing to say now must be something like this: "Either you stop at our gates or you will see Europe wiped out and your soldiers die by the million. If, on the other hand, you show yourselves reasonable, we can discuss as equals the arrangements for a new European order." But to be able to take this stand, the Nazis must not only make the Fortress impregnable but must see that it includes all Europe, from Spain to Scandinavia.

CONCLUSION

How a person reacts to "Fortress Europe" will depend on his outlook on the war. Some will hold that the whole thing will fall to pieces when the Allies are in a position to send bombers by the thousand to attack it night and day. Others will look upon it as a confession of defeat. My own belief is that Fortress Europe should be regarded with the greatest seriousness. Even at the start of the campaign in North Africa, I risked being a kill-joy to point out that Hitler was "still there" and that a rough road lay ahead. That is why the progressive elements in the United Nations cannot afford to yield an inch of ground to the reactionaries, who already begin to act as if the battle against the foreign enemy were won and they could safely turn their guns on the forces working for a democratic conduct of the war and a genuine people's peace. For now more than ever we need the confidence and the determination of the people if we are going to overthrow Fortress Europe, the gigantic Bastille of the Nazi world.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THE difference between a pitchfork and a spear is not very great. But the difference between a pitchfork and a machine-gun is enormous. And there we have the reason why the masses have become more and more powerless against a tyrannical government. In the relations between rulers and ruled technological progress has worked almost exclusively to the benefit of the rulers. The "scientific" apparatus by which modern dictatorships keep themselves in power is so much more than a match for the naked fists of the people that an old-style popular uprising has today become unthinkable. Modern dictatorships can of course be destroyed from outside, by foreign armies, but they can be destroyed from within only when their instruments of power no longer obey them. No contemporary dictatorship has yet had that experience. Every nation that in our day has allowed a dictatorship to be set up is still in bonds to it. Both the Italians and the Germans are caught in a trap from which they cannot possibly free themselves by their own efforts.

But have they actually the will or the desire to get free? Has not an intellectual and moral trap been set for them as well as a mechanistic one? And how firmly has this trap closed on the two peoples? Here the difference between them is tremendous. All reports agree that Fascism has lost almost all power over the minds of the Italians, whereas the power of Nazism over the minds of Germans is unimpaired.

In seeking the cause of this difference we must not overlook the fundamental fact that no two nations in Europe are wider apart in character and temperament. Both peoples accepted the dictatorship or helped to set it up, but there is a great disparity in their mental attitudes toward it. Among Italians the tradition of skepticism is strong. Among Germans there is a tendency to take things with deadly seriousness. You can't eradicate from the average Italian the conviction that all politics contain a big dose of high-class swindling and buffoonery, while the average German just as inevitably views the political struggle as one for Weltanschauungen and absolute truths. Even those Italians who worked with Mussolini seemed to wink at each other ironically; politics to them was a combinazione and 50 per cent humbug. The Germans who supported Hitler felt, on the contrary, that they were champions of a veritable paradise and defended their metaphysics with humorless fanaticism. The psychological trap caught the Italian people only by the hem of their cloak, but it snapped on the leg of the Germans.

Moreover, in the course of the war very different situations have developed at the northern and southern ends of the Axis. One partner has conquered a vast amount of territory, while the other has lost huge areas that once belonged to it. There is a greater disparity in the living standards of the two countries. And as the shirt fits closer than the coat, so food and shelter, in the last analysis, are more important than territorial gains and losses. The deterioration of the Italian standard of living during the war has been incomparably more severe than anything the Germans have experienced. It is often said that Italy is practically a subject country, and in truth living conditions in Italy are more like those in the conquered countries than in Germany. They are definitely worse than those that prevail in many occupied regions.

Let us compare the weekly allowances of certain basic foods in Germany, Italy, Belgium, and France. The "normal" consumer in those countries, according to current regulations, receives the following amounts—in ounces:

	Germany	France	Belgium	Italy
Bread	80 ....	68 ....	55 ....	37
Meat	12½....	6½-9 ....	5 ....	3½-5½
Sugar	8 ....	4½....	8 ....	4½
Fats & oils	7 ....	3½....	2½....	3½
Potatoes	157 ....	varies ....	122 ....	17½.

Of course no comparison of this kind gives the whole picture. Potatoes, for example, play a lesser role in Italy than in the other countries; pasta and risotto partly take their place. If the Italian potato ration is only a fraction of the German, the macaroni and rice rations are somewhat larger. But they are not correspondingly larger. A rough estimate of the basic Italian ration today makes it about 50 per cent less than the German, which is itself decidedly inadequate, and about 25 per cent less than the miserable French or Belgian allowance. Clearly the Italians are living not only in the spiritual atmosphere of a conquered country but on the same material level—or below it.

The New "Fourth International"

THE Third International has faded into oblivion. On the other hand, the Fourth International has been very much in the limelight lately, even though this is the first time that it has been referred to by that name. We mean by it the Central Bankers' International, the Bank for International Settlements. . . . Rising above the petty quarrels of their respective nations, the Central Bankers are still firmly united in the Fourth International of Basel. It is true, they do not communicate with each other, though they have secured permission for their fellow-citizens on the management and staff of the B. I. S. to do so. . . . On the list of directors British names rub solemn shoulders with German, Italian, and Japanese names. The distinguished name of Mr. Montagu Collet Norman appears there along with that of his fellow-director Herr Walther Funk, German Minister of National Economy and chief inventor of the notorious Nazi "new economic order" for Europe.—Time and Tide (London).

The Spirit of Justice Holmes

MR. JUSTICE HOLMES. By Francis Biddle. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

FRANCIS BIDDLE has compressed into two hundred tightly and brilliantly written pages the biography of Mr. Justice Holmes, not only of the judge and philosopher, but of the man as well. The book has a flavor so like its subject that it seems autobiographical. Through well-chosen and short quotations from opinions or statements, we are impressed anew by the pointed brevity of Holmes's language, his facility of phrase, his apt metaphors and parallels, his direct and earthy thrusts of wit or sarcasm. The temptation is to lift from the book one quoted passage after another. And Biddle himself, no doubt affected by association with Holmes as his secretary and the many years of close personal contact, has so caught the spirit of Holmes that time and again when the author expresses a thought, we look for quotation marks.

In one of his earlier speeches Holmes referred to the "little fragments of my fleece that I have left upon the hedges of life." On his ninety-first birthday at a dinner of the Federal Bar Association in Washington, a note from the Justice read, "If I could think that I had sent a spark to those who come after, I should be ready to say goodbye." At another he mentioned "the isolated joy of the thinker who knows that a hundred years after he is dead and forgotten men who have never heard of him will be moving to the measure of his thought." He often reminded us of the "historic continuity with the past" which he said was "not a duty, it is only a necessity."

This idea underlies a letter to Biddle's son in which Holmes said that he remembered his grandmother well and that she remembered moving out of Boston when the British troops came in at the beginning of the Revolution. Once Holmes mentioned a remark of Sidney Bartlett's, a great advocate at the Massachusetts bar. "Deacon Spooner died in 1818, aged ninety-four. I saw him and talked with him. He talked with Elder Faunce, who talked with the Pilgrims."

To Holmes no individual accomplished much except as a "ganglion" in the continuity of life. Thus Holmes carried on the thought of John Stuart Mill, who had carried on the thought of countless predecessors and in the same manner that Biddle will no doubt carry on the thought of Holmes.

A decision by Holmes on free speech in time of war (Schenck v. United States) is a guiding test of today. "The question in every case," he wrote, "is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. . . . It is a question of proximity and degree." John Stuart Mill in his essay on liberty, published in 1859, had said, "No one pretends that actions should be as free as opinions. On the contrary, even opinions lose their immunity when the circumstances in which they are expressed are such as to constitute by their expression a positive instigation to some mischievous act." And Mill used an example which also appears in our court records. "An opinion that corn dealers are starvers of the poor or that private property is robbery ought to be unmolested when simply circulated through the press but may justly incur punishment when delivered orally to an excited mob assembled before the house of a corn dealer."

We are not surprised when Biddle tells us that on graduation from law school Holmes, contemplating a trip abroad, asked his father to get from John Lothrop Motley a letter of introduction to Mill. The father wrote that his son, "now styled Lieutenant Colonel," wanted a "line of introduction." "I give his message or request without urging it. He is a presentable youth with fair antecedents and is more familiar with Mill's writings than most fellows of his years."

Holmes with his reasoned skepticism was not afraid of democracy or of social experimentation, and even though he mistrusted much of the legislation of his day, he insisted upon giving new ideas free play. As Biddle puts it, "The eternal struggle seemed to him the basis of life—and he was all for taking risks rather than weighing them." To him "the past was but a guide to the future, and the great problems were questions of here and now. . . . Holmes, with a healthy sense of the strong life of nature and the slow movement of history, though he had no belief in panaceas, had none in sudden ruin."

Here is the picture of the true liberal who said of himself and other judges, "We need education in the obvious—to learn to transcend our own convictions and to leave room for much that we hold dear to be done away with short of revolution by the orderly change of law." And life—"that is an end in itself, and the only question as to whether it is worth living is whether you have enough of it. . . . Life is painting a picture, not doing a sum."

Writings of and about Mr. Justice Holmes would make a good-sized library. To the general reader interested in the life, ideas, and writings of one of the greatest Americans of our time, this luminous presentation is a "must" book; no lawyer, proud of his profession, will need urging to partake of its delights.

ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

American Fairy Tale

THE ROBBER BRIDEGROOM. By Eudora Welty. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

EUDORA WELTY'S little fairy-tale novel has been greeted with considerable reserve. The reviewers have given it the respect obviously due a book by the author of "A Curtain of Green," and they have expressed great admiration for its prose. But most of them have been disappointed, and some of them have attributed Miss Welty's lack of success to the impossibility or the impropriety of what she has tried to do. For "The Robber Bridegroom" translates the elements of European fairy tales into the lore of the American frontier—its princess is a Mississippi girl who gathers pot herbs at the edge of the indigo field, its mild father-king is a planter, its bridegroom with a secret that must not be pried into is a river bandit, its giant is the fabulous flat-boatman Mike Fink, its Rumpelstiltskinesque creature of earth is a white-trash boy, its spirits of air are Indians.

It seems to me that we cannot judge on principle the possibility or the propriety of this transmogrification. To be sure, there is a hint of quaintness in the conception; still, if it were well done it could be done, and if it has not been well done by Miss Welty it might yet be done by someone else who thought it worth trying. But what I find disappointing in the book is not its conception but its manner—exactly that element which has been generally exempted from blame, Miss Welty's prose. This is in the fashion of sophisticated Celtic simplicity—the jacket blurb speaks accurately of its connection with "The Crock of Gold"—and it aims at an added piquancy by introducing American idioms. It is sometimes witty, it is always lucid and graceful, and it has the simplicity of structure that is no doubt the virtue of modern prose. But its lucidity, its grace, and its simplicity have a quality that invalidates them all—they are too conscious, especially the simplicity, and nothing can be falser, more purple and "literary," than conscious simplicity. This is prose whose eyes are a little too childishly wide; it is a little too conscious of doing something daring and difficult. Miss Welty is being playful and that is perfectly all right, but she is also aware of how playful she is and that is wearisome. She has used the manner of a secret archly shared but (ah!) even more archly not shared, for although she seems to have attached no specific meanings to her fantastic episodes, the whole work has the facetious air of having a profound meaning for herself. In short, she has written one of those fabrications of fantasy which have so tempted two other gifted women of our time—Elinor Wylie with her "The Venetian Glass Nephew" and her "Mr. Hazard and Mr. Hodge," and Virginia Woolf with her "Orlando," very artful and delicate works, very remote and aloof, though passionately connected, in secret ways, with the lives of the authors themselves, and very exasperating in their inevitably coy mystification.

"Proper Commanders"

LEE'S LIEUTENANTS: A STUDY IN COMMAND.

Volume One: Manassas to Malvern Hill. By Douglas Southall Freeman. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

WRITING to General John B. Hood in May, 1863, General Lee said: "I agree with you . . . in believing that our army would be invincible if it could be properly organized and officered. . . . But there is the difficulty—proper commanders—where can they be obtained?"

This question is the core around which Dr. Freeman has organized his exhaustive study of Lee's principal subordinates. He is anxious to do justice to these men, unwilling that their deeds should fade from memory, but as a conscientious historian he is also bent on realistic appraisal of them, not as men, or even as soldiers, but as commanders in

A great writer tells how the French people have reacted to Nazi domination

IN Primer for Combat Kay Boyle gives a brilliant, eye-witness report of how the Nazi conquest affected the daily lives of the little people of France who were her neighbors. This novel is a gallery of French characters—villagers, officers, tradespeople, brave men and cowards, each reacting in his human way to an overpowering catastrophe. Against this background is set the taut love story of an American woman living in France and a dazzling Austrian ski instructor in the Foreign Legion in Africa.

the field. In spite of the enormous literature on the Civil War, this is a task which has not hitherto been undertaken by any Southern writer. One obstacle has been the myth that responsibility for Confederate failure could in no way be saddled on the men who fought in the war. As Dr. Freeman puts it, "All ex-soldiers were to be rated gallant and all officers able. . . . The sons and daughters of Confederate soldiers were reared in the unquestioning belief that Confederate generals were great warriors who would never have been defeated had not the odds been overwhelming. . . . Criticism was disloyalty. To mock was to betray."

Dr. Freeman does not mock, but he weighs the evidence impartially and his criticisms are often severe and occasionally caustic. Consequently he is performing a real service and one that has genuine relevance to our present problems.

What are the outstanding qualities necessary to high military command? To quote the author, they include "administrative skill and diligence, strategical and logistical sense, military imagination, initiative, resourcefulness, boldness coupled with a grasp of practicality, ability to elicit the best of men, and the more personal qualities of character, endurance, courage, and nervous control." This is a formidable list, and it stands to reason that the majority of good subalterns will be unequal to the responsibilities of generalship.

The Confederate army, however, had only a small cadre of professional soldiers on which it could draw. Consequently many who had previously commanded only platoons or companies soon found themselves in charge of brigades and even divisions. Some of them had had experience of actual fighting, but it was of a limited nature—the Mexican War or frontier campaigns against the Indians. This was inadequate preparation for handling masses of men in battles the scale of which rivaled or exceeded those of the Napoleonic wars.

Yet it was not always the men with the greatest pre-war reputations or the most experience who proved the outstanding leaders. Beauregard, whose professional standing was such that he was named superintendent of West Point in 1860, snatched victory from the jaws of defeat at First Manassas only to lose its fruits by failure to follow through—always a test of generalship. But his worst defects were his vanity and exhibitionism, which poisoned his relations with his military and civil superiors. As Dr. Freeman says, "His tongue was manifestly his ally; it was not equally apparent that his pen was his enemy." Another officer of rank whose ability in the stress of battle failed to justify his self-esteem was "Prince John" Magruder. In these pages we see him during the "Seven Days," racked with nervous dyspepsia, contributing greatly to the confusion of that campaign and little to its surprising and hardly deserved success.

The dominating figure in this first volume is, of course, "Stonewall" Jackson, who after distinguishing himself in Mexico had resigned from the United States army ten years before the Civil War broke out. Dr. Freeman sustains the accepted verdict on his Valley campaigns, though he points out a number of flaws that marred them as a work of military genius. But at Malvern Hill we leave Jackson with a slightly tarnished reputation owing to the unwonted sluggishness he had displayed during the "Seven Days." The question remains, to be answered in future volumes, "Can he work in harness?"

One thought arising from reading this book is that insufficient attention has hitherto been paid to the influence of the backward state of the art of map-making on the conduct of both sides during the Civil War. The Virginia campaigns were largely fought in blind country—in low land of tangled woods and swamps crossed by many farm tracks but few hard roads. Maps, thorough reconnaissance, and careful maintenance of liaison were all essential to the success of any concerted action. But again and again we read of elaborate combinations undertaken without the assistance of adequate maps by commanders completely ignorant of the ground they expected to fight on. At the headquarters conference prior to Malvern Hill, General D. H. Hill passed on a warning he had received from a native of the country about the natural strength of the Federal position. But it was laughed off, and Lee, lacking personal knowledge of the topographical features of the chosen battlefield, ordered a frontal attack which proved costly. Whether or not our present generals prove equal in strategical genius to those of the Civil War, they are surely supported by better staff work.

Dr. Freeman, whose great life of Robert E. Lee is so worthily succeeded by this new work, is a scholar, a newspaperman, and a Virginia aristocrat. His scholarship shines from every page, while the controlling hand of the skilled journalist steers the book out of academic paths. The Virginia aristocrat shows himself chiefly by an amusing tendency to explain military virtue in terms of blue blood.

Clamor for Combat

PRIMER FOR COMBAT. By Kay Boyle. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

MISS BOYLE'S novel is a love story of expatriates in France, set against a backdrop of war and told in the first person by the heroine, Phyl. The other characters are seen through the dark glasses of Phyl's egotism; in spite of the pompous dramatis personae which introduces them, they hardly emerge. Phyl's lover, Wolfgang, is an Austrian skiing teacher whose hair is so bright it can be seen blocks away. He is very conscious of it. "My God," he keeps saying, shielding it with his hands from desirous glances, "my hair's too bright!" Except that he joins the Foreign Legion to escape a concentration camp, he in every way resembles any other Austrian skiing teacher. Why Phyl, who is a supposedly sensitive and intelligent woman, should be taken in by him is never explained, although it is implied that she has endowed him mistakenly with some of her own qualities. Both she and Miss Boyle seem unhappy unless every emotion is inflated to its utmost. Phyl's husband, poor Benchley, the historian, has a tough time of it. There is nothing more between them except "sorrow and anger"; he finds Wolfgang "a Don Juan, a cheap lady-killer, an Austrian yodeler"; but if he can just hold on to himself, he will see her through.

He is able to hold on to himself until Phyl discovers after three hundred pages of uneven anguish what she knew on page 5—that Wolfgang cannot bear disapproval and that he will even return to his wife, Corinne, a goddaughter of Pétain, to reinstate himself in an ordered society of convention and collaboration.

This does not, as one might expect, fill Miss Boyle's heroine with self-doubt and dislike. She blames Wolfgang rather than herself, and even more the defeat of France, for the failure of their love. Benchley asks, "Who are these strangers—these Wolfgangs—these Sepps?" (Sepp is another Austrian, and far the nicest person in the book with the possible exception of Mathilde, who is damned with faint admiration as beautiful with her light braids and grande-dame face, her weak, eager penniless hands, her talent for arranging flowers, getting into debt, and loving a gigolo—she is "capable both of grief and love.")

"Who are these intruders?" Benchley said, and my breath came fast when I answered:

"They are my feeble, my inexcusable participation, Benchley."

"In what?" said Benchley sharply, and he did not turn round.

"In the disaster, in humanity's disaster," I said.

Phyl, one feels, is overrating her desire for a blond bronzed Austrian. Her love affair isn't serious enough to compete with war, and the war, too, seems to lose its importance.

There are nevertheless many good things in "Primer for Combat," what the blurb refers to as "vignettes." Where the emotion is not falsified, the observation is as sharp and brilliant as polar weather in New York or mistral brightness blowing down the Rhône valley. When Miss Boyle's personal feelings are not involved, she can concentrate on the one behind the one behind the obvious. But these good

The German Riddle

LISTEN, HANS. By Dorothy Thompson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

THERE is a thirst for objectivity in the Anglo-Saxon mind. We encountered it in the last war in H. G. Wells's "Mr. Britling Sees It Through." We encounter it now in Dorothy Thompson's "Listen, Hans," the story of her broadcasts to Germany. Miss Thompson's aims, however, are vastly more practical than Mr. Wells's. They are part of today's political warfare, where a calm evaluation of the enemy's character and mental processes becomes a prerequisite for an effective assault on his morale.

The first part of her book outlines her broadcasting policies and deals with the various aspects of the German collective mind, primarily the contradictions which have burdened it for centuries. There is little uniformity or continuity in the history of the German nation, which achieved integration as a national state only some twenty years ago. This lack of orderly collective destiny, she believes, has psychologically unsettled the Germans and accounts for much of their explosive aggressiveness.

Free Churchill Pamphlet

The new Archbishop of Canterbury was appointed by Prime Minister Winston Churchill against the wishes of Tory reactionaries in Britain. A huge audience in the Albert Hall, London, heard the Archbishop declare for transference of taxes from production equipment to ground values. (See Christian Century, October 7, 1942.) Churchill himself, in a volume recently issued in New York, says: "Who could have thought that it would be easier to produce by toll and skill all the most necessary or desirable commodities than it is to find consumers for them? It is certain that the economic problem with which we are now confronted is not adequately solved, indeed is not solved at all, by the teachings of the textbooks, however grand may be their logic, however illustrious may be their authors." Churchill is also for the taxation of ground rental values.

What are they after, anyway? The trouble with any German goal is that it is fluid and without firm outline—a jelly-fish which swells and contracts. From the point of view of universal welfare and peace such vagueness is dangerous. "Our political warfare should seek to bring into full consciousness the contradictions in the German unconscious. It should seek to force the German mind to make itself up." The concept of Lebensraum has neither realistic nor materialistic justification today. However, Miss Thompson hopes for support from the rationalism and scientific spirit of the Germans. To reach these she demands that we appeal "with scientific reason and rational objectivity," and that we be bold enough "to risk offending politicians, some of whom have a vested interest in restoration movements of one kind or another." Miss Thompson is well aware of the present revolutionary thought-content of the peoples of Europe and the Asias. They are no longer conditioned to bear an evocation of the status quo. So she offers them certain principles which synthesize the progressive thought of the world. But her Weltbild tries to harmonize the need for a planned world economy with the need for the individual amenities that arise out of the Bill of Rights. More feasible seems her other Utopia, which runs parallel with the former, that of a future Commonalty of Mankind—of the new "common people" who are "not to be catalogued by social or economic class."

Both plans, whatever their practicability, are a positive move toward the world of tomorrow. They will appeal to the wise and the just in all lands. But are they far-reaching and realistic enough to carry away not the Nazi youth alone but the revolutionary youth of all Europe and Asia, who will be on the loose on armistice day, whenever it comes? Will Miss Thompson's principles prove a focus for energies and passions unparalleled in history? They may, but only if youth gets an immediate chance to work and work hard.

Miss Thompson's short-wave addresses to her friend Hans, and indirectly to the German people, seem less significant than her introduction. In challenging her foreign public she has a good many aces up her sleeve, but she speaks the language of a liberal world to which the majority of her hearers are no longer attuned. Incidentally, the presentation of her twenty-four broadcasts in book form drives home the fact that the American people live in ignorance of what purports, on short wave, to represent them. They know that official statements are broadcast, but very little else of what or who is on the air in their name.

Plato: A New Translation

THE REPUBLIC OF PLATO. Translated with Introduction and Notes by Francis MacDonald Cornford. The Oxford University Press. $3.

THE veteran English classicist, F. M. Cornford, has done for Plato's "Republic" what I. A. Richards tried to do and failed. He has given the modern reader a fresh translation in our own idiom which is free from the circumlocutions, the elaborate politeness, and the often ineffective irony of the original. But where Mr. Richards was somewhat bound down by the list of Basic words and even more by his theories about words and the mind, Mr. Cornford has achieved the utmost freedom with the most engaging grace. Instead of the traditional ten books, Mr. Cornford divides the "Republic" into the six parts that suggest themselves as natural steps in the argument. The result is that the connection between justice, which starts the discussion, and political forms, which occupy us with their intricate details, is just as apparent as the connection of both of these with Plato's metaphysical and religious views—the conclusion of the work.

When compared with the usual standard translations, this new one seems so easy to read that one wonders why it was not easy to write the very first time a translation was made. If one goes back, for instance, to Shorey in the Loeb Library, one is aghast at the un-English complexities that this scholar felt himself forced to employ in an alleged "translation," at the same time as he assaulted the fine prose of Samuel Butler's renderings of Homer. It is true that translators always arouse more anger than they satisfy curiosity, but I should think it very difficult to carp at Mr. Cornford: his knowledge of Greek is undisputed, and his fairness to the ideas of his author is patent. Possibly his English will seem too terse, sinewy, and colloquial to those who like to sentimentalize "things Greek," but it will rank with the best Elizabethan and Victorian work, with Florio and Scott Moncrieff.

Our Stake in Eastern Europe

EASTERN EUROPE AND THE UNITED STATES. By Josef Hanc. World Peace Foundation. 50 cents.

ISOLATIONISM, some people hope, is as dead as a door-nail. It needs no argument, therefore, to prove that the United States has a political and economic stake in Eastern Europe which has plunged the world into war twice within a quarter-century. This interest lends special value to the succinct compendium of Dr. Hanc. His realism does not ignore the inadequacies of the Paris treaties, but points with acumen to the "limitless dynamic character" of revisionism. Dr. Hanc believes that the future of all Europe may depend on the solution of East European problems. This is by no means an overstatement. Nowhere is overheated chauvinism so inflammable as in this region with its interspersed nationalities. There is political wisdom in the suggestion that the Western powers should cooperate in an organization of Eastern Europe for peace. This region "instead of a barrier must become the bridge for the free exchange of goods" or else it will become again a roadway for mechanized war.

The author has touched the core of the problem by interpreting the assurance given to the occupied countries to mean that the United Nations, while restoring their independence, will insist on their cooperation and on their giving up some of their sovereign rights. It may be premature to make more detailed suggestions than those of Vice-President Wallace or those of Secretary of State Cordell Hull in his radio address on July 23, 1942. Nevertheless, it is desirable to have as many proposals as possible set forth for consideration and discussion. Only the appeal to the matter-of-fact American spirit may overcome the residue of isolationism. This little book will be useful to those who are preparing blueprints for post-war Europe.

FIJI:

LITTLE INDIA OF THE PACIFIC

Motor-busses, radio, factory smoke—in Fiji? Almost impossible to imagine—but true. For the last sixty years, East Indians have been migrating in great numbers to the Fiji Islands, and today bid fair to dominate the economic and the political life of the Islands.

To the native Fijian, primitive and easygoing, this new culture presents a problem, especially in land utilization, where his agricultural methods are those of his ancestors. He prefers the old folkways of village life; yet he must adjust to a way of life he does not understand. Can he survive?

In recent weeks, U. S. troops have landed on Fiji. The Islands are on a main supply route of the United Nations, and may also be in the path of war. This book gives valuable first-hand information on the geography, economic and political conditions of the Islands and their mixed peoples.

IN BRIEF

NIGHT SHIFT. By Maritta Wolff. Random House. $2.75.

Two years ago Maritta Wolff won considerable attention by being the very young author of the prize-winning novel "Whistle Stop"; now, at twenty-four, she has written a second novel. If "Night Shift"—the story of a sprawling family in an American industrial city—is new proof of Miss Wolff's fictional energy, unfortunately it is even stronger proof of the harm the movies are doing our young writers. All of Miss Wolff's values are the black and white sentimentalized values of Hollywood; her characters are typed in a casting office. Whether she is writing about Sally Otis, the waitress with a heart of gold, or Petey, the night-club singer who is as generous as she is hard-boiled, whether she is concerned with the weakling brother, Joe, or Nicky, the gangster under whose influence Joe falls, Miss Wolff's people are loved or hated, pitied or admired in just the correct Hollywood proportions. And this is particularly to be lamented because Miss Wolff has such an unmistakable vocation for fiction. She is lavish with plot and incident; she has a quite remarkable gift for visualizing scene, and her novel contains at least two memorable passages of description—the account of Sally's Christmas shopping and the description of her first visit to the State Hospital. But our young writers have to get their values somewhere, and it is as much the responsibility of contemporary fiction and criticism as it is of Hollywood that the movies have been able to do this kind of damage.

THE VALLEY OF DECISION. By Marcia Davenport. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

Mrs. Davenport's many-storied monument to a family of Pittsburgh steel people is essentially a book for the trade—the kind of novel which is becoming so much the American fashion, written con amore and obviously the fruit of long researches and labors, and the kind of book which, when you have finished with it, fills you with wonder that so much effort and sincerity could have added up to so little in emotional or aesthetic experience. In following the changing fortunes of the Scott family and its mills, Mrs. Davenport's device for tying together her 800 pages and her several generations of characters is a maid whom we meet at the beginning of the volume, entering service in the Pittsburgh mansion at the age of fifteen, and who, as a very old lady, is still with us at the end of the book when the news of Pearl Harbor comes over the radio. What this remarkable servant has learned is what the author wishes the reader to learn—that "there was no life without death," a lesson supported by the author's detailed history of the struggle for the American way of life in Pittsburgh, and by a report, moving but rather gratuitously introduced, of Czecho-Slovakia's struggle against the Nazis.

LA QUINTRALA. By Magdalena Petit. Translated by Lulú Vargas Vila. The Macmillan Company. $2.

"La Quintrala" proves that a prize-winning novel in Chile need be no better than a prize-winning novel in a literature more familiar to us. A historical novel, in the sense that it is based on the life of a Chilean Lucrezia Borgia, "La Quintrala" has its main virtue in the ease with which it recreates the past; for the rest it is the melodramatic biography of a lady maniac who ranged the gamut of unpleasantness from witchcraft to patricide—sensational if only in its oversimplification of horror. Certainly not a work of literary merit, and not even a good thriller.

REPRISAL. By Ethel Vance. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

As thriller, the new novel by the author of "Escape" is slow and disappointing, the theme too familiar—a Nazi has been murdered in occupied France—and the plot held together by only the thinnest thread of mystery and suspense. But Ethel Vance (she is really Grace Zaring Stone, as everyone must know by now) is less interested in the retribution that overtook an individual German than she is in the calamity that overtook all France. What story her novel has is contrived to allow her to explore the hearts and minds of half a dozen typical Frenchmen—chief among them a former Socialist minister—in order to find out why their country fell into German hands in the first place. The result is a mature and thoughtful book, marred, perhaps, by the way in which each character is made to represent a different political and social point of view, and by Miss Vance's flashback method of narration, but none the less a subtle footnote to one of the tragic chapters of modern history.

DRAMA

Holiday Suggestions

Angel Street (Golden). Unusually effective crime mystery done in the quiet English fashion and with a Victorian setting. From last season.

Blithe Spirit (Booth). Also from last season but Noel Coward's best comedy and perhaps the best on Broadway.

The Damask Cheek (Playhouse). Mild period comedy well acted by Flora Robson and others.

The Eve of St. Mark (Cort). Our best war play to date. Maxwell Anderson manages to combine melodrama with some robust humor and sentiment in such a fashion as to constitute a very moving picture of America as it enters the Second World War. Should be on everybody's list.

The Great Big Doorstep (Morosco). Excellent performances by Dorothy Gish and Louis Calhern in a dramatization of last year's novel about the amiable but shiftless Cajuns of the Mississippi Delta. Picturesque and gently amusing.

Janje (Henry Miller). Broad farce-comedy about adolescent girls who throw a party for the soldiers in camp. Not very subtle.

Native Son (Majestic). Revival of violent, Communist-tinged melodrama about sex and murder.

The Pirate (Martin Beck). The Lunts having and providing a good time pretending to be gaudy Latins. Not much of a play but enough to give the Lunts their opportunity.

The Skin of Our Teeth (Plymouth). Thornton Wilder's tragi-comedy of all human history exuberantly played by Tallulah Bankhead, Florence Eldridge, and Fredric March. Bewildered but delightful reviewers have compared the dramatic method to that of nearly everybody from Aristophanes to Meyerhold despite the fact that the author seems inclined to attribute his inspiration to Olsen and Johnson. In any event, one of the biggest hits of the season and quite possibly its best play. Not for the literal-minded.

Strip for Action (National). Sentimentality, bawdy, and patriotism recklessly combined in a sprawling farce about a burlesque show in an army camp. If you can take seriously the story of an innocent ingenue who has always dreamed of the day when she can become a strip-tease artist like her dear dead mamma, you may be among the many who find "Strip for Action" something to grow enthusiastic about.

Without Love (St. James). More in the manner of "The Philadelphia Story" than in that of any of Philip Barry's other comedies. Primarily a vehicle for Katharine Hepburn and serving its purpose very well indeed.

Yankee Point (Longacre). Edna Best and John Cromwell in a patriotic war comedy-drama which somehow manages to remain rather tame despite the capture of a German saboteur and an air raid on our coast.

By Jupiter (Shubert). A musical version of "The Warrior's Husband" by Rodgers and Hart. Probably the best of the new musical shows with a plot.

Star and Garter (Music Box). Something like a burlesque show done on a lavish scale and with performers of real talent. Probably next on the list of the would-be censors but in my opinion more than redeemed by a satiric touch which comes very near making it a burlesque to end burlesques. With Bobby Clark and Gypsy Rose Lee.

NOTE: It is assumed that the reader needs only to be reminded that the following old standbys are still to be seen: "Arsenic and Old Lace" (Fulton); "Junior Miss" (Lyceum); "Life with Father" (Empire); "My Sister Eileen" (Ritz); "Uncle Harry" (Hudson); "Sons o' Fun" (Winter Garden). In most cases tickets will be easier to get than for the newer hits.

MUSIC

AT WEBSTER AITKEN'S two recent piano recitals in the New York Times Hall and the Frick Collection I was struck even more than previously by his command of his instrument. By this I mean not only his ability to produce with perfection and ease whatever Bach or Debussy asked in speed of passage-work, complexity of figuration, clarity of polyphonic texture, but the feeling for the nature and capacities of the piano which made every sound that came from it—every melody, run, or chord, from the slightest pianissimo to the most brilliant fortissimo—so unfailingly beautiful, so stunningly magnificent merely as sound. But at the same time as I noted the beauty of the sound I was aware of its equally impressive musical significance—the dynamic inflections and tensions with which the contrapuntal lines moved against each other in Bach's "Goldberg" Variations, or with which the florid melodic line was carried from point to point in the Sarabande of the E minor Partita; the evocative potency of the flashing, darting, twisting sonorities and figurations in Debussy's "Goldfish"; the humor that was infused into Debussy's exercises in Debussyan idiom in his Etudes. The first half or so of Bach's Variations, where Aitken functioned with security and assurance and the highest pitch of intensity, reminded me of a painting of Cézanne by the way the successive pieces came into existence as powerful forms shaped with completeness and finality in every detail by powerful emotions and mind. It was one of the greatest achievements in piano-playing that I have heard; and was not the less so for what happened somewhere after the French Overture variation—an accident in the crossing of hands on the one keyboard in music written for two, and a shaken equilibrium that made possible further accidents. In the New York Times Hall the accident was the deadening acoustics of the hall, which dulled the sound of the Debussy music, and reduced to miniature the sound of Bach's E minor Partita played as a work of small scale.

This is not the first time that I have written about the extraordinary quality of Aitken's playing, and in so doing raised in my readers' minds the inevitable question why his playing is heard so little. The answer is to be found in the way the manager-musician-audience set-up functions—what ends it pursues, what methods it uses, what results it produces. These do not include great performances of Bach's "Goldberg" Variations; and whatever else the set-up may achieve for the people who fit into its pattern, it defeats a musician like Aitken who will not travel from city to city to play Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata and little pieces by Chopin, Liszt, and Rachmaninov. About this I will have more to say later; and at that time I will discuss also the part which is played by the newspaper reviewers.

Other matters are more pressing at the moment—among them the New Opera Company production of Verdi's "Macbeth." Having gritted my teeth while some of the Germans among us—joined by Virgil Thomson, who does his worst writing when he indulges in the kind of remote-from-fact concept-spinning the Germans go in for—insisted that Toscanini as an Italian was incapable of performing Beethoven properly, I now had to grit my teeth over the style of Stiedry's performance of Verdi, or rather over the absence of the proper style of this music—over the matter-of-fact statement of what should have been dynamic accompaniment figures, or the metronomic treatment of choral passages that begged for plasticity, for a broadening in pace and sonority at their climaxes. In addition to the conductor's lack of feeling for the music that made it pallid in style, there were the small size and poor quality of the orchestra that made it pallid in sound. The singing was better; Jess Walters, the Macbeth, has a beautiful voice, though much of the time one hears constriction in its use which will do it harm; and Regina Resnick, who replaced Florence Kirk in the performance I attended, has a strong voice of good timbre which she used with excellent dramatic effect. But the acting was of college-dramatic-society caliber; and the stage director seemed to have given no attention to the problem of what costume, make-up and wig, and what movements of body and arms would make of a Regina Resnick—on the stage of the Broadway Theater—a Lady Macbeth; with the result that one saw in "Macbeth" someone gotten up as though to parody a night-club entertainer, and moving as though to parody Florence Kirk's imitation of the lunges and crouches of operatic villainesses. If—as I was led to observe last year—one of the New Opera Company's purposes is to provide opportunities and experience for young Americans, one must question whether the right way to achieve this purpose—right for the artists, for the works, for the public—is to give these young singers roles they are not equipped or ready for in performances for sophisticated New York audiences.

As for "Rosalinda," I found only the brilliantly staged party scene enjoyable.

Postscript on Victor's new set of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4: Though there is a lack of body and power in the bass of the piano, the string basses are very strong. And while Schnabel himself blurs some of the passage-work, there is an additional slight blurring created by the reverberation in the hall, most obviously in the cadenzas and wherever else the piano plays alone. The ears of an engineer friend detected a similar effect in the sound of the orchestra, where I did not notice it.

Our Readers on Darlan

Dear Sirs: May I compliment you on Freda Kirchwey's article in your issue of November 28—Darlan and American Liberals. It was timely and to the point. In my opinion the Darlan appointment was a military, political, and diplomatic blunder. I am fearful of the result for our country and the United Nations. As you well said, an Inter-Allied Political Council should have been in existence when we actively entered the war.

COLONEL SAMUEL PASCOE

Peoria, Ill., December 4

Dear Sirs: Why is it that so few people possess the moral courage to admit that they were mistaken? We expect nothing from our Hamilton Fishes and Senator Tafts, who still reiterate that their position on preparedness was correct, but men like Villard and Norman Thomas make no better showing. So far the only prominent person who has admitted that he was wrong has been the president of Fordham University.

With the opening of the African campaign I wondered what would be the reaction of critics of the Administration who have insisted on a second front on the Continent. I was terribly disappointed with the attitude of The Nation. Its only reaction was to utter shrill denunciations and offer ponderous advice. Surely The Nation should know that none of its readers think more of Darlan than do its editors. But many of us are realistic enough to believe that the first objective is to win the war in the shortest time possible and with the minimum cost of American lives. If this means accepting the temporary help of the devil himself, we are in favor of it.

As far as De Gaulle is concerned, it might be well to consider what the French people think of him. Several books written by American correspondents living in France during the past year seem to agree that 95 per cent of the French people hate the Germans and Laval and a very large number dislike and distrust De Gaulle. Perhaps the opinion of the French people should be considered before a leader is selected for them.

WALTER H. STIX

Cincinnati, Ohio, December 5

Dear Sirs: Freda Kirchwey's convincing article on Darlan and American Liberals in The Nation of November 28 prompts me to write to indorse every word she said. However, I believe she overlooked one point which I consider most important: that this deal with Darlan condones the rotten practices which some of our American business men have been getting away with, lo, these many years—and what is more will continue to get away with, inspired by the government's fine example.

My son, who is in the army, has become quite cynical and has begun to wonder what all the fighting is for.

ROSETTE S. LOWENSTEIN

Chicago, Ill., December 1

Dear Sirs: I have known of The Nation for a very long time, and had some direct knowledge of it through reading its columns when it was under the management of those pseudo-liberals, Godkin and Villard. Of late years it has seemed to me to have got its "feet on the ground." I wish, however, to protest against Miss Kirchwey's article in the issue of November 28 on the Administration's attitude toward Admiral Darlan. Her sneer at "quarterback" theories shows that she fails utterly to grasp the situation and is apparently guilty of the same idealism which made the old Nation a failure to so great an extent. In a war you have to use "quarterback" tactics. Decisions must be made instantly, on the basis of the actual conditions which confront a commander. What was General Eisenhower to do, confronted with the situation in Africa? He either had to make terms with Darlan or spend valuable time and lives fighting the Vichy French forces. President Roosevelt in his explanation of the course pursued simply recognized the existing realities, saying in effect that for the present we make the arrangement with Darlan, leaving final policies to be decided later.

I am strongly favorable to the Free French, was opposed to Mr. Hull's criticism of the seizure of the Atlantic islands as I am opposed to most of the things for which Hull seems to stand. But the simple facts are these: (1) that Darlan was in command of the French forces in Africa; and (2) that General De Gaulle has not been so popular with the majority of Frenchmen as to make it certain they would accept his leadership.

In my judgment, your criticism of the Administration for its African policy tends to give "aid and comfort" to our enemies.

FRANK C. REID

Pasadena, Cal., December 4

Dear Sirs: Allow me to say a few words in defense of "quarterback strategy." Our present aim should be to win the war in the shortest time and with the least possible bloodshed. The deal with Darlan appears to have furthered both of these ends. The President has assured the French people that, regardless of what steps may be taken to win the war, when it is over they will be free to choose whatever government they desire. They should, therefore, rejoice in whatever hastens victory. Deprecation of the Darlan deal implies disbelief in promises made by the President. This should be expected from Roosevelt haters, but hardly from liberals.

BLACHFORD KOUGH

Chicago, Ill., December 2

Dear Sirs: Your articles on the continued appeasement of the old Vichy and Franco regimes are excellent. It would seem that after the appalling two years of Pétain and Laval we would have learned something. Hull and Roosevelt seem to think that we must do business with the Quislings in all countries rather than with the true representatives of the people. General De Gaulle is the leader of the only existing French government, but he is constantly ignored by both Washington and London, while Moscow has recognized him for what he really is, the true France. De Gaulle may not be all that we could wish him to be, but he has been true both to France and to the United Nations. Darlan and Giraud, on the other hand, represent the old reactionary forces of France that were in large part responsible for selling out the French people. Both Giraud and Darlan could have joined the Free French government at any time during the past two years, but they both chose to become part and parcel of the Vichy outfit. Giraud has consistently refused to recognize the Free French as the real government of France. Darlan is apparently an opportunist of the worst sort.

Why should the democracies, 30-called, play around with such semi-fascists? The answer is apparently that there are too many reactionaries in our own government. Roosevelt should know that the only appeal we make to the suppressed opposition in Nazi-occupied territory is our reputation for playing fair and being really anti-fascist. When we deal with Darlans and Girauds we sully our reputation and compromise our honor.

Our dealings with Franco are cut from the same cloth. Franco is a rock-ribbed fascist and can have no future in a democratic world order. He of course fully knows this and therefore is only biding his time. Hitler is his boss and he acknowledges him as such. For many high-placed Foreign Office officials in both London and Washington to pretend otherwise is absurd.

HOWARD A. DYE

Hillside, N. J., December 3

Dear Sirs: In a fine, idealistic way you are absolutely right in your editorial heading the November 28 issue. The only thing you perhaps overlook is that the world since at least 1900 has been in process of violent readjustment to attain a new equilibrium more satisfactory to the powers as a whole than the one which existed from the end of the French Revolution till the Kaiser challenged it in 1905. This readjustment will require many wars, many changes of sides, and at least a generation more of fighting; what the final equilibrium will be you and I cannot even remotely imagine. What happens month by month and year by year guides us not at all. After this phase of the long conflict comes to a close and before the next phase starts we may get some inkling. Meanwhile, do not place too much importance on today.

T. SWANN HARDING

Falls Church, Va., December 8

Dear Sirs: I cannot agree with the position taken by many of our writers and commentators in regard to our deal with Admiral Darlan. The arguments for accepting the aid of this clever opportunist are the same used to justify Chamberlain's appeasement of Hitler at Munich. We were told that he too was only being realistic in order to save lives.

So the appeasers are still unable to see beyond their nose or to distinguish between leaders who have proved their loyalty to the things that we pretend to be fighting for and those who have betrayed their country and people as well as the cause of a Free World.

If Pétain and Darlan had not been appeasers, defeatists, and fascists at heart, they would have gone to North Africa and carried on the fight in June, 1940. Instead they made a deal with Hitler and turned hundreds of spirited and loyal French citizens over to the Gestapo and the firing squad. Yet we accept them as allies, and some even try to make heroes of them. In the face of these facts how can we expect the millions of little people all over the world to get enthusiastic over our talk about the Four Freedoms and democracy? Millions of people in Europe know by now what appeasement has done to them. Can't our leaders show some integrity? Don't they know that success does not make right any more than "might makes right"?

JOHN M. ROCK

Cheyenne, Wyo., December 4

Dear Sirs: The issue before the democratic world today is victory, regardless of cost or ethics. The value of Darlan cannot be too greatly emphasized; it is surely more than enough to overshadow any moral points which Miss Kirchwey's articles in The Nation have brought to light. His aid to the Allies has been priceless, and through him the life of many an American boy has been saved. But this should be well known, and therefore I shall confine my remarks to the issue chosen by Miss Kirchwey, the moral issue.

Miss Kirchwey speaks of the saddened feelings in France aroused by the Allies' recognition of Darlan. I wonder how sad the French would have felt if Darlan, having been spurned by the Allied command, had chosen to resist. There would be no gay thoughts running through the minds of Frenchmen with the Axis radios pounding into them the reports of bloody fighting between the sons of France in Africa and the troops that had come to liberate them. What would have been the feelings of France if the Axis, having been given time to reinforce its African armies by the fighting between the French and the Allies, had won the victory and driven the Allies from Africa, thereby snuffing out the French hope for freedom?

Miss Kirchwey places ethics above military strategy. So did the Belgians and Dutch, and instead of letting British troops enter their country before the Nazi invasion, they waited until it was too late.

For Nazis Only

Dear Sirs: On page 510 of the November 14 Nation Argus has a piece called Behind the Enemy Line which deals in part with the preface Ernest Hemingway wrote for "Men at War." Argus says, "In the introduction to his anthology 'Men at War' Ernest Hemingway again suggests that after the war all Germans should be sterilized."

In his preface to "Men at War" Hemingway wrote: "All members of Nazi party organizations should be submitted to it [sterilization] if we are ever to have a peace that is to be anything more than a breathing space between wars. . . . It is not wise to advocate sterilization now as a government or Allied policy since it can only cause increased resistance. . . ." (Italics mine.)

Notice to Our Readers

NEXT week The Nation will increase its size to forty pages. The change is an act of faith; only time will tell whether it was justified. But we were faced with a difficult choice. Our present size—thirty-six pages—is neither economical nor technically efficient. It necessitates printing a four-page form on different presses from those used for the rest of the paper. The separate operations resulting from this are a nuisance to us and to the printer. So we were forced to choose between returning to the old thirty-two-page book or going up to forty pages.

The first alternative would have meant dropping the new section on Political War or, possibly, squeezing it into smaller compass and eliminating other features. We did not like that idea. The new section has been enthusiastically received by readers; it is followed carefully in various government offices; and events make it more important every week. We did not want to reduce or eliminate other departments either, and consideration for our readers argued against the use of smaller type as a space-saver.

So we decided, instead, to add four pages. To do this and still use our present grade of paper would involve an increase in cost that The Nation could never stand unless we were prepared to raise the price to our readers. Most magazines have raised their price—many have doubled it—but we want to avoid this if possible, or at least put it off as long as we can. Another reason why we could not go up in size and stick to our present paper is that the government is urging a reduction in the amount—which means the weight—of paper used. So we shall shift to a lighter grade of paper at the same time that we increase the number of pages. This change will at one stroke save enough money to make the larger size possible and reduce the total weight of The Nation in compliance with the government's wishes.

That is the story. We shall try to meet the challenge of this stormy period with more and better articles. We shall give our readers more space in which to express their opinions. We shall gradually add new writers and new features. We believe that time will justify our decision to grow rather than shrink.

EDITOR, THE NATION

The Shape of Things

THE RESIGNATION OF LEON HENDERSON IS a severe blow to those who have been insisting that the war should be fought on the home front with the same zeal and courage as on the firing line. Most criticisms of him are an outgrowth of his determination to let no special interest wreck the price-stabilization program. It is probably true that he was not always as tactful with the Congressmen representing special interests as he might have been. He failed rather conspicuously in the vital task of educating the public to the value and necessity of his rationing and price-control program. But it is probably fair to say that no one could have succeeded at this task in the face of constant sniping from a section of the press more interested in discrediting the New Deal than in winning the war. Mr. Henderson was blamed for all sorts of things over which he had absolutely no control. He was held responsible, for instance, for the complicated questionnaire sent to the truck owners by Coordinator of Transportation Eastman. And he was blamed for the delay in the food-rationing program, though Congress had specifically denied him funds to put it through. Not even his enemies question his integrity, competence, or courage—qualities badly needed today.

THE RED ARMY HAS OPENED THE THIRD phase of its winter offensive by a sweeping advance through the Nazi lines paralleling the middle Don. Two columns are converging on the important junction of Millerovo. According to the Russian communiqués, some 300 villages have been retaken, over 40,000 Germans killed or captured, and a huge amount of booty seized. In an area as large as Russia the recovery of territory means little in itself, as was shown last winter when the German defense system of loosely linked strong points held despite the wedges driven between them by the Soviet forces. But this year the Red Army is slicing into the German lines even more vigorously and levying a heavy toll on communications which are far more extended than a year ago. In last winter's campaign Hitler's isolated garrisons depended largely on air-borne supplies. This year the Luftwaffe's transport service is also heavily engaged in the Mediterranean. The new Soviet advance threatens the air bases from which the Axis forces in the Stalingrad pocket have been succored, and their position, already desperate, may soon prove hopeless. German radio reports are significantly speaking of military decisions to shorten the front on the middle Don. The Soviets' brilliant advances will probably necessitate far more extensive movements of this nature, not only by tightening the net around the besieged besiegers of Stalingrad but by threatening the flank of the Nazi Caucasus army.

TENSION ABOUT SPAIN DIMINISHED somewhat over the week-end, and Radio Berlin and Radio Rome dropped for the moment their pretense that Dr. Negrín was plotting the invasion of Spanish Morocco with General Eisenhower. A broadcast from London announcing that the Loyalist Premier has been in Oxford during the last few days, attending a conference on European reconstruction, has put an end to Axis rumors of his presence in North Africa. But Radio Berlin soon found another exciting subject for its Spanish listeners in the arrival at Madrid of General Agustín Muñoz Grande, commander of the Blue Division sent by our prospective ally, General Franco, to fight against our actual ally, Russia. Serrano Suñer, in his new all-power post in the Council of the Falang, provided the "spontaneous" demonstration that welcomed General Muñoz Grande to the capital. According to Berlin, thousands and thousands of Spanish patriots rushed to the station to hail Muñoz Grande with the cry, "Gibraltar! Gibraltar! Gibraltar!"—words directed by our prospective ally, General Franco, against our other actual ally, Great Britain. Hitler contributed personally to the glorification of the commander of the Blue Division by bestowing upon him the Iron Cross with oak leaves.

WHETHER THE "IBERIAN BLOC" FORMED ON Monday offers a counterbalance to the news coming from Spain on the days preceding, it is too early to predict. In itself Spain's approach to a country like Portugal, which, although ruled by a dictatorship, has so many traditional links with England, sounds encouraging. But neither the speeches exchanged in the Place of Cintra between the head of the Portuguese state, Antonio de Oliveira Salazar, and Franco's visiting Foreign Minister, General Gómez Jordana, nor the composition of the Spanish delegation was reassuring. General Jordana took with him the chief of staff of the Spanish army, General Martínez Campos, a rather curious choice for a mission whose officially proclaimed purpose was to keep Portugal and Spain out of the war. The speeches abounded in praise of peace, "but not a static peace," observed Gómez Jordana, "a peace that follows the events of the general struggle with undiminished attention and with a determination to prevent old things [meaning, we may assume, democracy] from surviving." The added fact that before leaving Madrid the Spanish Foreign Minister talked at length with the German Ambassador and that Berlin has hailed the Iberian bloc as a contribution to the stabilization of Europe should also moderate any hopes that may be founded on this current peace crusade of Falangist Spain. All of which makes us suspect that instead of Portugal taking Spain over to the Allies, it is Spain which is trying to assure the acquiescence of Portugal in the event of a Nazi march through the Peninsula.

THE "VICTORY FUND DRIVE" HAS BROUGHT into the Treasury's coffers a great deal more money than had been anticipated. The goal set for December's super-financing was $9 billion; the range of securities offered gave the smallest wage-earner as well as the biggest bank an opportunity to participate. Over $10 billion has been subscribed, and Mr. Morgenthau has now raised his sights to $11 billion. This total should be easily achieved, especially if those fortunate enough to enjoy Christmas bonuses invest them in war bonds. A Treasury tabulation shows that of the funds subscribed up to December 19 roughly 45 per cent was derived from banking sources and 55 per cent from the general public, including insurance companies, institutions, trusts, and the like. This ratio is being hailed as very satisfactory, but in our opinion the share of the banks is still too large to be healthy. Government borrowing from non-banking sources means the absorption of real savings and is definitely anti-inflationary in its effects. When Mr. X buys a $1,000 bond, his deposit account is reduced by that amount. The Treasury uses the proceeds to pay Mr. Y, a contractor, who puts it in his own bank. The effect is to leave the total of spendable deposits unchanged. If Mr. X, however, chooses to keep his savings liquid in his deposit account, he provides a fund which his bank can lend to the government. But after the money has been passed along to Mr. Y, total deposits are increased by $1,000, and to that extent available purchasing power has been enlarged. That is why borrowing from the banks is inflationary in its effects. It can hardly be avoided altogether, but it ought to be held to a minimum.

THE C. I. O. HAS PRESENTED A MAN-POWER program to Paul V. McNutt which deserves the fullest support from everyone interested in effective, immediate mobilization of the labor resources of the country. It calls for complete coordination with the Manpower Commission of the activities of those agencies which have jurisdiction over procurement, the issuance of contracts, and the disposition of raw materials. It asks that employers be compelled to make full use of Negroes, racial minorities, and women. Measures are requested to assure full protection for workers who are "frozen" on a particular job or are transferred from one job to another. Participation of labor is asked in decisions involving the drafting of workers from war jobs to the armed forces. Stress is placed on the necessity for expanding the United States Employment Service, with enlarged appropriations for its activities, and on the establishment of national minimum standards of social security for all workers. The C. I. O. proposals do not constitute, of course, a complete man-power program. They must be accompanied by a careful plan for enlisting, training, and providing for the special requirements of women workers. Some degree of compulsion is probably necessary in placing men and women in war work. But no man-power program can possibly succeed unless it wins the support of labor by the inclusion of safeguards such as those outlined in the C. I. O. proposals.

THE TWO MAJOR RADIO NETWORKS WHICH in October refused to sell time for the purpose of publicizing the cooperative method of retailing have since then received quite an education. They have learned that the cooperative movement is neither a freak affair nor a subversive organization but an eminently sensible means of self-help, embracing several million consumers and enjoying formidable political backing. The lessons resulted in a partial retreat, which has taken the form of an agreement between the code committee of the National Association of Broadcasters and the Cooperative League. At the time of the original dispute the Columbia Broadcasting Company issued a statement indicating that while radio advertising of a cooperative-labeled product would be acceptable, any attempt to inform listeners about the unique features of cooperative trading would be barred on a commercial program. The agreement now reached declares that "there is no objection to commercial copy incorporated in a program sponsored by a cooperative enterprise which states that (a) any person can make purchases at cooperatives; (b) membership in cooperatives is open and voluntary; (c) cooperatives are owned by members, each of whom has one vote; (d) profits or savings are returned to member owners." This represents a reasonable compromise which will enable the cooperatives to sell their ideas as well as their wares, although it will bar the program originally drafted by the Cooperative League, which by presenting the history of the movement in dramatic form mingled, in effect, the "commercial" with the entertainment.

NO DOUBT IT WAS TO KEEP A MILITARY secret from the farm belt that Rubber Administrator Jeffers sent off a committee to investigate Soviet rubber processes without announcing the names of its members. For it turns out, on prodding by the Gillette committee, that the men chosen by Jeffers represent the oil and chemical interests which have been opposed to using farm products in the rubber program and which turned a deaf ear a year ago to Soviet offers of aid. Three members of the four-man committee are from companies which had alliances or friendly understandings with the Standard Oil-I. G. Farben cartel—du Pont's United States Rubber, Universal Oil Products, and Carbon and Carbide. The last-named is indeed, as Jeffers said, interested in making rubber from alcohol. In fact, it has the synthetic-rubber program's entire allotment of rubber to be made from alcohol, no doubt in order to keep that part of the program in safe hands. Carbon and Carbide normally makes its alcohol synthetically from petroleum and natural gas. It is the chief support of the Mellon Institute, whence Jesse Jones and the WPB drew their two main advisers on our badly advised synthetic-rubber program. No one on the committee represents the Mid-western agricultural scientists who are interested in finding new uses for that section's surpluses and who have done such notable work in making rubber from farm products.

Darlan States His Case

DARLAN'S statement on his purposes and present policies, issued last week, is worth examining from a number of angles. Perhaps the most important thing about it is the fact that it was made public at the White House with a covering message by the President. This gives the statement the force of an officially indorsed explanation. In effect it is the government's answer to those who have criticized the deal with Darlan on political grounds, and by the same token it is an admission that criticism was both widespread and bitter enough to necessitate an explanation. Perhaps it is encouraging to know that Darlan is sufficiently amenable to American pressure to issue a statement designed to soothe the feelings aroused by his assumption of office.

Certainly little encouragement can be drawn from the document itself. Darlan's disclaimer of personal ambition is as unconvincing as his assertion that all he wants is a restored France free to choose its own form of government. His whole record, together with his political-financial connections, described on a later page of this issue, make such talk pure poppycock.

Much more interesting are certain concrete references to present arrangements in North Africa. He says that "in actual accomplishments, the High Commissioner [himself] has already granted full and complete amnesty to all against whom any action had been taken because of sympathy to the Allies. . . . Prisoners and internees of the United Nations were promptly released. . . . The High Commissioner has begun the restoration of rights to those persons from whom these previously had been taken because of their race. Measures have been taken to stop immediately whatever persecution of Jews may have resulted from laws passed in France under German pressure." Note the wording of that statement, so artfully designed to gloss over uncomfortable realities. Note, for example, with what care it avoids saying that Spanish and Jewish and other anti-Nazi refugees have actually been freed; how craftily it suggests, without saying so, that all French political prisoners have been released; how clearly it admits, without appearing to, that legal restrictions against Jews are still effective. The fact is, as the Fighting French radio station at Brazzaville reported early this week, the Spanish Loyalists are still in prison in North Africa. So are the Jews and the other refugees from the Axis. So are all but a few of the Fighting French. Until the President tells us that these people have all been turned loose and the anti-Jewish laws swept out of existence, we shall continue to look upon the Darlan statement as an unworthy piece of political hokum.

The one thing it clearly establishes is the meaning of the term "temporary." By giving official approval to Darlan's own version of his tenure of office, it announces in effect that "temporary" means "for the duration." This was evident before Darlan told us so, but to have the truth so bluntly and officially admitted will undo any reassuring effect the statement might otherwise have had. The peoples of Europe expect a hard and long war. They have no desire to fight it by the side of men whose character they have every reason to despise. In this week's Political War section we publish almost the whole text of a leading editorial in Tribune, the well-known London weekly of left opinion. We publish it not because it is a model of accuracy or journalistic prose—unfortunately it is rather carelessly put together—but because it expresses so bluntly the anger and deep distrust aroused in England by the Darlan deal. These emotions are shared by conservatives and leftists alike, and there is no use in censoring them, as the British tried to do. The knowledge that Darlan is in for the duration will do little to relieve the feelings of men who say with bitterness born of three years of struggle: "We did not need an American expeditionary force to tell us that it is cheaper to compromise with an enemy than to fight him."

Peril in China

THE announcement that British troops have recrossed the border into Burma is significant chiefly for its possible effect on the desperate situation in China. So far, the British drive appears to be a limited one, designed to recapture the narrow valley which is served by the port of Akyab. Such a drive of itself would be of no value to China even if it were fully successful, but as part of a coordinated plan to recapture the Burma road, it would have very important consequences. For it is no secret that feeling toward Britain and the United States has become extremely bitter in China in recent months as a result of the failure of those countries to send effective aid to China.

Nowhere has the Chinese case been put more effectively than in a recent letter to PM by the distinguished novelist Lin Yu-tang. Dr. Lin points out that of the hundred transport planes requested by China at the beginning of the year only forty were sent, and that twenty-five of these were diverted to India. Although the twenty-five were ultimately restored to China, after months of negotiation, the monthly supplies now reaching China are only about 1 per cent of the normal capacity of the Burma Road and less than could be carried on a small 2,500-ton steamer. He adds that only a handful of fighter and bomber planes have been sent to support the Chinese military effort, and warns us that the Chinese army cannot hold out indefinitely unless something is done to replace and repair existing transport equipment.

Japan's strategy for taking advantage of this situation has become quite clear. Recent reports indicate that at least 30,000 troops, with considerable air support, have been massed in the Lungling-Tenchung area along the Burma border for an invasion of Yunnan province. Unless the present drive into the Akyab corner of Burma is expanded into an offensive directed against Burma proper, the Japanese can probably succeed in cutting the tenuous air line that now connects China with the outside world. If this should happen, the situation of the Chinese would be all but hopeless, and there is little doubt that defeatist elements in the government would do their best to bring about a peace with Japan. This would, of course, be a disaster for the United Nations on every count, not least because it would rob us of the eventual possibility of using China's superb airfields for a direct attack on Japan.

As Lin Yu-tang has pointed out, China is not asking much. It is not asking us to abandon our African campaign or even to give up the struggle in the Solomons and New Guinea. It asks only for a small fraction of our military output, enough transport planes to restore effective communications between Chungking and the outside world and enough men and supplies for an all-out campaign to reconquer Burma before it is too late. To this should be added, as one Chinese spokesman declared recently, enough long-range bombers and fighter escorts to carry the war directly to Japan. As The Nation has consistently pointed out, these measures are as much in our interest as they are in China's.

The Power Is Nelson's

THE Small Business Committee of the House of Representatives deals much too harshly with the OPA and much too gently with WPB Chairman Donald M. Nelson in its tentative report on the conditions it found in the South and Southwest. It declares that the Smaller War Plants Corporation, though established six months ago, has had "practically negligible" results in those areas. The committee held hearings in St. Louis, Memphis, Dallas, Houston, New Orleans, Jacksonville, Atlanta, Birmingham, and Charlotte. "In none of the cities visited," the committee says, "was there an operating organization set up to represent the corporation and to do the work for which it was created. Yet in all the localities visited the committee found many unused facilities and many distressed small manufacturers who have been trying desperately to obtain contracts to produce necessary war materials." Who is to blame?

The committee reports that on December 15 it questioned "Mr. Lou E. Holland, chairman of the Smaller War Plants Corporation," and it attributes the failure of the corporation "to the management." But Holland and the four nonentities who make up the board of the SWPC are not its management. The management of the corporation lies in the hands of Donald M. Nelson, who is its chairman. Holland, an energetic and able small business man from Kansas City, is only vice-chairman. Under the act creating it the SWPC can obtain no contracts for distribution to smaller businesses without separate certification of each contract by the chairman. The vice-chairman and his colleagues are completely dependent on Nelson, and Nelson's aid to small business is limited almost entirely to pious reflections before Congressional committees on the importance of preserving it. Nelson delayed the establishment of the SWPC for many weeks after the act was passed. He picked a weak board to run it, and he seems to have succeeded in draining Holland of the vitality and fighting power the latter showed before Nelson summoned him to Washington.

The remedy is simple and should be obvious to Wright Patman and his colleagues of the House committee. The original draft of the Smaller War Plants Corporation Act, the Murray-Patman bill, would have set up an independent body empowered to make and finance war-production subcontracts for small business men in a "bits and pieces" program. In order to win Nelson's approval, the bill was amended to make him chairman of the SWPC and the SWPC dependent upon him. Events since the passage of the act make it hard to avoid the conclusion that Nelson took the House and Senate Small Business committees into camp. A frontal attack on the bill would have been hopeless; both houses finally passed the measure unanimously. Nelson adopted shrewder tactics. The remedy is to take the power away from him and make the SWPC independent.

The Patman committee's criticism of price regulations as they affect the retailer are less convincing than its findings in the field of war production. No doubt there are many cases in which retailers find themselves caught in price squeezes, but the committee has yet to demonstrate that these are not the exceptional and unavoidable tragedies of price control. Politically, it is much easier to assail the "bureaucracy run riot" of price control—everybody is against bureaucracy—than to look too closely into why small business has been unable to get its share of war orders. We think it wiser to suspend judgment on this portion of the committee's findings until it publishes the more detailed report it has promised.

A Call to Action

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

THE NATION has never been known as a journal that ignored the faults of its favorites. Like a stern parent it has seemed to take satisfaction in chastising those it loves, expecting of them a higher standard of behavior than it demands of the rest of mankind. But even The Nation, I have discovered in turning the pages of old volumes these last few days, has found little to disapprove of in the conduct of George W. Norris. From the day when Norris stood against America's entrance into the last war to the day when he firmly supported its entrance into the present one, his policies, his character, his whole approach to problems of government have consistently won the praise of this journal of highly critical opinion. His steadfast adherence to the very essence of democratic behavior has been something that the most cantankerous critic could only try to emulate.

Next week The Nation and the Union for Democratic Action together will sponsor a dinner in New York in celebration—I use that word deliberately—of George Norris's recent retirement from the Senate. The response to the invitation already indicates how many people in this part of the country have been eagerly awaiting an opportunity to express their affection for the man whom all progressives, without regard to voting frontiers, have looked upon as their particular Senator.

I don't believe the guest of the evening will have any idea, unless he accepts my word for it, how many of those who gather to do him honor are, in a special sense, his legitimate political offspring; how many, like The Nation itself, look upon him as a chief source of their hopes and plans for a decent society in this country.

Again I can properly draw upon The Nation's long relationship with our Senator to illustrate this truth. It was in 1923 that George Norris first decided to retire from the Senate. The words he spoke at that time were both true and misleading: he had, he said, "been bucking this game for twenty years, and there is no way of breaking it." But The Nation called him back to the fight in an article by Oswald Garrison Villard which said in part:

We understand full well the wear and tear of the daily senatorial drudgery upon him who is worthy of the office. We know that the fulness of years approaches—you have passed your sixty-second birthday. And yet, understanding all this, we can but say to you this is no time to flinch. . . . It was you, George W. Norris, who, when a Representative, led the successful fight against Cannonism in the House. . . . It was you who led the numerous struggles to better the plight of the farmer you know and understand so well. . . . Everywhere there are indications that the inevitable period of black reaction is drawing to a close, that the tide of liberalism is rising again. . . . New allies and new friends are sitting at your right and at your left in the chamber you have so long graced. Then why surrender now?

He yielded, generously, to the pressure of his friends and ran again for the Senate, but it is certain that he did it without ever anticipating the democratic victories he was to win in the nineteen years which followed. For then, as today, George Norris realized neither his own strength nor the degree to which the progressive forces in the country counted upon him for leadership. His failure to recognize those facts must be attributed to two elements in his make-up: first, a deep, though intermittent, current of pessimism which generally serves the useful purpose of lending realism to his crusades and a salutary drop of acid to his estimate of men and events; and, second, that profound, unaffected modesty which has colored his whole public life.

It is safe to say that Senator Norris looks upon himself as a decent, honest, liberal sort of man who has done his best to represent the people who sent him to Washington and the interests of the country as a whole. That he has achieved a position of national leadership from which he cannot possibly retire, especially in this hour of crisis in the fight for a democratic future, has not, apparently, even occurred to him. As we all know, George Norris has left the Senate in a mood of discouragement. His defeat was for him a sign that the tide of progressive political action is ebbing, that his own long, untiring fight has ended in failure. Again he has allowed himself an hour of despair after a lost battle.

I hope I shall not sound like a political innocent if I express the opposite view. The defeat of George Norris will, I firmly believe, result in a period of new and broader service for him and in a spiritual awakening for the country. Defeat is sometimes more salutary than victory, and the election in November should be looked upon as America's political Dunkirk—a shock which will rekindle the fighting faith of the progressive forces in this country.

On every ground—experience, valor in action, wisdom, even seniority—George Norris is the natural commander of those forces. His retirement from the Senate of the United States frees him for active field service in a war we know today must be fought on all fronts—from the farms of Nebraska to the shores of Tripoli.

The fight is for a world that belongs to the ordinary man, to whom George Norris has devoted his strength, his integrity, his undiminished courage. It will be a tough fight. The setback suffered by the democratic spirit in America is a real one. Our enemies are confident and aggressive. We can win, but we can win only if we accept defeat as a challenge, if we rouse ourselves to fight together and fight hard. And this we are determined to do. Confidently we summon George Norris to lead us in this greatest battle of his career.

The Loss of Leon Henderson

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, December 20

HOW well Leon Henderson served the people of this country will become more apparent as the new Congress, on a reactionary rampage, forces a general loosening of anti-inflationary regulations. Up to now, thanks to Henderson's integrity and courage, and despite the power exercised by special economic interests in our political life, we have done a better job than any other capitalist country in fighting inflation. The loot of Europe has tended to hold German prices down; Lend-Lease has helped maintain supplies in Britain. We have managed to hold the advance in the cost of living to less than a fifth of the advance that occurred in the First World War, although a much larger share of our productive capacity is going into war production and war exports. This is a magnificent achievement, and it is the more remarkable because up to last May Henderson had no real power over any prices and has never had adequate power over farm prices.

The clamor of the press against Henderson is no real index of the public's attitude toward him, but no man can expect to be a price administrator in war time and win popularity contests. Henderson's fate deserves a place in the meditation of philosophers. By fighting inflation he was serving the general interest but antagonizing a long list of special ones. These were not limited to what we are accustomed to call "the interests." The steel industry knuckled under to Henderson on prices at a time when he had only the power of bluff and bluster. It was the farm bloc and labor which proved his undoing—the former by a frontal attack, the latter by the inability of the rank and file to work up much enthusiasm for a man who was holding down their wages, albeit for the best of reasons. He had to step on everybody's toes in order to protect everybody from runaway prices. The pain inflicted was immediate, the danger comparatively distant. Everybody seemed to feel the hurt to his own special interest more deeply than the benefit to the general interest in which all shared.

There are many reasons for Henderson's resignation, but none of them would have mattered had it not been for the last elections and the next Congress. His eyes are bad and his back needs treatment; these ailments, though genuine enough, come nevertheless under what Freud might have called the psychopathology of politics. There is nothing wrong with him that a New Deal victory and two weeks in a health resort could not patch up. The President did not ask for his resignation but must have been relieved to get it as he prepares to deal with the new Congress. A new face is a good thing at any time in so unpopular a post as that of price administrator, and to the White House it must have seemed all the more necessary at this time. Henderson resigned after asking the advice of Byrnes.

Henderson's unpopularity in Congress was based on two things. One was that he had the spunk to say no to requests for special favors. These requests came from progressive as well as reactionary members of Congress anxious to "take care of" industries and persons back home. The other was that, whether from ineptness, excessive political purity, or naivete, or possibly all three, he allowed price-control jobs and machinery to fall largely into the hands of state political machines. These were often anti-New Deal and in many cases Republican. In some strategic areas in the last election the OPA patronage and machinery helped to defeat New Deal candidates. These practical considerations rather than the use of logarithmic computations in questionnaires turned Congress against him. If Henderson had "played ball" he could have used differential calculus in fuel-oil rationing and still found defenders on the Hill.

Henderson's retirement is part of the general movement away from liberalism. He has led a precarious existence since his appointment to the Defense Commission in May 1940. He has made his compromises, but on every basic issue he has been firm—and right. He led the fight in 1940 for expansion of steel, aluminum, and other basic materials. He led the fight in 1941 for curtailment and conversion of civilian industries. Had he been in a position to run, rather than merely to needle, the defense program, we should have been far ahead of where we are now in war production. Around him, in the price administration and the civilian-supply division of the WPB, were the ablest and most devoted group of New Dealers and progressive business men in Washington. The only field in which they had authority was prices, and there they did a good job. Henderson's resignation marks the second phase of the New Deal retreat, as the alliance with big business in May, 1940, marked the first. Both have their political logic, but the time may rapidly be approaching when the President will have to stand and fight. When that time comes, Henderson will return to the high position he deserves.

I had intended to devote this week's letter entirely to Henderson's resignation, but late tonight, from a trustworthy source, I received some information of importance on the supposed revolutionary plot uncovered in Bolivia. The "revolt" so happily stifled by the imposition of martial law seems to have had a good deal more to do with the shortsighted social policies of our State Department and diplomatic service than with the machinations of Nazi agents. In last week's issue I reported that I had heard that the American Minister to Bolivia, Pierre Boal, was trying to persuade the President of that country to veto a silicosis-prevention law. It appears that this law was only part of a general labor code which was before the Bolivian Congress. The imposition of martial law prevented the code from coming to a final vote, a fact discreetly omitted by the official reports from La Paz.

The demand for the passage of the general labor code was one of the causes of a strike in the tin mines, which was also crushed by the declaration of martial law. The code would have provided, among other things, for collective bargaining, freedom of organization, minimum wages, and payment of wages every fifteen days. This final provision is the best commentary on the labor conditions prevailing in Bolivia. Actually the miners are kept in a kind of peonage. As Mr. Boal is said to have put it recently in a five-page cable to Secretary of State Hull, "They are now paid tardily deliberately in order to maintain them on the job and to give them a stake in their next month's pay." This was a delicate way of saying that if the miners were paid late and irregularly they went into debt, and that if they were in debt they had to keep on working. Our minister went to the President of Bolivia on behalf of the mine owners to prevent the passage of this labor code, although with the high prices we are paying for Bolivian tin the Patino interests can well afford to pay the miners better wages. Hull's reply to Boal's cable is reported to have given discreet support to the latter's anti-labor activity. For the sake of Good Neighbor relations, some Congressional committee ought to put the State Department on the griddle in this affair and show Latin America we mean what we say in our speeches.

The Men Behind Darlan

BY PAUL WINKLER

A FEW days after the occupation of North Africa London announced that two former Vichy politicians, Pierre-Etienne Flandin and Pierre Pucheu, had arrived in Algeria to confer with Admiral Darlan. This news was neither denied nor confirmed. According to reliable information since received, Flandin is actually in North Africa, and Pucheu is in Lisbon, maintaining contact with Algiers from there. Most commentators described Pucheu and Flandin as a pair of rats fleeing a sinking ship. If this description were true, the matter would be of limited interest only. But they are not fleeing, seeking asylum with the probable winners. They are engaged in carrying out an important mission intrusted to them by certain French financial circles which, in full agreement with German industrial groups, plan a joint control of the European economy—an association in which the Germans are to have the leading role and the French must content themselves with that of junior partner.

The ominous significance of Darlan's elevation to power in the camp of the United Nations lies not in his past record as a political apologist for the Axis but in his present role as a tool of interests which want to assure themselves an economic strangle-hold on Europe even in the event of a German defeat.

Most people in America think that the numerous transfers of the controlling interest in French enterprises to German hands were effected under the threat of German guns and bayonets. It is true that thousands of French stockholders, large and small, were compelled to turn over their holdings, but the powerful French group which organized these transfers was under no coercion. When the real story of the collapse of France is written, it will be clear that the systematic subjugation of French firms to German control was deliberately planned by this small group of Frenchmen, in agreement with their German friends. Pucheu played a leading role in the machinations of this group.

Some day it will also be clear that these men did everything possible to bring about the collapse of France because that was to be the screen behind which their economic transactions would be carried out. It is still too early to present the evidence in its entirety, but enough is known now to show how these men benefited from the disaster.

As soon as the German army occupied Paris, a horde of accountants arrived in the city. All French enterprises of any size were approached, at first in a friendly manner: "We do not want anything from you, but we should like to make an audit of your operations for statistical purposes. We would appreciate your cooperation with our accountants." These audits were very valuable for their sponsors because they permitted an evaluation of each enterprise and a decision on whether it was worth taking over. At this stage of the procedure the board of directors was usually called to the German embassy in Paris for a "conference." There they were invited to hand over the majority of the shares of the company (generally 51 per cent) either to a French intermediary or directly to some large German firm.

At first most French corporation heads objected. General de la Laurencie, a conservative but patriotic French general, was Pétain's delegate in Paris immediately after the armistice, in July and August, 1940. De la Laurencie considered it his duty to encourage the French corporation heads in their resistance. He was demoted by Pétain, who later kept him under house arrest for several months, and replaced by Fernand de Brinon, a financial journalist known for his frequent trips to Berlin in pre-war days as principal organizer of the Comité France-Allemagne.

De Brinon hastened to repair the damage done by General de la Laurencie. As Pétain's representative in the occupied zone, using the powers conferred on him by the Marshal, he exerted pressure of all sorts on the resisting boards of directors to obtain their compliance with the demands of the Germans. The members of the boards had to sign over their control in due legal form to a designated firm or group and could consider themselves lucky if they were given a subordinate position in the enterprise.

De Brinon appeared to be managing these transactions, but he merely did the preliminary work. As soon as the controlling interest had been obtained from the former owners, a designated "Franco-German group" took charge. This group was always predominantly German, with French "junior partners." The French participation was generally supplied by the same French banking firm. People in France soon began to talk about the frequent reappearance of the same men in these transactions, and the threads led in each case to the Banque Worms, aided at times by the Banque Lehideux, the Banque Mirabaud, and the Banque d'Indochine.

Persons connected with these banks, especially the Banque Worms and the Banque d'Indochine, have played an equally important political role during the past two and a half years as members of Pétain's entourage. Paul Baudoin, first Foreign Minister of Vichy, later secretary general of the Cabinet, is the leading man of the Banque d'Indochine. Before joining this bank, Baudoin was inspecteur des finances, that is, a member of the special corps which in France has at all times constituted the framework of the Treasury. His two closest friends in the Treasury were Jacques Barnaud and Yves Bouthillier. Bouthillier became Minister of Finance in the Vichy Cabinet. Several years ago Barnaud, on Baudoin's recommendation, became general manager of the Banque Worms. On leave of absence from his bank, Barnaud is at present High Commissioner for Franco-German Economic Relations in the Vichy Cabinet, officially in charge of the "supervision of the necessary transformations of French enterprises to enable them to participate in the economic life of Europe."

Pierre Pucheu, for many years closely connected with the Banque Worms, was lent by the bank in pre-war times to act as manager of the Franco-German Siderurgical (Iron and Steel) Office. This office, originally founded to further cooperation between French and German heavy industry, later became the breeding ground for more daring ideas. Pucheu, a leading figure in both the German and the French heavy industries, was the brains behind the scheme for handing over the control of all large French enterprises to German interests. His close connection with the Banque Worms procured for this bank a foremost position in the transactions. Further, the Banque Worms represented in France the Bank Schröder of Cologne. It was at the house of Baron von Schröder that Hitler and von Papen met on January 4, 1933, to put the last touches on the plans that were to bring the Nazis to power. The Bank Schröder has since then consolidated its effective influence on German heavy industry. And very naturally it has played an important role in German economic expansion in France and other European countries.

While he was with the Franco-German Siderurgical Office, Pucheu worked for both the Bank Schröder and the Banque Worms, whose interests coincided most of the time. They still coincide today, for both banks are planning to establish an economic empire with ramifications all over Europe.

Pucheu himself served for a time as Minister of the Interior in the Vichy Cabinet. When it was reported recently that he had gone to North Africa to join Admiral Darlan, opposition to him in the American press was based exclusively on his activities in the Pétain government. It was recalled that he had acted in a ruthless fascist spirit, filling jails and concentration camps with men of democratic leanings. Pucheu's real significance, however, is not to be sought in his record as a terrorist. He was always an "economist" and never a politician; he entered the Vichy government only to reorganize the French police into a willing instrument of his economic plans. After having reshuffled the police to suit this aim, he decided to labor in a more fruitful field. He is personally responsible for most of the spectacular deals by which French stockholders were despoiled of their rights, among others that which transferred 51 per cent of the stock of practically all French chemical enterprises to I. G. Farben.

Another man of the Banque Worms, Jacques Guérard, a former inspecteur des finances like Baudoin, Barnaud, and Bouthillier, acted as personal secretary to Paul Baudoin during the first months of the Vichy regime. The two had been associated in former years at the Banque d'Indochine. When on May 11, 1941, Darlan went to see Hitler in Berchtesgaden, he promised the Führer that he would facilitate the passage of German troops and planes through Syria to Iraq and Iran, where Axis plotting had reached its height. On his return to Vichy Darlan dispatched Guérard to Syria to arrange with General

ERABUS

Admiral Darlan

Dentz, the French military commander, for the passage of Axis units. Guérard knew the conditions well in this region, having been financial adviser to the government of Iran. In June the Free French conquest of Syria drove him back to Vichy.

Some months later he turned up in Paris, and as a delegate of the Banque Worms organized there the subjection of all French insurance companies to German insurance firms. The event was announced in the French press as a "consolidation of the position of the French insurance companies, which will have in the future all the advantages of reinsurance with the powerful German firms."

Guérard is at present in Lisbon as Minister of France to Portugal. It was on his suggestion that Pucheu went to Lisbon. From this important European outpost, contacts can easily be maintained with diplomats of all nations, and communications between Lisbon and North Africa are excellent.

Flandin and Peyrouton, both old hands in French politics, deserve mention in connection with the deals referred to above because they helped in their accomplishment from behind the scenes. They were not members of the "inner circle" but were useful helpers on the political plane. Their roles were somewhat similar, Flandin serving as a right-wing and Peyrouton as a left-wing politician. Flandin's relations with the financial group date back several years. He has long been the most influential attorney of the Comité des Forges, the organization of steel manufacturers, which is one section of the larger organization of French heavy industry. Pucheu, in his capacity as manager of the Franco-German Siderurgical Office, was indirectly under the orders of the Comité des Forges. Though French industry in its totality was not subservient to German interests, the Comité itself was strongly under the influence of the Alsatian De Wendel family, which maintained through its German von Wendel branch close relations with the Bank Schröder and with various big industrialists of the Ruhr valley.

The cooperation of the leading members of the Comité des Forges was to be of great help in the execution of the various deals engineered by the Banque Worms. Flandin himself was occupied for many years with laying the political groundwork for these transactions. In his speeches he frequently mentioned "a system similar to Nazism or fascism" as a promising alternative to communism, and he carried on a persistent campaign in the Chamber of Deputies against any help to Czecho-Slovakia at the time of Germany's threat to the independence of that country. Since July, 1940, Flandin has been the most influential lobbyist for the Comité des Forges in Vichy.

Peyrouton, son-in-law of Malvy, the famous defeatist French politician who during the last war was convicted of having protected German spies, became Minister of the Interior in the Vichy government, and then was sent as ambassador to Buenos Aires, from which post he resigned recently because of his personal enmity to Laval. At present he is reported to have asked permission to go to North Africa to join Darlan.

Where does Admiral Darlan fit into this picture? During the last two years the "economists" of the Worms-Indochine group needed a strong man to carry through their plans with the utmost vigor. Laval, contrary to general belief, did not give sufficient help, at least during his first period of power, to the transfer of controlling stock ownership to the Germans. Though an outright fascist, ready for any slavish concession to the Nazis and happy whenever he could use his political influence to make a few hundred thousand francs in some petty deal, he was never part of the well-engineered plot of Pucheu, Barnaud et Cie. His arrangements were made with Otto Abetz and Ribbentrop and not with the financiers behind the scenes. Having been a lone wolf throughout his career, he acted as a free-lance political intrigant, without deep-reaching economic connections.

Until December, 1940, the "transformation" of French enterprises made slow headway. De Brinon applied all the pressure he could, but it was not enough to carry through a great many transactions quickly. Official decrees were needed to enforce the changes. Pétain would have been willing to sign them, but Laval, not disposed to facilitate deals to which he was not a partner, refused to let them go through.

It was then, in December, 1940, that Laval's removal was decided upon. In full agreement with Pucheu and Flandin, Peyrouton, then Minister of the Interior, organized the coup d'état against the recalcitrant vice-president. On February 9 Darlan became Foreign Minister, then successively acquired several other portfolios. On March 8, 1941, the New York Times announced: "Darlan Lays Basis of Collaboration. Reaches Agreement in Paris for Nazi Participation in French Key Industries."

Germans to Get Shares. Plan Already in Operation in News Agency [Havas], Some Banks, and Manufacturing Plants." This meant simply that henceforth private negotiations for the transfer of control to a Franco-German group would be superfluous. The procedure would be pushed through by means of governmental decrees. These decrees, signed by Pétain, in each case dismissed the old board of directors, appointed a new board, and increased the company's capital in order to enable the Franco-German group to obtain, at a nominal price, the new shares which represented control.

The Vichy correspondent of the New York Times described Darlan's policy as follows: "Mixed French and German control is expected to be introduced into numerous key companies of France, which will give the Reich authorities a say in all of the most important commercial and industrial enterprises here."

Darlan thus rendered an invaluable service to the German-French coalition which today controls all French economic life. Without him the transformation would have taken years. Today there is not a single French enterprise of any importance which has not been subjected to the simplified procedure organized by Darlan, chiefly in behalf of German heavy industry working with the Banque Worms group.

Up to the armistice Darlan was simply an ambitious "political admiral." He had spent most of his career as political secretary in the Ministry of the Navy, where he obtained quick advancement. Until June, 1940, Darlan does not seem to have had any close economic ties; he represented nobody but himself. Three days before Pétain's armistice broadcast he still favored the departure of the French government to North Africa to continue the fight from there. Two days later he declared loudly that any departure to Africa would be nonsensical. It was during these two days that the Worms group approached him and that they came to terms. Since that time Darlan has not been a free agent but has represented, though on a different level, the same economic interests as Pucheu and Baudoin.

Darlan decided to establish himself solidly as the chief henchman of the interests which he recognized, from June, 1940, on, as the most powerful in France. Being a good organizer, he did good work. He planted his own men in several key positions, especially in posts connected with the colonies, for the direction of which he had always had definite plans. At the beginning of the Vichy regime he exercised his influence over Admiral Le Barthe, his appointee to the post of Colonial Minister; later he designated Admiral Platon for the same post. Admiral Decoux, another Darlan man, signed the pact with the Japanese in Indo-China in July, 1940. Important economic arrangements between the Banque d'Indochine and Japan were the basis of this agreement.

Whatever has happened in Vichy on the political scene has been fireworks for the masses to cover up the economic transactions. Even the various fascist excesses had the same purpose. It is well known in France that the Cagoullards, who played an important part in the military collapse of France, were financed chiefly by Pucheu; Doriot and his Parti Populaire Français by Barnaud; and the Francistes of Bucard by Baudoin. Behind this fluid front the men who organized the economic deals have one continuing preoccupation—to insure the survival of their control in any eventuality, including a German defeat. The German bankers and industrialists, who are the chief beneficiaries of these transactions, and their French "junior partners" of the Banque Worms think exactly alike on this subject.

As long as German prospects for victory were bright, these Frenchmen had nothing to fear. Their position after the war would be sound and comfortable, even if inferior to that of their German senior partners. But when the tide began to turn, it became necessary to seek some form of insurance against disaster. Despite the legal forms that were observed in effecting the transfers, a post-war French government without any traces of Vichy would assuredly find ways to loosen the German economic grip on France, and the men who profited by that strangle-hold would go down to ruin. Clearly the greatest danger was not Germany's defeat but the possible recognition by the Allies of a really free French government.

It was probably to counter this threat that Admiral Darlan's trip to North Africa was decided upon. Pucheu, Flandin, Peyrouton can no more be regarded as rats fleeing the sinking ship than Darlan himself. These three men are in readiness—along with several others who have not yet been mentioned—to be called in by Darlan whenever he may think the moment has come to go a step farther on the path traced for him by this group. This path, they hope, will be marked by the following events: (1) acceptance by the Allies of a French government which in the military and political field will make promises to them but in the economic field will endeavor to keep intact the economic empire which the Germans, with their French associates, have established in France—with ramifications all over Europe; (2) peace proposals emanating from the same German economic group, possibly with a great number of concessions by the Germans in the political field. The purpose of this second move would be the definite stabilization throughout Europe of the German economic empire—with or without Hitler.

To accept the version that "Darlan represents only himself" is just as naive as to think that Hess represented only himself when he flew to England. During his career as a successful political admiral, Darlan learned that he could get much farther if he worked in close cooperation with powerful financial interests. Among the various French financial groups, he chose the one which resented Anglo-Saxon ideas of free economic exchanges and staked its future on Germany. He made this choice because he could observe the decisive influence of this group on French political history in recent years. He in his turn served it well; since 1940 he has contributed more than anybody else to the success of its ambitious plans.

Americans who today are offered facilities by Darlan for business deals in Africa should realize that these offers are not the prelude to the reestablishment in Darlan France of free economic exchanges of the Anglo-Saxon type. What Darlan offers them today is simply bait to induce them to accept a secondary role in the great German economic world-empire.

If Darlan is to be used, he should at least be used with open eyes.

Refugees: Burden or Asset?

BY KURT R. GROSSMANN

IN THE year 1797 the Honorable James Otis, Representative from Massachusetts, rose to express himself on the subject of immigrants. His speech was a warning against further unrestricted immigration. "When the country was new," he declared in 1797, "it might have been good policy to admit all. But it is so no longer." Twenty years passed. Then, in 1817, we find the Niles Register publishing the following warning: "The immigrants should press into the interior. In the present state of the times we seem too thick on the maritime frontier already." Although the predictions proved false, in 1835 there appeared a publication by S. E. Morse, "Imminent Dangers to the Free Institutions of the United States through Foreign Immigration," in which it was said: "Then we were few, feeble and scattered, now we are numerous, strong, and concentrated." The older immigrants feared the newcomers, and so it has continued to this day.

Nevertheless, it is plain from cold statistics that immigration has always been very far from the economic danger it is said to be. The usual arguments are that immigrants take jobs away from Americans and that they depress the standard of living. The truth is that throughout the period of mass immigration to the United States the number of jobs available constantly increased and economic life prospered; but when immigration declined, employment stagnated and economic crises developed. According to the United States Census of Manufacturers for 1938—surely an irreproachable source—7,700,000 immigrants entered the United States from 1899 to 1909. In the same period the number of jobs increased 40.4 per cent. In the following decade 6,600,000 immigrants entered; and the increase in jobs amounted to 35.9 per cent. The decade of 1919-29 is the decade of immigration restrictions—in 1924 the quota law was passed. Only 3,207,037 immigrants entered the country in that decade, and the number of jobs increased only 1.6 per cent. In the years 1929-35 America had more emigrants (64,905) than immigrants, and according to the United States Statistical Abstracts for 1938, employment openings in this period declined by about 17 per cent.

Today, although immigration has almost come to a standstill, although the war has produced a man-power problem which ought to encourage immigration, and although, according to Norman Angell's estimate, eight workers are necessary to make one soldier effective, an anti-immigration phobia has developed which bodes no good for the post-war world. Directed principally against refugees from Germany, this new wave of intolerance finds expression in such distorted thinking as Westbrook Pegler's contention that when the government says an employer must not discriminate against an applicant for work on the ground of race or religion, "we discard merit, ability, demeanor, and reliability as chief considerations and make race and religion the controllers." Going a step farther, Mr. Pegler urges that "the post-war period must see a clear demarcation between the rights of aliens and citizens."

Pegler is not the only one who takes this position. George E. Sokolsky has spoken of "the arrogant behavior of the refugees," and Ishbel Ross in her book "Isle of Escape" protests against the "dangerously lenient treatment of aliens by the government." The New York Daily News affirms that "the workers and farmers of the Atlantic seaboard area" hate the thought of Jews, Greeks, and other downtrodden people of Europe coming to America after the war is over. These assertions are only the prelude to a demand to close the country to a new immigration. What the realization of such a reactionary demand would mean politically need not be pointed out here. It would be the end of the ideas expressed in the Atlantic Charter.

What is the true picture of refugee immigration today? Have these wretched exiles really overrun the United States, taken away jobs from native Americans, and avoided military service? Here again, figures are readily available to all who want the truth.

In the period from July 1, 1932, to June 30, 1942, the number of immigrants admissible under the quota laws was 259,570 for Germany, 14,130 for Austria, and 28,740 for Czecho-Slovakia—a total of 302,440. During this period the number of Jews admitted from the three countries was 165,015, of whom about 12,200 entered in the last year. Since some 30,000 persons returned to Germany, the quota exceeded the number of Jewish immigrants by 167,425. The number of non-Jews entering the United States from the three countries in the same period has been estimated by William Rosenwald, chairman of the National Refugee Service, at 48,000. Another group that entered the country on visitors' visas and hence did not come under the immigration laws contained not more than 3,500 persons, Jews and non-Jews. The total of 216,515 persons (including children) from the three countries can hardly be considered extraordinary in view of the tragic situation of millions of Europeans. All who came to this country have satisfied the constantly tightened requirements regarding financial, political, and moral guaranties.

The occupational classification of Jews admitted up to June 30, 1941, is given in the following table:

	Number	Percentage
Professional .....	13,377	8.8
Commercial .....	29,229	19.4
Skilled .....	18,987	11.9
Servants .....	3,937	2.6
Laborers .....	819	0.6
Miscellaneous .....	2,761	1.9
Without occupation* ....	83,705	54.8
Total .....	152,815	100

* Including women and children.

For the age distribution, I give the figures for the quota years 1940 and 1941:

Age Group	1940		1941
	Number	Percentage	Number	Percentage
Under 11 years..	3,058	8.3	2,142	9.1
11-20    " ..	5,681	15.2	3,210	13.5
21-30    " ..	5,491	14.8	3,163	13.3
31-40    " ..	7,925	21.5	4,977	20.9
41-50    " ..	7,004	18.9	4,644	19.6
51-60    " ..	4,667	12.8	3,424	14.4
Over 60   " ..	3,119	8.5	2,177	9.2
Total .....	36,945	100	23,737	100

Of the total of 152,815 Jews admitted up to June 30, 1941, 47.7 per cent were men and 52.3 per cent women. That gives us 72,888 men, of whom some 42 per cent, or 31,113, were subject to military service (up to forty-four years). If we add the estimated 12,600 men, Jews and non-Jews, who came here after 1941, we find that the refugees represent a maximum reservoir for military service of 43,713, of whom at least 4,000, or 10 per cent, are already in the army. This computation does not take into account the lower average standard of health among the immigrants or the fact that the induction of every enemy alien has to be approved by the War Department. Many Czech Jews volunteered in Canada long before Pearl Harbor.

As for the economic value of the refugees, we have important material on the subject in a study carried out by the Committee for Selected Studies at the suggestion of Eleanor Roosevelt. This study, published by the Columbia University press under the title "Refugees at Work," covers 150,000 immigrants who came to this country in the quota years 1933-41. Their distribution at the close of that period is shown in the table below, and we may assume that it remains the same today, except for minor changes.

State	Percentage	State	Percentage
New York*	50	Massachusetts	4
California	8	Ohio	2.5
New Jersey	4	Texas	2
Michigan	4	All other states...	21.5
Pennsylvania	4

* 43.35 per cent in New York City alone.

A recent magazine article entitled Refugee Gold Rush* asserted that the refugees have brought into the country the fantastic sum of five billion dollars. But the figures of the Foreign Property Control show that, exclusive of the capital of a few rich immigrants, a maximum of one and a half billion dollars has been brought in since 1933. This is a small percentage of the total national income of seventy-five to one hundred billion dollars a year.

In actual fact refugee capital is put to work in American industry or disbursed by the refugees' families to satisfy their needs. In New York City the newcomers have created hundreds of new industries. Of the 829 concerns investigated by the Committee for Selected Studies, 114 employ only members of the owner's family; the other 715 have 9,000 employees, of whom 6,000 are American citizens. The committee report shows that, on the average, one so-called refugee concern gives work to seven Americans. Three hundred and six of the refugee firms investigated carry on their former work; 150 have brought new trades to the United States and sell articles which formerly had to be imported, such as fine leather goods, gloves, perfumes, Karlsbad wafers, Viennese knitted goods. Of the 306 firms referred to above, 60, at the time the report was issued, were already producing articles important to the war. In 1937 the United States imported $10,000,000 worth of gloves. Through the establishment of refugee factories in New York and Chicago and on the West Coast, we can in the future supply our own needs in this field. Diamond cutters have transferred their businesses, together with their machines and their special skills, from Belgium and Holland to the United States. A number of small diamond-cutting shops are now to be found along Seventh Avenue in New York City, and many Americans are employed in this new industry at good wages. Large amounts of the refugees' money are invested in war bonds. The New York Times of June 16, in a report on the work of the Minute Men, announced: "In Washington Heights Minute Men and Minute Women reported 100 per cent results, particularly among the many refugees who live in that quarter."

Competition for jobs between refugees and Americans is not a serious problem today when fresh sources of man-power are constantly needed. Many refugees are active in defense industries, where they are certainly more reliable employees than Bundists, even though the latter may have American citizenship papers. Through reeducation courses many have prepared themselves for manual trades. A table showing the occupational classification today would be very different from that given above. Hundreds of former shopkeepers are now standing at the turning-lathe.

The authors of "Refugees at Work" could not take these recent developments into account, but they came nevertheless to the following conclusion:

On the basis of the facts noted above, it is clear that among the estimated 35,000 refugee workers in New York City . . . in 1940, there is very little likelihood of displacement of American workers. Refugee entrepreneurs have not engaged to any considerable degree in the large manufacturing industries. Although some refugee concerns have introduced new products and developed new patents and processes which have opened up some markets new to America, they have not to any appreciable degree offered competition to already established New York business enterprises. . . . Thus the question of the displacement of Americans by refugees is largely hypothetical. It has a psychological basis.

An unemployed and impoverished body of immigrants would of course be harmful to the country, but the immigrants who have escaped to America from Hitler's Germany represent excellent human material with which to secure the American way of life. They are the implacable foes of fascism. Is that, perhaps, the reason that they are so much disliked by the potential allies of fascism?

Darlanism and Britain

[The censorship has never permitted the full story of the British reaction to the Darlan deal to be told in America. Opposition was general and, particularly in the left press, brutally outspoken. Brief references and short quotations were transmitted, but full texts were held up, even in the mails. The following editorial, which appeared in the independent left weekly Tribune, on November 20, was one of the censored articles. Even the title was considered unsafe for American ears. The copy in which it appeared has just arrived in the United States. In subsequent issues the Political War section will reproduce other examples of British press opinion on developments on the political front.]

The Whole Dirty Story

THIS paper has bent its energies to the successful prosecution of the war from the day this country took up the struggle against Nazism. Not for one day has it swerved from this cause. It fought for it. It convinced those who were skeptical of the imperialist leaders of what we called a war of the people.

For this same cause Tribune today lays bare the whole shabby story which has led to the appointment and recognition of Darlan.

We are not impressed by President Roosevelt's assurances. All they say, in effect, is that the Darlan regime will not be guaranteed in permanence in the manner in which the Foreign Office has insured the territories of General Franco. President Roosevelt has said the present arrangement is a temporary expedient. But how temporary and how expedient? President Roosevelt has said that he will insist on the liberation of all those imprisoned for "having fought against the Nazis." Does this include the thousands who fought the Nazis by fighting Darlan and Vichy and who rot now in the horrible prisons of North Africa? Does this include the 15,000 Republican Spaniards who have existed in a Saharan concentration camp for four ghastly years? Or will they have to continue their travails to prove our good-will to General Franco? No, President Roosevelt has only postponed the great decision. He has not changed the evil situation in North Africa.

AMERICA AND VICHY

What happened in Algiers was not the product of a military decision made by a soldier in the stress of battle. That is nonsense and untrue. The State Department in Washington—the United States Foreign Office—played ball with Vichy from the day of its inception to the day of its transplantation from Vichy to Algiers. It was also actively hostile to the Free French movement, and the official American consuls and representatives in Marseilles, Vichy, Lyons, and Madrid were among the worst opponents of the underground freedom movement.

In the meantime Admiral Leahy, the United States ambassador, remained on friendly terms with the old Marshal and the members of his government, among whom was the Minister of Defense, Admiral Darlan. In the spring of the year Admiral Leahy was recalled from Vichy and became the President's strategic adviser. In the light of subsequent events the appointment is highly significant.

Then during the summer the North African campaign was decided on. Apparently it was decided to leave the political warfare attendant on this plan to the military authorities who were concerned in it and to the "expert" on this territory, Admiral Leahy. From that moment onward, the cause for which thousands were giving their lives, and many more their energies and hopes, was quietly shelved.

In place of the Charter and the Four Freedoms, in place of the revolutionary appeals of the American leaders, in place of the exhortation by Allied radios and agents, there came Mr. Pat Murphy.* Mr. Murphy was a kind of diplomatic representative of the United States government in Algiers. He started talks with General Noguès, the Governor General of Morocco, and with many other military and civil representatives of Vichy in North Africa. The Germans heard of this soon enough, and a fierce campaign was developed demanding the recall of Noguès. Then Darlan went on a tour to West Africa and made speeches emphasizing Vichy's determination to resist and attack. Suddenly the Germans declared themselves satisfied with Noguès. Admiral Darlan returned to Vichy.

By this time the arrival of a vast convoy of warships and transports in Gibraltar was public knowledge. So was its departure eastward. Neither Vichy nor the Germans can have had any doubt by now as to what was impending. The Americans landed after a sort of token resistance by French marines. Admiral Darlan arrived in Algiers. He was taken prisoner and reappeared next morning in control of the military and civil administration of North Africa. Noguès followed, and the Allied-controlled Algiers radio began to broadcast in the name * Obviously a reference to Robert D. Murphy, former Counselor of the American Embassy in Vichy, who became Consul General at Algiers when the program of sending supplies to French North Africa was inaugurated by the State Department.

From "Tribune"

of Darlan and Pétain. The State Department's political warfare had reached the point of consummation.

It does not look like a temporary expedient. It fits in rather with Mr. Sumner Welles's words to a British diplomat some months ago and reported in Tribune at that time. He was of the opinion that what France needed more than anything was a strong government which would avoid internal chaos after the war. He thought that the best manner of achieving this would be in a union of Pétain, Weygand, and De Gaulle which could avoid a radical solution of the French problem.

LOWEST FORM OF LIFE

Parallel with the negotiations with Darlan and Noguès in Africa, it seems negotiations were also going on with men like Flandin, Pucheu, and Peyrouton, men who make up the lowest form of life in Vichy France. All three were "peace-at-any-price" men before the war. Pucheu was a Cagoulard and a member of Doriot's party, and he was generally described as the Himmler of Vichy France during his tenure as Minister of the Interior under Darlan. He is one of Darlan's friends and his right-hand man. Peyrouton shares the dubious honor of claiming inside France a similar reputation to Pucheu. As for Flandin, this one-time reputed friend of Britain is one of the chief architects of France's defeat. These three are all reported to be in Algiers with the Admiral. They could not have got there without previous connivance and assistance from the American authorities.

Now sit back for a moment and let us consider these new friends of the Allied cause of freedom and democracy. Let us inspect Admiral Darlan as the most important convert.

His record since the armistice is remembered in France if not in Washington: his ruthless handling of all officers and men of the navy who were not 100 per cent loyal to Vichy; the arrest of thousands of opponents of the Darlan-Pétain regime in France and in North Africa; his treatment of the interned Spaniards, Germans, and Russians. But all this pales against the background of his international collaboration with the Nazis. It was Darlan who organized a common espionage system with the Axis in the Balkans. It was Darlan who ordered the Vichy marine attaché in Ankara to be second to Admiral Schuster in Sofia. Schuster was nominally in command of the Nazi Black Sea fleet and closely connected with the Nazi intelligence organization in the Balkans and Turkey. It is Darlan who was making appointments in his administration.

We were told last week that if Paris was worth a mass to Louis XIV, then the French fleet was worth collaboration with Darlan. But surely Darlan has been behaving strangely these last two years if all the time he meant to bring the fleet over to the Allies.

We will go so far as to say that Admiral Darlan never was in a position to bring over the fleet at any time during the past two weeks and that his broadcast calling on the fleet to sail was sheer dishonest bluff to fool the Allied people. It never fooled the Germans, and it could not help the unfortunate French sailors in Toulon.

These ships, which were under the Admiral's command, were in no condition to sail. They had no anti-aircraft protection and no submarine equipment. Both had been removed on orders from the Admiral or his subordinates. Personnel essential to get the fleet had been detained or arrested, again on the Admiral's orders. The fleet could not even get going to scuttle itself at sea. What sort of impression of Allied competence these French naval officers and ratings must have received from the Darlan broadcast can well be imagined. It was not surprising that Abetz, Hitler's envoy, expressed the opinion in 1941 that Darlan was the ideal person to be made chief of all European navies as counterpart to Göring as chief of all air forces.

OUR NIGHTMARE ALLIES

This is largely American doing, and we are glad to see that in the polite language of diplomacy the Foreign Office and the British government have expressed their concern at this policy. They can rest assured that on this issue at least they will be speaking for all people in this country and for millions who are praying in Europe that they will wake up tomorrow and find that the story that Darlan, Flandin and Company have joined the Allies is nothing but a wicked nightmare. Even the fact that General Giraud is commander-in-chief is more likely to compromise this soldier than legitimize Admiral Darlan in the eyes of the people of France.

We come now to the crucial question. Was the enrolment of Darlan really a military necessity? We have exploded the story of the fleet. We think there is very little more substance in that of the time factor, which has now taken the place of the fleet. Again let us speak frankly. Elsewhere in this issue we quote opinions of the underground French movement on Messrs. Darlan and Company. The North African setup has always been as near to a fascist setup as anything in pre-war France. The army was notoriously reactionary, particularly in the Popular Front days. It is already attracting the worst type of political reactionary to its colors. The generals without exception are reactionary, anti-democratic, and monarchist. The native soldiery is unpolitical and will do what it is told; once before the Moors were brought across from Africa to stifle a popular government. The French have not forgotten Franco and his Moors. The recognition of Darlan—however temporary—must have shocked the growing opposition in France. It must have broken many a fine fighter's heart, and, what is more, it must have again given [support to] the still widely held belief of perfidie Albion breaking its pledges once more.

Military expediency without principles is the road to confusion and disaster. What is expedient in North Africa today may be inexpedient to undo next week, next month, or next year. We did not need an American expeditionary force to tell us that it is cheaper to compromise with an enemy than to fight him. That policy the people of this country rejected in 1939 and they reject it equally today.

This is more than an issue between Darlan and the Allies. It shows the way conservative minds work and the way they set the military and diplomatic machines going which they control. As against this, General de Gaulle has issued a firm and dignified proclamation refusing to have any truck with this dirty new deal.

His views will be indorsed throughout France—throughout the free world except in those circles which have shunned the open light during the years of crisis and are now reappearing, hoping to reestablish the old order of privilege with the help of Darlans everywhere.

They will be mistaken, we think. Parliament and the people have the immediate task of repudiating the action of generals and diplomats in flat contradiction to the principle for which we have gone to war. Thousands have gone to their death that this shall not happen. It must not happen.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

AMONG the memories of the last war, one which has remained very vivid for Germans is of the worthlessness of their allies. "We have too poor allies," was the general complaint from the beginning of 1915 on. And in the end this opinion, passed down by word of mouth and even taught in the schools, was accepted as definitive. That Germany's allies did more harm than good became, one might say, the official view. They fought so badly that they were always needing help, and they had no moral stamina: Germany's collapse was finally brought about by the capitulation of first Bulgaria, then Turkey, then Austria-Hungary. In the Hitler era this impression was deepened by the myth which ascribed unique capacities to the German race. When the present war broke out, therefore, a certain skepticism about allies, even about the other member of the Axis, was latent in the German mind. Dozens of jokes circulating about the Italians show that the Germans were always inclined to rate them as worthless in the field and that they fear still more unpleasant surprises from them.

Various convincing signs now tell us that German distrust of the Italians has been sharply accentuated in the past few weeks. Moreover, it is clear that this access of gloom is connected with the British-American moral offensive against Mussolini; it became especially noticeable after Churchill's last speech. Incidentally, the German reaction provides proof that no people can be completely shut off from the outside world—not, at any rate, as long as the London radio can be heard so easily. Even news of proposals which have not materialized into overt acts trickles through. When some speech of a foreign statesman or some project of a foreign government touches Germans at a sensitive point, it soon becomes generally known and produces an effect. The best evidence of this is the reaction of the propaganda office.

In the matter of the Italians, the Berlin propaganda heads reacted at once and loudly. They evidently decided the customary method of belittling a fact by ignoring it would not work, and they let loose an avalanche of praise for Italian strength and determination. During the first week of December the domestic radio broadcast five scripts extolling the spirit and accomplishments of the Italians; during the second week, seventy-three. Ten times a day, in every imaginable connection, Italy was eulogized—"its profound unity with Germany, its steely calm and undaunted will to battle."

And that was not all. The big names in propaganda, one after the other, spoke to the people specifically about the current attempt to induce the Italians to quit the war. The high points of the campaign were an address by the radio oracle Hans Fritsch on December 3 and an article by Goebbels in the Reich of December 11. In between, stars of the second and third magnitude played variations on the theme. All made the greatest effort to convince their public that absolutely nothing was to be feared in Italy or from Italy. Italy stands firm! In Goebbels's words:

Mr. Churchill does not seem to have grasped that this time all seductive wiles will fail with us. At regular intervals, through British propaganda agents or in person, he addresses one of the peoples of the Axis, trying by brazen words or an infamous campaign of rumors and lies to entice them into deserting their leaders. Last winter he selected us as his victim. Now it is the turn of our Italian allies. In his last speech the Duce gave him an answer which left nothing in doubt. Morally, it stripped Mr. Churchill bare. . . . He may twist and turn, he may don the mask of an honest man, or of a champion of humanitarian ideals, or of a benefactor of mankind, or of a social reformer, we shall see to it that the gallery will greet him not with applause but with piercing whistles. While he imagines that he inspires his audience with awe, in reality it breaks into shrieks of laughter. Only halfwits fall for him.

The guaranty that the Italians will not succumb to these seductions, according to Herr Fritsch, lies in the fact that they, like their German comrades, have gradually learned to know the English. They know that Churchill is "one huge bundle of lies." They are well armed against "English attempts to split the forces of the enemy by hoary methods, methods which apparently came into the world with the first Englishman." Moreover, the Italians no longer listen to the enemy radio, the transmitter of these attempts. They simply never hear it. Like the Germans, like all good Germans, that is, they despise the air waves from London. "During this war only very small groups in the Axis countries listen—groups on which we have never counted, whose members have no sense of national honor and do not see any disgrace even in war time in lending a willing ear to the whispers of the enemy. They play no role whatever in our war effort." Don't worry, Germans; we can depend on Italy!

Every time an especially intensive campaign to "enlighten the people" is inaugurated, one may infer the presence of a corresponding amount of unrest. The German officials who build morale have done the best they could with the military situation. Their statement that the Fortress of Europe is still intact is true; even the attacks in the east have not yet shaken it. And there is a certain plausibility in their presentation of North Africa as merely the "glacis of the fortress"; hence the clashes there can have only secondary importance. However, the superficial correctness of this version of recent events does not blind those inside the fortress to the serious developments behind its walls. Now, in addition to their former troubles, they have this worry about the Italians.

The Germans have long had a more sharply defined conception of Italians than of any other nation. Ever since the break-up of the old Triple Alliance in 1914, they have thought of the Italians as a faithless people. When German speech fanatics in 1915 offered a prize for the best translation of "macaroni" the award was won by "perfidy noodles"—and grotesque as it may seem, macaroni appeared under this name for a long time on the menus of many restaurants. All Hitler's propaganda cannot root out the German conviction that Italy is a land of congenital betrayers.

The English and American political offensive against Italy, worth-while as it is in itself, acquires additional value from its effect on the Germans. We can imagine little knots of people gathering to discuss their somber affairs and the effect on them when someone suddenly asks, "And when are the Italians going to desert us?"

Radio Falange

A CORRESPONDENT writes us: "You are always talking about the Spanish radio and its pro-Axis broadcasting. But you have never produced a single quotation. We do not want empty references but proof." Here is proof:

On November 3, speaking of the Atlantic Charter, Radio Falange Valladolid said:

Wars have never been won by speeches and letters. Let them write as many letters as they please. In the meantime, a strong and united side is ending the enslavement of Stalin's people.

On November 23 Radio Valladolid commented prominently on a manifesto addressed to the French "government" by all the extreme reactionary parties demanding war on England and America:

We will only say that the differences between the Americans and the British in North Africa, and between the different brands of French traitors, are growing. . . . On the other hand, each day the unity between all Frenchmen worthy of the name is becoming more marked. They are uniting behind Pétain, who in these critical hours has adopted the only attitude which will save his country.

On December 11 a commentator on Radio Coruña made the following comment on the views of Assistant Secretary of State Sumner Welles:

Sumner Welles tells us that the main freedoms of this world are freedom of speech and religion. Freedom of religion means in Europe that the Jews will come again to take back their positions . . . followed by a train of misery, exploitation, and crime. Freedom of speech is not unknown to us. . . . We Spaniards know that democracy is known by the name of republic, and republic means atheism, robbery . . . murder by the roadside, rape, terror, and anguish. . . . We are not interested in the paradise which Sumner Welles offers to the world. . . . It is very dear for Spain, the price which Sumner Welles puts on a military victory for the United Nations.

Also on December 11 Radio Nacional Barcelona and Radio Burgos both broadcast this opinion of American war aims:

American expansion . . . seems to aim at making the Atlantic an American sea. To achieve this, Americans are sending forces step by step into the African continent. At the same time they hope to establish in the Far East a sort of Federation of Asiatic States which they would perhaps dominate economically as they dominate South America today.

Of course our correspondent may say what various British and American commentators said of Franco's last speech: "Mere lip-service to Hitler." And he may not declare himself convinced until Radio Falange provides the final proof by hailing the march of Hitler's divisions across the Spanish frontier.

U-Boats and Empty Bottles

BY HOWARD CLARKE

WE WERE tied up at the docks in San Francisco. It was coffee-time, and some of us in the crew were sitting on the bench outside the galley watching the stevedores load the after hatches.

"We're going to Honolulu again this time," remarked Joe, a water-tender sitting next to me.

"How d'you know?" asked Murphy, the wiper on Joe's watch. It was Murphy's first trip since the war.

"Can't you read?" replied Joe. "It's got Honolulu written all over the cargo boxes."

That is about the only way we crew members know where we are headed for. And that is the way the enemy knows lots of times, too. Their agents can read just as well as we can.

We were taking on onions this trip—tons of them. Honolulu had been without onions, besides a number of other things, for some months. I knew because a girl friend in Honolulu had begged me to pinch a couple from our galley for her on a previous trip. That had been two months after December 7. How they would go for those onions, I thought, as I watched the sling-loads disappear into the hatches.

We arrived in Honolulu early in the morning. The longshoremen swarmed up the gangway—Hawaiians, Koreans, Chinese, Portuguese, a few whites, and even some Japanese. It seemed strange to find Japanese working on the docks and ships, but these were born in Hawaii and were American citizens. Very few have been evacuated, for most of them have proved to be loyal, and also they are essential to defense work.

A Hawaiian winch-operator coming on board asked us what our cargo was.

"Mostly onions," we told him.

His face broke out in a wide Hawaiian grin. "That's going to make it even worse than last week," he said.

It wasn't long before everybody coming on the ship was telling us about the onion situation in Honolulu. Hawaii has never grown anything much except sugar and pineapples. When the blitz came, the army took over. Everything was run "by order of the military governor," but even he couldn't do anything about the immediate shortage of onions. With their water content, onions take up a lot of shipping space. And there was no shipping space to spare because Hawaii needed more guns, tanks, ammunition, and construction materials right off.

Nevertheless, the military went into action with a long view. Why not grow onions in Hawaii? They exhorted farmers, especially on the fertile island of Maui, to do so. Seed was planted, the onions thrived, and then came the harvest. Thousands of pounds were gathered on Maui to be shipped across to the city of Honolulu. But a Colonel Blimp had bungled. Contracts for tons of onions had been given to California growers. A week before our arrival a convoy had brought in a shipment from San Francisco, and here we were with still more! Jap submarines had been chasing us and those onions for two thousand miles; yet only fifty miles away from Honolulu onions were rotting on the Maui docks.

The Maui onion growers were mad. Other growers who had planted potatoes, celery, tomatoes at the urgent request of the military wondered whether similar imports wouldn't destroy the value of their harvests. Protests went to Washington through Hawaii's Delegate, Sam King. He introduced a bill to reimburse the Maui growers, but the money isn't the only thing. A chill was cast over the future of all diversified farming in Hawaii.

It wasn't until we got back to San Francisco that we heard about the Guadalcanal cabbages. The crew of the ship that had carried them bounced their beer glasses on the bars along San Francisco's Embarcadero and were plenty mad. They had dragged cabbages from San Francisco to the Solomons to find that one of Australia's biggest vegetable crops happens to be cabbages. On top of that, they had carried fresh cabbages. And the crew had learned that cabbages can easily be dehydrated for shipping and will then take up only a fraction of their original bulk. Even the bartenders tried to clean up their patrons' language a bit. We sympathized with them about their cabbages and told them about our onions. As yet we hadn't faced the bottle situation.

The cargo for our next trip to Honolulu was a "general cargo"—odds and ends. Cases of beer labeled "For Emergency Use Only" swung over the side. That's O. K., we thought. After all, we prefer mainland beer to the local brews in Honolulu. Cases of water chestnuts took more explaining. But if they wanted water chestnuts for their chop suey and couldn't get them any more from China, it was all right with us. The cases of canned shoestring potatoes brought some comment from the stewards' department. But then came the bottles—thousands of them. For hours the men and machines labored away to hoist and lower them into the hatches. And every bottle was empty.

That was what burned up the crew. We sailed importantly out of the Golden Gate under a rapid fire of cynical remarks about the valuable cargo of beer, shoestring potatoes, and empty bottles we were rushing to the Pacific war zone.

It seems that when people in Honolulu mixed their highballs they used to throw away their soda and gingerale bottles. There was plenty of "mix" and carbonating equipment in the Islands, but a shortage of bottles. We were rushing them a replenishing supply, with the aid of battle convoy, degaussing machinery, navy gun crew, anti-aircraft batteries, a three-incher back aft, and an enraged crew.

As the military had issued orders forbidding any union meetings to be held on board ship, no formal protests could be drawn up by the three separate unions governing the deck, "black gang," and stewards' departments. Once we were back again in San Francisco, complaints were lodged with the proper authorities, as had been done by the Guadalcanal cabbage crew. Then it was our turn to bounce beer glasses on the Embarcadero bars, and fill the air with colorful language.

The crew doesn't always have a "beef" about the cargo. In peace time the crew doesn't care what the cargo is unless it is a fire hazard or has a pretty bad smell like raw sugar or copra. But in these days the crews are very much interested in winning the war, and soon.

On one trip we loaded almost nothing but combat equipment—jeeps, trucks, crated airplane parts, and the like. When the loading started, the gangplank was at a sharp angle, but as the days went by it flattened out more and more until finally it slanted down to the deck of the ship. She was loaded far above the Plimsoll line. But there wasn't a complaint out of anyone. We all knew the stuff was really needed, and if they could load it on, by God, we could take it there. We sailed through the Golden Gate that time with the water only a very few inches from the deck of the ship. A really good blow and the whole thing would have foundered. But the crew's morale was very different from what it had been the day we sailed with several thousand empty bottles under our feet.

The Navy at Its Best

BY DONALD W. MITCHELL

DETAILS of the Fifth Battle of the Solomons present a picture of the United States navy at its best. The rout of Japan's invasion force was a defensive masterpiece and one of the most brilliant victories in modern naval history.

Shortly after one o'clock on the morning of November 13 the Japanese fleet approached at full speed from behind Savo Island, steaming in a three-column arrangement which gave the appearance of a circle. It was thoroughly prepared to undertake the bombardment of shore defenses preliminary to landing troops, although previous Japanese aerial attacks had proved ineffectual both in softening up American shore defenses and in inflicting damage on surface warships. Of the three air clashes, one had been with green American fliers, in which the damage done was about equal, a second had resulted in a bad defeat for the Japanese, and a last attempt had been disastrous, only one of more than thirty Zeros and bombers having escaped destruction.

Until the end of the war it is unlikely that anyone will know with certainty the exact strength of the Japanese attacking force. Preliminary scouting reports put it at two battle cruisers of the Kongo class, two heavy cruisers, four light cruisers, and ten destroyers. It was probably larger, for shore observers counted twenty-six silhouettes, and more than two heavy cruisers were referred to in accounts of the battle. Two more heavy cruisers and six destroyers may have been the remaining components. Steaming into close range to oppose this formation came the two heavy cruisers, three light cruisers, and eight destroyers of Admiral Callaghan. Assuming that the ships engaged were the largest of their class available in either navy, the Japanese had a superiority in tonnage of over two and one-half to one and in gun-power of more than four to one. And even this is not a fair comparison, since the heavy armor of the Japanese battle cruisers should have enabled either one to vanquish unaided a force several times as big as the American cruiser and destroyer squadron. In the only two modern sea battles exhibiting the slightest similarity, those of Helgoland Bight and the Falklands in the First World War, the weaker fleet was destroyed in its entirety without loss to the victor. A similar ending could normally have been expected here.

But the conditions of the battle were not normal; they were extraordinary; and the Americans took full advantage of them. In the first place, the Japanese, not expecting attack, had their guns loaded with high-explosive rather than armor-piercing shells. Again, Admiral Callaghan's force appeared so quickly and at such point-blank range that the guns of the battle cruisers could not be depressed enough to make hits around the water line. Thirdly, the unorthodox tactics of the American commander in leading his ships between two of the enemy lines and very close to one placed the Japanese in the embarrassing position of being unsure of the identity of friend and foe. Some of the Japanese ships found their fire blanketed at intervals by others, and one line was in constant danger of shooting into its own ships. The close-bunched American line in the midst of a greatly more numerous foe could assume that all other ships were unfriendly and suffered no such handicap.

The unexpectedness and incredible boldness of the American maneuver gave it its chance of success. Led by the San Francisco, the American ships swung into quick action and sank a heavy cruiser and a destroyer almost before the Japanese realized they were in a fight; at a range of a little more than a mile the San Francisco scored fourteen eight-inch hits on one of the battle cruisers—well-placed blows which silenced her batteries and left her a crippled hulk for planes to finish. That the Japanese were by no means asleep is shown by the quickness with which they hit back at the leading American ship. Admiral Callaghan and Captain Young were killed on the San Francisco's bridge a minute or two after the opening of the battle. The Americans took terrific punishment—after thirty minutes nine of the thirteen ships in the task force had received a death blow—but the losses of the overwhelmingly superior enemy fleet were much heavier. First the American ships, then the Japanese, withdrew, the latter firing at each other for some time after their enemy had left the scene.

With the coming of daylight our planes finished the job by sinking the crippled enemy ships. Despite their defeat, the Japanese tried doggedly to carry through the rest of their program. On the fourteenth eight of twelve enemy transports were sunk by American planes with tremendous loss of life. That night the escorting force of four battleships, accompanied by other vessels, met a somewhat smaller but powerful American fleet under Admiral Willis Lee and was driven back with the loss of three ships, though the silence of the navy regarding this battle probably indicates heavy American casualties. The remaining four troopships made an appearance on the morning of the fifteenth and were pounced upon by defending air forces.

The engagements of November 11-15 were glorious but not decisive. The Japanese resumed attempts to smuggle small forces into Guadalcanal by night less than ten days later. The American victories were achieved by better scouting and intelligence work, excellent use of air power, and fine coordination between the services. They answer a number of doubts. Callaghan and Young died as all good officers would prefer to die. They now join the naval immortals, and their ship, the San Francisco, takes its place in the company of the Constitution, the Bonhomme Richard, and Nelson's Victory.

The Railroads Outflanked

BLITHELY forging ahead toward a goal of the greatest net profits in their history, the railroads have suddenly found themselves threatened by a dangerous pincers movement. On one flank the OPA has attacked with a petition to the Interstate Commerce Commission asking for a cancelation of freight and passenger rate increases granted last spring; on the other, the unions have put in a demand for wage increases which, if granted, would cost the roads more than half this year's net earnings. Unhappily for the railroads, they cannot meet this double menace by playing one opponent against the other. If they tell the unions they would like to oblige but cannot do so owing to the prospect of reduced rates, they will play into the hands of the OPA. But neither can they tell the OPA that they are unable to stand a rate cut in view of labor demands, for that would weaken their hands in the wage negotiations.

The railroads might find more public sympathy for their plight if they had not, in their eagerness to grasp all the profit that war-time traffic could bear, blindly maneuvered themselves into an indefensible position. A year ago, after agreeing to pay increased wages amounting to $312,000,000, the railroad companies asked for increases in rates that would more than cover this sum. In putting forward their plea, they based their estimates of the additional revenue required on 1941 traffics, ignoring the obvious fact that 1942 would see an enormous increase in the movement of both passengers and freight. Writing on this page on February 21, I pointed to some of the indications of swelling railroad business and commented: "Provided that the ICC complies with the railroads' request for higher freight rates and thus takes care of their increased wage and other costs, profits will surely make another leap forward."

Despite OPA protests the ICC did in fact give the railroads nearly all they asked for by allowing a 10 per cent increase in passenger fares and an average increase of about 6 per cent in freight rates. The financial results for the year now closing show how little the additional revenue was needed to keep the roads in the black. Although tax accruals have doubled, 1942 net profits are estimated at around $900,000,000 compared with $500,000,000 in 1941, and with a further increase of 15 per cent in traffics expected next year, there would seem to be room for concessions either to the customers or to the workers or both.

In the answer they have filed replying to the OPA petition, the railroads, unable to plead poverty, attempt to confuse the issues with statistical double-talk. They say that wage increases have cost them $397,000,000 during 1942, while other operating expenses have risen by $110,000,000. Against these added charges the increase in rates would have produced only $357,000,000 had they been in effect for the full year. Moreover, they claim that they have made voluntary rate reductions on petroleum moving to the East Coast and in fares for members of the armed services traveling on furlough which together total $228,000,000.

This reply seems impressive until it is remembered that, although total operating expenses have risen, gross operating revenues have risen still more sharply thanks to an estimated increase in freight traffic of about 32 per cent and in passenger mileage of 75 per cent. The exigencies of war are making it possible to operate the railroads at somewhere near capacity, while the rates charged for their services are designed to permit profits when operations are well below capacity. In mass transportation as in mass production the fuller the use of the plant the lower the burden of overhead charges, and for the railroads, with so much of their capital in the form of bonded debt, overhead charges account for an exceptionally high proportion of total expenses.

The OPA in its petition to the ICC stressed the inflationary effect of high transport rates. Defenders of the railroads, on the other hand, urge that lower passenger rates will induce more travel, which is just what the Office of Defense Transport is seeking to discourage owing to the existing congestion. It seems unlikely that much of the present record passenger traffic can be ascribed to traveling purely for pleasure; nor is it probable that a 10 per cent cut in fares would increase it. The discomfort of journeys by rail under present circumstances is enough to discourage pleasure seekers. Most of the additional passengers are undoubtedly either service men or war workers, enormous numbers of whom must now commute to and from their jobs. Railroad fares are an item in their cost of living which cannot be dismissed as trifling. But a reduction in freight rates is of even greater importance. Many retail prices which are threatening to burst through their ceilings might be held in line if transport charges were trimmed.

Reluctant as they are to discuss the connection of rates with inflation, the railroads are quite ready to urge its dangers as a means of repelling attack by the unions. In order to stress this point they are proposing that wage demands should be submitted to the War Labor Board, which would be more likely to consider the effects on the whole labor picture of an increase in rail wages than would a special labor tribunal. However disingenuous, this proposal is not without merit, especially since the railwaymen's demands—a 30 per cent increase in the case of the operating unions—would, if granted, prove a very disturbing influence on wage stabilization.

FINANCIAL CANDOR: "The politically important fact, the one which can be sold to the people to prove that there is no profiteering by corporations, is that excess profits are taxed at 90 per cent. The details by which that figure is reduced to 80 per cent net, and then again is cut to 71 per cent by the post-war credit, are too technical to be useful in politics." From Barron's, the business weekly, December 14.

FROM THE LONDON TIMES: "There is a school for jungle warfare in India where the only textbook used is a thin volume of Kipling's poems. An instructor at the school maintains that Kipling has the complete answer to almost every problem likely to be encountered during jungle operations."

THE EUROPEAN REPRESENTATIVE of a large American automobile concern recently came to this country from a Scandinavian city where he has been staying during the war. He claims to represent German industrial leaders and is avowedly seeking to explore the possibilities of a negotiated peace.

AN INDICATION of what the war is doing to higher education is seen in a recent newspaper dispatch from Troy, New York. Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, an engineering school, is admitting women for the first time. Russell Sage College, a liberal-arts school whose enrolment has dropped because many women are choosing a technical college, is admitting men for the first time.

THE DENVER POST is urging that America's Japanese population be eliminated by putting men and women in separate internment camps and keeping them there after the war.

THE OFFICE OF WAR INFORMATION wants writers who submit manuscripts to it not to use phrases like "yellow people" in describing the Japanese. "This country," it says, "is not fighting this war on a race basis, and too many of our allies are also yellow for us to use that phrase."

AND KEEP YOUR REPORTER DRY: The Albany Times-Union reported on November 27 that "Henry J. Binderin, author of the startling book of non-fiction 'The Riddle of the Reich' " would join a panel of speakers discussing "Dr. Margaret Mead's new novel 'And Keep Your Powder Dry.' " The speaker's name was Robert Bendiner; he is the author of "The Riddle of the State Department"; and the book under discussion was no novel at all but an anthropological estimate of the American character in war time. Its author was actually Margaret Mead, as reported.

BRITISH HUMORS AND AMERICAN HUMOR

BY IRWIN EDMAN

HUMOR, though it has not pervaded the works of philosophers, has haunted their consciences. They had not rested because they have not been able to define the secret of its mad and maddening logic, its absurd good sense, its ridiculous truthfulness. An anthology of humor, since it is an index to what a nation likes, is an index also to what it assumes as rational and what it defines as folly. It is an epitome of a culture—not a summary of it in formulas, but a synthesis of it in forms of feeling and its molds of judgment.

A joke is a joke, and Mr. Morris Bishop, the editor of this latest anthology of the risible, "A Treasury of British Humor" (Coward-McCann, $3), assures us that a joke is identical in ancient Athens, medieval Padua, modern Manchester, England, and Buena Vista, Florida.

Mr. Bishop's own collection belies, I think, his theory of the universality of humor and, taken side by side with the E. B. and Katharine White "Subtreasury of American Humor"—how colonial we remain!—produces a residual difference in mood and tone. These jokes are far from demonstrating that the British do not have a sense of humor or that the American one is better or worse. They do not even show that the British and the American humor are radically different. Mr. Bishop is quite right in suggesting that the familiar assertions concerning the "understatement" of British humor and the "overstatement" of American humor are too easily refuted. Falstaff and Mr. Pickwick hardly qualify as perfect examples of reticence. And on the other hand nothing could be quieter than the humor of E. B. White.

Nevertheless, I do not see how anyone could go through Mr. Bishop's Treasury or the Whites' Subtreasury without being made aware that he was in two different worlds, in two differently delightful realms of discourse. Mr. Bishop's anthology is an excellent one, in so far as British humor can be anthologized at all. For, as Mr. Bishop points out in the case of Thackeray, much of the effect of British humor is cumulative. It is not humor so much as humors; it is not a succession of jokes so much as the creation of a mood. The amusements are ripples on the stream of the discourse. Often British humor is not so much hilarious as literally eccentric and marked by an "odd pathos." It hovers, more, I think, than American humor, on the edge of fantasy; there is no "Wind in the Willows" in American humor or, to take a more final illustration, "Midsummer Night's Dream." There is more leisure and more quietude. It is precisely this fact that may make many find Mr. Bishop's selections duller on the whole than those in the American anthology. There is, at least in the nineteenth century, more respectability; even the nonsense is decorous; there is a touch of gentility to the madness of Lewis Carroll and Edward Lear; the Mad Hatter is found at a tea-party, and the guest is a well-bred little girl.

Compare the two volumes, and the causes of laughter, the kinds of laughter, like the cadences of the prose and verse included, seem different. There is no British Mark Twain, though Mr. Bishop insists in his Introduction that Mark Twain's Americanism is purely accidental. He is apparently quite certain that if Mark Twain had been born an Englishman, he would have written a picaresque humorous book of a journey through English hedgerows and copses and wealds and dales. The book might have been called, he suggests, "Whortleberry Finn." Perhaps. But the humor that would have emerged along the Wye and the Thames would not have been the laughter of the Mississippi. "Whortleberry Finn" would have been so different from Huckleberry Finn in mood and temper that it were sheerly academic to call it the same kind. Laurence Sterne does not resemble Mark Twain very closely. "Pickwick," a little closer, is quite another picaresque story.

One of the principles by which Mr. Bishop made his anthology has a depressant effect upon at least one reader. Mr. Bishop deliberately leaves out many well-known show pieces: "Alice in Wonderland," "Dogberry and the Watch," the opening pages of "Pickwick." There are some things he could "not bear to leave out." Falstaff is, luckily, one of them. The editor has the "less known [of any author] in preference to the well known."

Every selection, he says, must have made him laugh, chuckle, or smile broadly. Tastes, to hazard a truism, differ, and though I have a quietly fanatical devotion to British humor, I did not find, I do not think many readers will find, themselves even smiling narrowly at some of the pieces included. Many of these passages are the humor of context, and, the context lost, so is much of the humor. Angela Thirkell's pleasantly inane Barssetshire cannot be cut up into thin slices without losing flavor. Evelyn Waugh needs a little room for his crazy-sane scope. T. H. White requires a running start for his nonsense medievalism.

The same thing holds true, I think, for the selections from earlier periods. The pieces of works remind the reader that those passages he recalls were much funnier (and I think they were) in their surroundings. Byron is witty enough in the passages given, but somehow less so than one remembered. Passages that one has not known before one is willing to take on trust. Probably when run across in their proper place, they would seem much better. Even the famous cracks of Sydney Smith fall a little flatter than they should; though the remark about Macaulay's "flashes of silence" is good even in isolation.

The light verse is always beautifully turned, but it, too, seems fainter and more vanilla-flavored than one had recalled. And since no critic of an anthology can forbear to ask questions, Why is no Dobson here?

I turned back from this treasury of British humor to the White "Subtreasury of American Humor." Even upon re-reading, it somehow seems funnier, gayer, wittier. Perhaps all that that means is that American humor breaks up into edible small pieces more easily. Perhaps English humor, like English cigarettes or Scotch whiskey, does taste better in England. Perhaps British humor exhibits more of the stratification of the stratified society from which, up to the present, it has grown. Many of the treasures of British humor are in this treasury, but the gold of its poetry, the diamond of its wit do not seem quite to be there. Perhaps it is because Mr. Bishop has only been able to give us token payments.

As well make a compendium of the mists that play over the near distance of British landscapes as try to isolate in a book the play of fancy, the dash of sharp insight, the moods pert and poetic that have, century after century, played over English life. Yet the book is good. As the old English charwoman said of the bombing of Canterbury which she had come through alive: "It warn't 'alf bad; sort of takes your mind off the war."

English life (and literature) has thousands of little marginal observations on existence not unlike that. Somehow missing from this volume is the ripple of poised amusement that, in all classes, privileged and underprivileged, has enabled the British to smile, sometimes annoyingly to foreigners, out of a deeply felt and rooted tradition. They could laugh at those ridiculous bounders, Hitler and Goebbels, even during the blitz. And the laughter doubtless helped them to endure and survive it.

NOTES BY THE WAY

Caldwell Comes a Cropper

ERSKINE CALDWELL is one of our most talented writers of fiction. He came up as a "natural" storyteller, who wrote with a seemingly instinctive, strict, and essentially poetic economy of expression wonderfully suited to his material—which he obviously knew to the point of saturation. "Tobacco Road" was a tall tale blankly told; its humor and its subject matter were deeply indigenous; it was very well turned. It was limited, however, as art in the broad sense. Its characters border so closely on the subhuman that the reader's sense of identity with them is almost as irrelevant as one's rather rueful sense of identity with apes in a zoo; and this limitation goes back in the end to the circumstance, not that the people who live in Tobacco Road actually are subhuman, but that Mr. Caldwell refused, in that book, to grant them full human status, refused to allow himself to become emotionally involved in their situation. He "laughed it off" instead; for that reason the humor is sinister and the laughter it arouses is not that of release but of self-defense.

"Trouble in July," published in 1940, showed great gain in maturity of feeling. It was reflected, first of all, in his choice of a theme—the story was one that has the status and significance of a folk tale in the poor South, that of the alleged rape of a white girl by a colored boy, the hunt for the accused and the terrorizing of the colored community, and finally the lynching. But the real measure of Mr. Caldwell's maturity was revealed in his attitude toward his characters. Most of the people in "Trouble in July" are, objectively speaking, scarcely higher in the social and human scale than those in "Tobacco Road." There are scenes of sex obsession quite as gruesome; and the humor is just as unsparing. Yet we are never allowed to lose the sense of these sorry individuals as fellow human beings in whose predicament, however sordid, we are therefore involved. Because the feeling is concentrated and sure, the piece is, with minor exceptions, neither overwritten nor understated; its implications, human, social, and political, are given what seems to be their proper place and their proper emphasis; and the created atmosphere is so convincing that one closes the book with the feeling that if this is not the poor South, the poor South does not exist.

In 1940, then, one reader at least felt that Mr. Caldwell was on the way to becoming an important novelist, who knew what he was doing. Since then he has turned journalist and world traveler; he has been caught up, for understandable reasons, in the currents of a world at war. His new novel, "All Night Long" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2.50), is a story of guerrilla warfare behind the German lines in Soviet Russia; and it is, I regret to say, one of the worst novels I have ever read. One may assume that Mr. Caldwell has never been behind the German lines in Soviet Russia and that his book is based on reports of what goes on there. The fact that he was dealing with unfamiliar material might be cited as the reason for the utter unreality of "All Night Long" as a picture not so much of Russian life as of any life whatever. It does not explain the failure of artistic intelligence which led Mr. Caldwell to believe that he could write, on the basis of a few months' observation, a convincing novel about Soviet Russia, let alone a novel about guerrilla warfare based on second-hand reports. It does not explain the far more shocking failure in taste and feeling that has led him to write a book which is not only a travesty of his own earlier work but which makes a travesty of the Russian struggle as well. (I understand that it has already been sold to the movies, and certainly it is as synthetic, as maudlin, and as sensational as Hollywood could wish, though I'm sure the naked Russian women in the last scene—in which they are rescued from a German brothel—will be "draped" by the Hays office, probably in picturesque Russian shawls.)

I do not for a moment doubt the sincerity of Mr. Caldwell's sympathy with the Russian people in their determination to drive the invaders out and, in the process, to kill as many Nemetskis as possible; but his feeling appears here only in the diluted form of sentimentality, and the ironic fact is that he has concocted a novel which might have been turned out by any one of a half-dozen "slick" writers bent only on exploiting the atrocities of war, particularly rape.

One might write off "All Night Long" as another proof that art and war don't mix very well, but even the Second World War seems hardly enough to explain the steep decline, on every count, from "Trouble in July." One can't help suspecting that, quite aside from the war, Mr. Caldwell has been seduced, perhaps unwittingly and certainly to an unnecessary degree, by the "outer world of telegrams and anger"—of journalistic "action," global scoops, and easy emotional excitement. Whatever the explanation, he has completely lost his bearings as an artist and has landed in a dismal swamp of crude propaganda, fake realism—and Hollywood contracts.

200 IMPRINTED POSTCARDS $1

Personalized Postcards are handy, time-saving and economical. Use our postcards with your name and address printed on them. We do a neat, attractive job of printing 200 postcards, 5 1/2 x 3 1/4 inches, for only $1, prepaid, using a good grade of card stock. Imprinted postcards make it easy for people to know the exact name and address of the sender. They have dignity and style, too. They are popular with both the sender and the receiver—the sender doesn't have to worry about the clearness of his signature and address, while the person addressed sees at a glance from whom and from where the postcard came. Imprinted postcards are efficient—and cost little, only $1 for 200, delivered. Always have several hundred at hand in your desk. Because of abnormal situation in paper market, we must use light colors that are available, so please do not order a certain color, but leave that to us. Just send us $1 with your name and address and say you want 200 IMPRINTED POSTCARDS. 500 for $2.80. 1,000 for $4.45. Prepaid.

A PRESS RELEASE from the Friends of Democracy reports the following conversation between one of its representatives and the New York office of Paramount Pictures, which is now in the throes (see last week's Nation for a full account) of producing the film version of Ernest Hemingway's "For Whom the Bell Tolls" without offending Franco:

Question: Is it true that the political implications in "For Whom the Bell Tolls" will be eliminated?

Answer: We think the political implications should not be emphasized. The picture is entirely neutral. After all, this picture must be made so that it will be valuable not only today but in years to come.

Question: You feel that there might not be opposition in America to fascism in the years to come?

Answer: Oh no, but it isn't necessary to bring in the political implications to make a good love story.

This is the first time we had heard that Hollywood's motive in eliminating political issues is to produce films for the "years to come"—though we have long been painfully aware that its love stories are designed for the ages—from six to twelve.

MARGARET MARSHALL

The Legacy of Kant

GERMAN PHILOSOPHY AND POLITICS. By John Dewey. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

PROFESSOR DEWEY'S book is mainly a reprint of a set of lectures which he first delivered and published in 1915. To bring it up to date he has added to the original text a comparatively short introductory chapter in which he tries to display the continuity in the ruling principles of the Second and the Third Reich. His general purpose is to account for Germany's political behavior in terms of German academic philosophy. This is a theme that has recently been somewhat overlabored; it has a temptingly close relation to the question of German war guilt. But Professor Dewey's approach to it is not that of a propagandist. Admittedly, his own convictions do not make him sympathetic to the ideas he discusses, but his examination of them is intended to be, and is, a serious contribution to the philosophy of history.

The premise from which Professor Dewey starts is that "the chief mark of distinctively German civilization is the combination of self-conscious idealism with unsurpassed technical efficiency and organization in the varied fields of action"; and he argues that the roots of this dualism are to be found in the philosophy of Kant. By confining the operation of speculative reason within the limits of possible sense experience, and by making the systematization of phenomena a necessary condition of our experiencing them, Kant gave philosophical sanction to the development of natural science: at the same time his view that the limitations to which the understanding was necessarily subject could be transcended in moral experience, and his conception of freedom as obedience to the self-imposed moral law, opened a new field for the extravagances of individual and collective mysticism. Such a development of his moral philosophy was not foreseen, nor would it have been welcomed by Kant himself. His aim, as he himself described it, was to limit reason in the interest of religious faith; certainly not to clear a path either for the self-intoxicated subjectivism of the romantic movement or for the deification of the Prussian state. Neither does this mean that he was blind to the logical implications of his own views. He is not the logical ancestor of the nineteenth-century German idealists in the sense in which Locke is the logical ancestor of Berkeley and Hume and Mill. Nevertheless, they are his progeny; and if they perverted his views, the perversion was made easy for them by the fact that his own moral philosophy is curiously inchoate. In particular, it gives no criteria for conduct beyond the exaltation of the sense of duty and the purely negative prescription that one should not act on principles that cannot consistently be universalized.

It remained accordingly for Fichte and Hegel to give substance to Kant's deontological shadow, and for this they elaborated between them a set of doctrines which have found their most pernicious realization in Hitler's National Socialism: the doctrines of the primacy of will over reason, of the preeminence of the German spirit, and of the divinity of the state. Professor Dewey illustrates this development with well-chosen quotations, culminating in Hegel's terrifying pronouncements that "the Germans were predestined to be the bearers of the Christian principle and to carry out the idea as the absolutely rational end" and that the state, and specifically the Prussian state, "is the absolute reality, and the individual himself has objective existence, truth, and morality only in his capacity as a member of it."

Since Professor Dewey makes a special point of placing ideas among historical causes, I assume his view to be that German political practice has been to some extent directly inspired by the work of the philosophers that he analyzes, and not, as some would hold, that the philosophizing was merely an articulation of an independent historical process. In this I think he is right, though I do not see any means of determining precisely the amount of influence that the philosophers exercised. This is not, indeed, to assume that the rulers of the Third, or even of the Second Reich, made a conscious study of Kant or Fichte or Hegel in framing their policies. All that is required is that the philosophers should have contributed largely to a common stock of ideas and opinions on which the politicians consciously and unconsciously drew; and this I conceive to have been the case. A point which is, however, ignored by most writers on this subject, including Professor Dewey, is that this common stock also contains elements from non-German sources. The most obvious example is Rousseau, who has the distinction of having helped to inspire both the French Revolution and its historical contrary, the early nineteenth-century German renaissance. That there is an affinity between Rousseau and Kant has, indeed, often been remarked. The source of it is to be found largely in their common Protestantism; and it is as an offshoot of Protestantism that the romantic movement, of which German nationalism is partially an expression, can most lucidly be interpreted. The conception of a chosen people, for example, is in itself pre-Christian, but its striking resurgence in the nineteenth century can, I think, legitimately be traced to the Calvinist doctrine of predestination. The fact that he ignores such questions exposes Professor Dewey to the charge of over-simplification; but it must be remembered that his book is designedly limited in its scope.

Sense and Censorship

TORPEDO JUNCTION: WITH THE PACIFIC FLEET FROM PEARL HARBOR TO MIDWAY. By Robert J. Casey. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.50.

THE FLYING GUNS. By Lieutenant Clarence E. Dickinson, U. S. N. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

THE war in the Pacific is peculiarly America's war—it is under American command, with such help as Australia and New Zealand can give, and it is essentially a naval war—but despite this unity of subject matter no single book gives the reader an adequate over-all picture of the campaign against Japan. The several pieces of the jigsaw puzzle are now being made available in the form of first-person accounts by correspondents and participants. If Correspondent Casey and Pilot Dickinson are read in conjunction with Correspondent Johnston ("Queen of the Flat-Tops"), the broad outlines of the United States navy's strategy in the first six months, the "offensive-defense" phase, of the Pacific war become clear. And their accounts contain enough minute-by-minute detail of individual actions to give the "feel" of this unprecedented warfare. But the burden of correlating the material falls upon the reader.

This is largely the fault of censorship. Johnston was not allowed to name the "other carrier" in the Coral Sea with the Lexington, although the navy identified it as the Yorktown while his book was in manufacture. Dickinson is not allowed to name the carrier from which he flew, although the last published edition of the Navy Directory shows that his squadron was attached to the Enterprise, and the enemy undoubtedly has better evidence than I have to show that this is the ship whose operations he describes. Casey is not allowed to name the cruiser on which he spent almost seven months, although plenty of Japanese saw her; he is allowed to give enough details of her armament and other characteristics to prove that it must have been either the Pensacola or the Salt Lake City. Dickinson, who writes with the aid of Boyden Sparkes, gives an excellent description of the attack at Pearl Harbor upon an old battleship, of 29,000 tons, 580 feet overall. The navy wouldn't let him name her, but has since admitted—as was obvious—that it was the Nevada. The navy has the right to suppress the identification of ships for reasons of security. But it is simply asinine to suppress the names and then authorize publication of all the details which will make identification possible, especially when it is remembered that the enemy's naval intelligence can draw these obvious inferences from published data far more readily than the average American reader. The present procedure simply gives information to the enemy and withholds it from the people of the United States.

Casey's book resembles that of another foreign correspondent, recently published, in that it is too long, devotes too much attention to the weather and the author's health, and contains much criticism of the censorship. But fortunately, Casey is not waspish, he is far too experienced to have delusions of grandeur, and everything he says about the censors is interesting and constructive. There was the former press agent at Pearl Harbor who would not listen to a comparison with British censorship, because "you're in the United States, and we'll do this job the American way." God save America, if the American way is to make believe that the Japanese do not know that they held Wake Island or what installations they have there; to treat the Army Signal Corps as the espionage agent of a foreign government; to suggest that an army photographer may attend a naval ceremony provided he leaves his camera behind—and so on. It is remarkable that after contending with such stupidity Casey retained his sense of humor and his faculty of observation sufficiently unimpaired to be able to write coherently, and in his unmistakable style, about the Marshall and Gilbert Islands raids, Wake and Marcus, the cruise to nowhere which miraculously resulted in the bombing of Tokyo, and the Battle of Midway. The censorship spoils his story about the bombing of Tokyo, but he deftly outwits the censors. Casey mars his otherwise excellent account of Midway with minor inaccuracies—it was not the first engagement between carrier fleets out of sight of each other—but he makes a strong case for listing Midway as one of the greatest and most decisive sea battles in history, with Trafalgar, Tsushima, and Jutland.

Dickinson flew over Oahu a few minutes after the Japanese. He was shot down, and saw at close range both the fifth column and its handiwork. He saw a nerve-racked American gunner shoot at his own superior officer, and later turn a withering barrage on a morning star. Then he flew for vengeance. He took it against a Japanese submarine, but the almost certain sinking is listed only as probable. He took further vengeance against enemy buildings on Roi Island and an aircraft tender at Kwajalein in the Marshalls. He helped to exact partial vengeance for Major Devereux's marines on Wake Island. He gave the coup de grâce to the aircraft carrier Kaga off Midway, and was forced to land in the ocean when he ran out of gas, as were many other American fliers that day. Dickinson was one who was saved to fight another day, and to supply this highly readable account of the history he made.

GILBERT CANT

Literature of America South

THE EPIC OF LATIN AMERICAN LITERATURE. By Arturo Torres-Rioseco. Oxford University Press. $3.

LATIN AMERICAN literature begins with great histories. Hard-handed, often uncultivated, soldiers manage somehow to rise to the events they report in their chronicles and contribute as well to the beginnings of modern geography, natural history, and anthropology. But though the New World may properly claim a share in their creations, these men are Portuguese and Spaniards. Their immediate successors, too, are scarcely less European for the accident of American birth. Yet despite Spain's adoption, for example, of Ruiz de Alarcón, the most exquisite comic author of his day, one can already discern in his work the effects of a Mexican upbringing. At a later period the influence of French thinkers helps mold the revolutionary temper and marks the beginning of a trend away from Peninsular models. But such authentically American masterpieces as Sarmiento's "Facundo" notwithstanding, these models remain European. Not until late in the last century does the cosmopolitan genius of Rubén Darío emerge from Nicaragua, the unlikelyst of places, to win for American letters the tribute of imitation by Europeans. These letters since his day, in the field of the novel especially, serenely specialize in the native scene and confidently but without blatancy invite consideration on their own merits.

The story is absorbing. The fact that, mutatis mutandis, it parallels in broad outline the evolution of literature in the United States adds a peculiar incentive to American readers. Refusal to yield to the temptation to be encyclopedic permits longer discussion of outstanding writers, while progressively fuller treatment of more recent and original periods gives the work a momentum and readability most unusual in histories of literature. Its title, "The Epic of Latin American Literature," which at first glance appears somewhat pretentious, thus surprisingly acquires real appropriateness. It is gratifying that Professor Torres-Rioseco, one of the most eminent critics in his field, is so auspiciously introduced to English-speaking Americans.

A part of this public will disagree with occasional judgments. Professor Torres-Rioseco is among those who see in Rómulo Gallegos's "Doña Bárbara" not merely a competent piece of fiction but a landmark. To others, as to the writer, it may seem diffuse and melodramatic. One may find something unaccountable, too, in the reputation of Benito Lynch. The Argentine novelist is an acute observer and gifted storyteller, but I find him too sentimentally susceptible to the charms of the child-woman heroines he draws so well and so often. It is the outstanding merit of Professor Torres-Rioseco's book, however, that readers will look forward to judging for themselves. They will also find bibliographies that facilitate their exploration.

At It Again

THE BEST POEMS OF 1941. Edited by Thomas Moul. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

ANTHOLOGY OF MAGAZINE VERSE, 1938-1942. Edited by Alan F. Pater. The Paebar Company. $10.

AN AMERICAN ANTHOLOGY. Edited by Tom Boggs. The Press of James A. Decker. $2.

THOMAS MOULT has been assembling "the year's best" for twenty years now, and—for the twentieth time?—he reminds readers that "the word 'best' is used only in the sense that the poems included are his own artistic preferences." Well, there are ways and ways of making a name, and perhaps an annual emasculation of the word "best" is not the worst. But in the ideal state editors would be told to say what they mean, even if it came to "My Favorite Lyrics" or "Preferences, 1941." Certainly Moul's latest preferences make it more than usually clear that he is as fallible as anyone else: he usually avoids the utterly bad, but now we get a stiff dose of it. Anxiety to show that England can still give off "war poetry" in the accepted, or corrupt, sense of the term is the only reason I can see for including a four-page outburst by Herbert Palmer which is probably the worst poem of this or any war, and an effort which diverted Lord Vansittart from making the nation's laws just long enough to delight us that he does not make its songs—a communiqué in which the moon tells the earth, inter alia, that she would "sooner have no Man at all/than Huns who rape and rave and rack." War always casts up such miserable stuff, but to see it among "artistic preferences" raises the question whether Moul is not also using the word "artistic" in a strictly limited sense. Apart from these and similar lapses, his taste remains engagingly catholic. Although the younger English poets are not abundantly represented, Laurie Lee and Clifford Dyment voice fresh feelings about the war, strictly and purely expressed; and a Spender, The War God, finely furnishes that keenest pleasure of yearbooks, the sudden blaze of talent against the fuzz of competence. There are oddities, too, that a selector of stricter taste might spurn: among them Lord Derwent's Which Music? pleases by its accomplished dilettantism, modestly there among the strained solemnities. But on the whole this anthology—seventy-six poems, sixty-nine poets—confirms the impression made by its predecessors, that Moul roams the Anglo-American poetic fields chiefly to reassure us that through it all the Blunders still bumble, the Frosts still freeze, and the de la Mares still weave flowers in their hair.

A modest aim, and unavowed. Mr. Pater's is neither. His preface to this colossal collection, his second—376 poets, so there must be around 500 poems—reads like a wild parody of the newer utterances of Van Wyck Brooks. The familiar wails about obscurity, neuroticism, violence, cynicism, etc., lead up to the apocalyptic statement that we need poets who can "transcend Shakespeare, Dante, Homer, and Goethe." How? By "living more nobly than Shakespeare," by practicing the "ideal love that Goethe lacked." Then a burst into verse: "Write, when glows your ecstasy; Art, like God, shoulde perfect be!" Thus warned, we slip easily through a chatty meaningless introduction by John Holmes to find, of

Here is A CAPITALISTIC APPROACH To A PLANNED ECONOMY!

The author advocates a concrete program of transition to a semi-socialist society in which both public and private enterprise will survive, each operating in those areas where each is more efficient—a reorganization plan based upon accepted legal patterns which will do away with the need for an ever-growing, non-productive, socially wasteful, regimentary bureaucracy to control our economy.

The plan aims to unite the many labor factions and above all to win over the rich by offering them practical bargains not sermons. $3.00 course, that the poetry is a ton of safety to an ounce of daring. Examples: Stevens 1, Hillyer 4; Yeats 1, Coffin 8; and among the Moores, Virginia 3, Rosalie 2, Nicholas 1, Marianne 0. But sandwiched between the favored writers, who must live very beautifully indeed, are names and sources surprising in the circumstances: Auden, Rukeyser, both Williamses; and the New Masses jostles the New Yorker. It is all very bewildering for your money, but at least part of it would be well spent on the best thing in the book, a "List of Magazines Publishing Poetry" which omits at least five ranking media but includes Religious Telescope, Ideal Love, Our Dumb Animals, and Skating.

The Pater dwarfs the Moulton, but both commit the cardinal sin of anthologists, spreading the net too wide. There has to be some unifying factor: an honest bad taste is better than none. I think Tom Boggs's taste good, and surely anyone will admit that it exists. This, his third selection, ranges over the last twenty years' work in America to find sixty-seven poems not previously appearing in an anthology, by twenty-eight poets, and thus redeems names like Cummings, Bishop, and Winters from the oblivion Pater seems to intend for them. Most of Boggs's choices are well worth including; a welcome number of names are relatively unfamiliar; and in theme, technique, and attitude the poems stand solidly for the vigorous independence that blew through our between-wars poetry like a fresh wind and is found even now, despite the new conformism, in several crannies of the ramparts we watch.

John Rice of Black Mountain

I CAME OUT OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By John Andrew Rice. Harper and Brothers. $3.

IF JOHN ANDREW RICE had to be born again, he would choose for his birthplace his native state and for his century the eighteenth. To this century he believes, rightly or wrongly, belonged all the things that made visits to his grandmother the happiest part of childhood: long, clockless days, homespun furnishings, violence touched with grace, simple faith in simple words, and faith in man, to mention only a few. Again he would wish a man of God for father, and not to be born a gentleman. The last requisite is significant, for more than half the autobiography is concerned with his internal battle against class consciousness. The rest relates his battle against educational authority.

Uneasiness about his social status had nothing to do with one grandmother's habit of smoking a pipe and little connection with the poverty that forced his aunts on the other side to work in the cotton fields. Both families were planters, and in South Carolina being "well-born" meant being born on a plantation. His sense of inferiority sprang chiefly from an inheritance of Methodism, inescapable since his father was a preacher. Not until he had been abroad as a Rhodes scholar does he seem to have gained enough perspective to feel at home in America.

His father was a violent Puritan. Whenever he preached he worked himself into such a lather that his clothes had to be changed before dinner. He was singularly inept with his hands, not so much because he lived in a world of ideas as because he regarded everything as potentially hostile. His car refused to run from malice and must be shaken and kicked into submission. Honorable, and at the same time ambitious, he was continually enraged by the advancement of ecclesiastical scoundrels, and at meal time dissected them so dextrously that his children themselves became expert. "I listened with delight, not knowing that some day I should be plagued with my then acquired skill in detecting another's weaknesses, nor that, when it comes to people, clarity unwed to charity can be an evil thing."

The portraits of the men under whom Mr. Rice taught the classics at Nebraska and Rollins College have amazing clarity. Perhaps they are charitable; we do not know what is left unsaid, and there is restraint, at least in the account of his journey through the valley of humiliation at the foot of Black Mountain.

The judges of the Harper Award have done well to indicate the literary value of this desperately honest attempt at self-analysis. A gift of perception, so acute that it notices whether the whole face tells the same story as the eyes, is joined to a gift for words. One can well believe that oratory was a perfected art in the South. It is here again, vigorous, persuasive, and epigrammatic.

FILMS

I WOULD like so to use this column about moving pictures as to honor and discriminate the subject through interesting and serving you who are reading it. Whether I am qualified to do this is an open question to which I can give none of the answers. But I can begin by describing my condition as a would-be critic.

I suspect that I am, far more than not, in your own situation: deeply interested in moving pictures, considerably experienced from childhood on in watching them and thinking and talking about them, and totally, or almost totally, without experience or even much second-hand knowledge of how they are made. If I am broadly right in this assumption, we start on the same ground, and under the same handicaps, and I qualify to be here, if at all, only by two means. It is my business to conduct one end of a conversation, as an amateur critic among amateur critics. And I will be of use and of interest only in so far as my amateur judgment is sound, stimulating, or illuminating.

That my own judgment, and yours, is that of an amateur, is only in part a handicap. It is also a definition. It can even be an advantage, of a sort, in so far as a professional's preoccupation with technique, with the box-office, with bad traditions, or simply with work, can blur, or alter the angle of, his own judgment. I would talk to even so good a director as John Ford, for instance, with deep respect for him as a technician and as a serious man, but I might at the same time regret ninety-nine feet in every hundred of "The Grapes of Wrath," and be able to specify my regret; and it would be a question entirely of the maturity of my judgment, and not in the least of my professional or amateur standing, whether I were right or wrong. If I were a professional, on the other hand, my realization of the complexity of making any film would be so much clarified that I would be much warier than most critics can be in assigning either credit or blame. Indeed, if you could follow out all the causes of that sort of high-serious failure, you would be involved as much in the analysis of an industry, a form of government, and the temper of a civilization, as in the analysis of a film.

As an amateur, then, I must as well as I can simultaneously recognize my own ignorance and feel no apology for what my eyes tell me as I watch any given screen, where the proof is caught irrelevant to excuse, and available in proportion to the eye which sees it, and the mind which uses it.

If only I had seen enough of the candidates I would like, now, to make some of the customary seasonal comments on the ten best films of the year. Not having seen even "Mrs. Miniver," I have nothing to say, beyond mentioning that one look at the "Miniver" stills was enough to keep me away.

The best picture I saw this year was "The Gold Rush." Next to that were various non-fiction shots of war. Next to them was "In Which We Serve," which sets its limits so discreetly and fills them so nearly perfectly, and thus so likably, that my qualifying remarks must seem ungrateful.

They are that a blend, no matter how successful, of high-mediocre cinematic realism with Noel Coward's unexcelled particular kind of theatrical skill and tact cannot achieve anything first-rate but only one of the few next-best things, and that good as it is, it is a hollow filled with persuasive shadows and echoes where full excellence is solid, if transfigured, flesh and blood. I think the chief lack and the outstanding talent of such a man as Coward have the same root: a peculiarly sentimental kind of sensitiveness which is common to many witty, sad, able, and fastidious men. Their feeling for phenomena, whether human or inanimate, is at the same time sensuously sharp, shy, and critical, without either great energy or vulgarity or depth; so that when they are confronted with simple people, toward whom they feel remote and tender, or with a powerful and simple subject, they are at an essential loss, against which, on a secondary level, they have excellently equipped themselves.

In that sense of loss they retreat to two forts: that of "kitsch," used gently and with the severe withdrawal of irony of which ironists are best capable; and that of the taste, the devices, the exquisite sense of detail, the regard for form, by which they rectify and perfect the kitsch, refine their essential sentimentality, and set up defenses against any attack on it. This reverent and just evaluation of kitsch takes the place of that depth of heart and mind from which a first-rate artist works; and taste, tricks, detail, a dancer's delight in form, are the deft and of themselves respectable substitutes for a first-rate artist's perfecting of his perception. The result is that it is almost too elegantly geared for almost too many "effects." It has been so subtly used by the fingertips, rather than born out of the whole of the body, that discriminating watchers, in turn, are liable to find it merely touching, and pleasing to touch, whereas the indiscriminating watcher, taking this delicate imitation of power for power itself, is subtly hornsoggled.

I rather regret having used this space so generally, and would like at least to say that Coward himself is exceedingly good in the film, that Bernard Miles, whose chief petty officer looks like a Gothic angel, is even better, and that Coward's farewell to his crew is a really remarkable and moving tour de force. I would like also to recommend "Random Harvest" to those who can stay interested in Ronald Colman's amnesia for two hours and who could with pleasure eat a bowl of Yardley's shaving soap for breakfast, and "Life Begins at 8:30" to those who can still be tickled by Monty Wooley's beard and Nunnally Johnson's lines (both good things in moderation), at the end of what seems hours. I also urge that "Ravaged Earth," which is made up of Japanese atrocities, be withdrawn until, if ever, careful enough minds, if any, shall have determined whether or not there is any morally responsible means of turning it loose on the public.

ART

JOSEPH CORNELL AND LAURENCE VAIL: Objects and Bottles.

At the Art of This Century Museum, until December 31.

Any free-standing object can be a work of art in its own right and for its own sake. Surrealism continues what Dada was the first to teach by actual examples. Dada stemmed, no matter how deviously, from art for art's sake, which asserted that works of art are self-sufficient and not required inevitably to be either mirrors of reality or decoration. In Vail's bottles and even in Cornell's objects surrealism encourages a tendency it often opposes—the abstract. The bottles do not owe their beauty to the things represented on the scraps of pictures Vail cuts out of magazines and pastes around the glass, but rather to the way the bottle shape is married to the color and design of the collage. One of Vail's best bottles is a Rhine shape merely daubed with cobalt paint and solidified chalk to which petrified sponges cling. Obviously, this art derives from modern French painting, post-cubism in particular. The stuffed birds, thimbles, bells, cardboard cut-outs, and so forth which Cornell puts into boxes faced with glass please by their arrangement and the unspecified associations they call up, but mean or represent nothing not themselves. They too derive from modern painting, from Chirico and Ernst—and Kurt Schwitters's "trash" objects. (Cornell's only unsuccessful compositions, those relying on thimbles, have an emptiness resembling the duller canvases of Chirico.)

Vail's bottles do not appear at their best in a gallery. They are too intimate as yet and belong rather to one's private surroundings; there they lose all associations of ornament and become, even more than Chinese vases, autonomous and dramatic, competing with pictures and sculpture. Put one of them next to the piece that won Jose de Creeft the first sculpture prize at the Metropolitan's contemporary show (of which more next week), and it would make the De Creeft look a little phony. Cornell's boxes could be well used to electrify some of the blatantly dull galleries at the Metropolitan's extravaganza.

Both artists have only begun to explore their new mediums; an infinite prospect lies ahead. Vail could put his collage around an equestrian statue, as he has around a screen; Cornell could construct landscapes ten feet square inside his boxes. I am in dead earnest. For besides being explorers, both of them are greatly gifted artists.

MUSIC

ENGLISH B1 (M., W., F. at 10), which Lionel Trilling discussed in The Nation a few weeks ago, has its parallel in Music B1 (M., W., F. at 12); and its textbook, the "Survey-History of English Literature" which undertook to give the student "all the useful facts and necessary opinions about English literature," also has its musical equivalents. Mr. Trilling was disturbed by the badness of the material which the book pumped into the student's mind; but if all the judgments in the book were sound there would still be the necessity of those judgments that would disturb me. The education of a young man of college age includes making him acquainted with the great ideas that have been thought, the great literature that has been written; and it is right that it should do so, even though a great many young men of college age are not equipped or ready to appreciate the greatness of the ideas or the literature. Or rather, it would be right if the young men were brought into contact with the material, if everything were done to facilitate the involvement of their minds with it, and if then the minds were left free to become involved or not, to get from the material some meaning and value that it had for them or to get none. There are, no doubt, places where this procedure is followed; but in many colleges the requirements of academic bookkeeping do not permit a young man to get nothing or the "wrong" thing from the philosophy or the literature he has read. To earn his three credits he must get something—if not his own idea, then somebody else's; and not his own "wrong" idea but somebody else's "right" one—in other words, the necessary opinions that are fed to him for four months by someone's survey-history of philosophy or literature, and that he hands back after four months on an examination paper.

This, I say, has its musical equivalent. It is right to bring those young students into contact with the music of Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Haydn—literally, almost, to establish contact between the music and their ears, with the help, let us say, of some explanation of its special procedures and principles of organization—and then to let the music make what effect it can, let it become for some of the students a moving communication and for others a bore. But if students merely experience Mozart's G minor Symphony and are either moved or bored, if they are inarticulate about their experience, if they do not acquire something which they can hand back on an examination paper, there is no course for the purposes of academic bookkeeping. And so for these purposes the students in Music B1, a survey course in history and appreciation of music, are given "all the useful facts and necessary opinions" about the lives of the composers and their music. These facts and opinions are useful and necessary for the students to get credit for the course, but not for them to get a moving experience from the arrangement of sounds that is Mozart's G minor Symphony; and included often are trivialities, vulgarities, and misrepresentations like those which disturbed Mr. Trilling.

On the way to the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society's performance of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust"—the first since the Schola Cantorum's performance more than fifteen years ago—I happened to be reading Carl Van Vechten's discussion of Nijinsky, reprinted in the latest issue of Dance Index, and encountered a passage which turned out to be relevant to the performance of Berlioz's work. "Its precision alone is noteworthy," said Mr. Van Vechten of the detail of one of Nijinsky's performances. "Indeed, precision is a quality we see exposed so seldom in the theater that when we find it we are almost inclined to hail it as genius."

Precision comes with mastery of a medium; and in the case of the precision of the Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Toscanini or Stokowski, or the Boston Symphony conducted by Koussevitzky, the relation between the movement with which the conductor indicates his wish and the orchestra's response is unmistakable. Now if the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra had played the beginning of "The Damnation of Faust" as Rodzinski's series of tense, spasmodic, sforzato beats indicated, it would have produced a series of sforzato accents in what is a lyric, flowing passage. Actually, then, the orchestra followed his beat as an indicator of pace—a pace that was excessively slow and stolid—and ignored it as an indicator of the character of the music. There was, in other words, no complete control of the orchestra by the conductor; and there was, as a result, a lack of precision in timing and in values of sonority, hence a lack of clean, sharp definition and correct balance, in the orchestral sound. The lack of control extended to the soloists, who sang as well or as badly as their own musicality or rhythmic sense determined—Pinza superbly (though with only the shreds of a voice in his upper range), Novotna and Robofsky well, but Jagel with no regard for the prescribed rhythmic outlines of the phrases that his brassy voice produced. In addition Rodzinski set a pace that was now too slow, now too fast (Mephistopheles's Serenade), and always without plasticity. And yet the music, though imperfectly realized, was something astoundingly beautiful and astoundingly original in its turns of melody, its progressions of harmony, its instrumental colorings, all the product of an individual mind, an individual sense for the medium, and all produced with economy, delicacy, finesse—which is to say with honesty in the relation of means to artistic end.
